6 But when Paul perceived (or, then Paul knowing) that the one part (of the council and of the people) were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees (who asserted the resurrection of the body, which the sadducees denied), he cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of (i. e. concerning one of their doctrines, viz.) [4] the hope and resurrection (i. e. the hope of the resurrection) of the dead I am called in question.

7 And when he had so said, there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees: and the multitude was divided.

8 (These words of St. Paul being a plain declaration of his opposition to the doctrine of the sadducees;) [5] for the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection (of the body), neither (is there any permanent) angel, nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both (angels and other spirits remaining after their separation from the body).

9 And there arose (upon this dissension) a great cry (or clamour): and (for) the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove (in defence and justification of St. Paul), saying, We find no evil in this man: but if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God.

10 And when there arose a great dissension (Gr. and the dissension growing great), the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers to go down, and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle (of Antonia).

11 And the night following [6] the Lord (Jesus) stood by him, and said (to him), Be of good cheer, Paul: for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, [7] so must thou bear witness also (of me) at Rome.

12 And when it was day, certain of the Jews banded together, [8] and bound themselves under a curse, saying (with an imprecation) that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul.

13 And they were more than forty (persons) which had made this conspiracy (against him, out of zeal to their religion).

14 And (the better to accomplish it) they came to the chief priests and elders, (men as zealous for his destruction as themselves, xxv. 15,) and said (to them), We have bound ourselves under a great curse, that we will eat nothing until we have slain Paul.

15 Now therefore ye with the (whole) council signify (your request) to the chief captain that he (would) bring him down unto you to morrow, as though ye would enquire something more perfectly concerning him: and we, or ever (i. e. before) he come near (to the council), are ready to kill him.

clared that such a one "is neither a judge, nor to be honoured as such;" in which sense the blind man saith of Christ to the pharisees, "That he is a sinner, οὐκ οἶδα, I know not," John ix. 25, and this he might say, because the high-priest had not then on him those robes peculiar to him, by which he was distinguished from other priests. Or, (2.) the latent sense may be this, The prophetic impulse that was upon me, and inwardly moved me thus to speak, permitted me not to advert that it was the high-priest, lest that law I mention might have restrained me from complying with that impulse; and it is certain from the example of Christ styling Herod, "fox," Luke xiii. 32, and of Paul calling Nero, "lion," 2 Tim. iv. 17, and acknowledged by the Jews, that he who acted as a prophet was not under the obligation of this precept, as others were; but Paul speaks so obscurely, because, saith Grotius, he knew he would find no credit from them in this assertion.

[4] Ver. 6. For the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question.] That is, for the hope of the resurrection of the dead; so χάρις καὶ ἀποστολὴ, is "the grace of apostleship," ζωὴ καὶ πνοὴ, "the breath of life," Acts xvii. 25 (see Glassius, Philol. i. lib. iii. tr. de Nom.); but then it is inquired, why Paul here saith he was called in question for this hope in general, and xxiv. 15, xxvi. 6, repeats the same thing, when he was only called in question concerning the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. Now the reason of this will appear from this observation; that before our Saviour's passion the doctrine which he preached being chiefly levelled against the vain traditions of the scribes and pharisees, and his woes denounced against them, they still appear in opposition to him, the sadducees being scarce ever mentioned as his adversaries; but after his resurrection the testimony of the apostles being this, that Christ was risen from the dead, and so directly contrary to that which distinguished the sadducees from the pharisees, we find them most forward to oppose their testimony; then "the sadducees came upon them, being grieved that they preached the resurrection of the dead through Jesus," iv. 1, 2, then "the high-priest and all the sect of the sadducees were filled with zeal against them," v. 17, the scribes, which were of the sect of the pharisees, rather siding with Paul in this matter. Another reason, why Paul thus mixed these things together, might be this, that the apostles testified the resurrection of the dead "through Jesus," Acts iv. 2, and taught that God would "raise us up by Jesus" 1 Thess. iv. 14, and so the proof of the one, viz. that Christ was risen, was a confirmation of the general resurrection.

[5] Ver. 8. The sadducees say there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit.] That the sadducees did not believe the resurrection of the body, as all the ancient Christians* plainly do assert, so this scripture, and Matt. xxii. 23, plainly testify. (2.) They said, that after the giving of the law at least, there was no angel; and that when they are said to appear so often in the law of Moses, they were framed for that purpose, and after ceased to have any being, for otherwise it is hard to conceive, how they could believe the law of Moses, and yet deny that angels ever did exist. And, (3.) when they are said to deny any spirits, that is not to be so understood, as if they denied God to be a spirit, or that there was any spirit of man within him, but as Josephus† testifies, they denied τῆς ψυχῆς τὴν διαμονὴν, "the permanency of the soul after death;" and so they denied any spirits separated from bodies which could appear, or reveal any thing to them; the pharisees held the contrary, as is apparent from these words, ver. 9, "If an angel or spirit hath spoken to him:" of such apparitions, believed by the apostles, we have mention Matt. xiv. 26, Luke xxiv. 37, and the Jews believed that Samuel thus appeared to Saul, and Elias frequently to them, the sadducees denying all such apparitions.

[6] Ver. 11. The Lord stood by him,] Per angelum, "by an angel," saith Grotius, without all ground; an angel never being styled ὁ Κύριος, "the Lord," in the New Testament, but only "the angel of the Lord," Matt. i. 20, ii. 13, xix. 21, xxviii. 2, Luke i. 11, ii. 9, Acts v. 19, viii. 26, xii. 7. 23, and said Θάρσει Παῦλε, "Be of good courage, Paul;" for as when thou testifiedst of me in Jerusalem, and they went about to kill thee (Acts ix. 29, 30), I delivered thee; so will I also deliver thee from the gentiles at Rome, according to my promise made to thee (Acts xxvi. 17).

[7] Δεῖ σε εἰς Ῥώμην μαρτυρῆσαι, Thou must testify of me at Rome.] Here is an instance of divine appointment, without any necessity laid upon the will of Paul; whose appeal to Cæsar was only made as an expedient to preserve him from the rage of the Jews (Acts xxv. 11. 24, xxviii. 19), and so was only a matter of prudence, and not of absolute necessity.

[8] Ver. 12. Who bound themselves under a curse.] It was a thing too common among the zealots of the Jews, to cut off, without any judicial process, those whom they looked upon as transgressors of their laws, and enemies to the Jews. Josephus‡ informs us that they committed infinite slaughters, τὰ μέγιστα κακῶν ἀγαθὰ νομίζοντες, "thinking the vilest

16 And when Paul's sister's son heard of their lying in wait, he went and entered (Gr. being present, and entering) into the castle, and (Gr. he) told Paul.

17 [9] Then Paul called one of the centurions unto him, and said, Bring this young man unto the chief captain: for he hath a certain thing to tell him.

18 So he took him, and brought him to the chief captain, and said, Paul the prisoner called me unto him, and prayed me to bring this young man unto thee, who hath something to say unto thee.

19 Then the chief captain took him by the hand, and went with him aside privately, and asked him, What is that thou hast to tell me?

20 And he said, (Certain of) the Jews have agreed to desire thee (by intercession of the council) that thou wouldest bring down Paul to morrow into the council, as though they would enquire somewhat of him more perfectly.

21 But do not thou yield (this) unto them: for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, which have bound themselves with an oath, that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him: and now are they ready, looking for a promise from thee (to bring him down).

22 So the chief captain then let the young man depart, and charged him (saying), See thou tell no man that thou hast shewed these things to me.

23 And he called unto him two centurions, saying (to them), Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cæsarea, and horsemen threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, at the third hour of the night;

24 And provide them beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto Felix the governor.

25 And he wrote a letter (to him) after this manner:

26 Claudius Lysias unto the most excellent governor Felix sendeth greeting.

27 This man (whom I send to thee) was taken of the Jews, and should have been killed of them: then came I with an army, and rescued him, having understood (Gr. this man taken by the Jews, and being about to be killed by them, I, knowing it, with my army rescued him, understanding) that he was a Roman.

28 And when I would have known (Gr. being willing to know) the cause wherefore (for which) they accused him, I brought him forth into their council:

29 Whom I perceived to be accused of (i. e. concerning) questions of their law, but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds.

30 And when it was told me how that the Jews laid wait for the man (or when I was told of a conspiracy that would be against him from the Jews), I sent (him) straightway to thee, and gave commandment to his accusers also to say before thee what they had (to say) against him. Farewell.

31 Then the soldiers, as it was commanded them, took Paul, and brought him by night to Antipatris.

32 (And) on the morrow they left the horsemen to go (on) with him, and (the foot) returned to the castle:

33 Who (i. e. which horsemen), when they came to Cæsarea, and delivered the epistle to the governor, presented Paul also before him.

34 And when the governor had read the letter, he asked of what province he was. And when he understood that he was of Cilicia;

35 I will hear thee, said he (to Paul), when thine accusers are also come. And he commanded him (in the mean time) to be kept in Herod's judgment hall.

things were good when done by them. And Philo* speaks of some among them, οἱ ὀμνύουσιν τραύματα καὶ σφαγὰς, "who swore to wound and kill others, καὶ ἀνυπερθέτως αὐτὰ δρῶσι, and did so without delay;" and that the chief priests and Sanhedrin approved of such murders done out of such pernicious designs, we learn from their confident address to them, ver. 14, 15, and their consent to the fact, ver. 20, plainly proving, by their lying and murderous dispositions, that they were children of the devil, John viii. 44 (see xxv. 2, 3.)

[9] Ver. 17. Then Paul called one of the centurions, &c.] Hence it appears, that even after a promise of our safety (see note on ver. 11), we ought not to neglect any honest means of our preservation, though it be to be accomplished by our addresses to men alien from the faith.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 And after five days Ananias the high priest descended with the elders, and with a certain orator named Tertullus, [1] who informed the governor (Gr. showed themselves to the governor) against Paul.

2 And when he was called forth, Tertullus began to accuse him, saying (to the governor), [2] Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence,

3 We accept it always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XXIV.

[1] Ver. 1. Οἵτινες ἐνεφάνισαν τῷ ἡγεμόνι, Who informed the governor.] This word answers to the Hebrew נגד, as it in hiphil signifies to make known, show, declare, appear; and where a dative case follows, an accusative is to be understood, and is most frequently added; as when Moses says, Exod. xxxiii. 13, ἐμφάνισόν μοι σεαυτὸν, "Show to me thyself;" thus Esther ἐνεφάνισε τῷ βασιλεῖ τὰ τῆς ἐπιβουλῆς, "showed or declared the conspiracy to the king," Esth. ii. 22; so John xiv. 21, "How is it ὅτι ἡμῖν μέλλεις ἐμφανίζειν σεαυτὸν, that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world?" And accordingly here and xxv. 2. 15, ἑαυτοὺς is to be understood, and the whole should be rendered, "Who showed or declared themselves to the governor against Paul;" not that they informed the governor; for the information follows, ver. 5, 6, and so our translators have rendered the word, xxiii. 22, and Heb. xi. 14.

[2] Ver. 2. Πολλῆς εἰρήνης τυγχάνοντες διὰ σοῦ, Seeing we enjoy great peace by thee, &c.] In this and in the following verses the orator is guilty of sordid flattery and falsehood: for though it be true, that Felix did some kindness to the Jewish nation in delivering them from the thieves and the magicians which infested them, as Josephus* doth acknowledge; yet that he otherwise was guilty of great injustice towards the Jews, and was on that account accused before Nero by the chief of the Jews dwelling at Cæsarea, and had been punished for his wickedness, had not his brother Pallas, who was then high in favour with Nero, succoured him, the same Josephus† testifies. (2.) That Paul moved the Jews to sedition against the government, or that he went about to profane the temple, was utterly false, see xxi. 28, and so was it also, that they took him to judge him according to their law; for they took him by violence, and drew him out of the temple, and went about to kill him without any judicial process (xxi. 30, 31).

4 Notwithstanding, that I be not (Gr. but that I may not be) further tedious unto thee, I pray thee that thou wouldest hear us of thy clemency a few words.

5 For we have found this man a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of the sect (called from one Jesus of Nazareth, the sect) of the Nazarenes:

6 Who also hath gone about to profane the temple (of Jerusalem, by bringing into it heathens, xxi. 28): whom we (therefore) took, [3] and would have judged according to our law.

7 But the chief captain Lysias came upon us, and with great violence took him away out of our hands,

8 Commanding his accusers to come unto thee: by examining of whom (thou) thyself mayest take knowledge of all these things, whereof we accuse him.

9 And the Jews also assented (to this accusation), saying that these things were so.

10 Then Paul, after that the governor had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation (and so canst not be ignorant of the things belonging to Christianity, or to the Jews), I do the more cheerfully answer for myself (before thee):

11 Because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship.

12 And (since my coming thither) they neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither (have they found me) raising up the people (Gr. making a sedition among the multitude), neither in the synagogues, nor in the city:

13 Neither can they prove (any other of) the things whereof they now accuse me.

14 But (as for that part of their accusation which relates to the sect of the Nazarenes) this I confess unto thee, that [4] after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers (viz. through Jesus Christ), believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets (concerning him):

15 And have hope toward God (in God), which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, [5] both of the just and unjust.

16 And [6] herein (therefore) do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men.

17 Now [7] after many years (from my conversion) I came to bring alms to my nation, and offerings (from the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia, Rom. xv. 26).

18 Whereupon certain Jews (that came) from Asia found me purified in the temple, (after the manner of the Nazarites, Acts xxi. 24. 26, and in compliance with the law of Moses concerning them that had a vow upon them, as then I had, xviii. 18, but I was there) neither with multitude (i. e. concourse of any to profane the temple, as they imagined, xxi. 23), nor with (any) tumult (made by me whilst I was there).

19 Who (being my accusers) ought to have been here before thee, and object (it, as doubtless they would do) if they had ought against me.

20 Or else let these same here (who have assented to the accusation of Tertullus, ver. 9) say, [8] if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council,

21 Except it be (their pleasure to accuse me) for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, (viz That) touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day.

22 And when Felix heard these things, [9] having (as without any resurrection, the entrance into another body belonging only to the souls of the just.

[3] Ver. 6. And would have judged him according to our law.] From this, and from the complaint of violence used by Lysias in taking Paul out of their hands, it seemeth to appear, that the Jews still either had or claimed a power of inflicting death upon capital offenders against their law.

[4] Ver. 14. After that way which they call heresy.] They accusing Paul as a ringleader τῆς τῶν Ναζαραίων αἱρέσεως, "of the heresy of the Nazarenes," that is, of the Christians, so styled both by Jew and gentile from their faith in Jesus of Nazareth. Now the word αἵρεσις bears often an indifferent sense, both in the scriptures, as when it is said, Acts xv. 5, that some believers were ἐκ τῆς τῶν φαρισαίων αἱρέσεων, "of the sect of the pharisees;" and when the Jews at Rome inquire of Paul, what he thought περὶ τῆς αἱρέσεως ταύτης, "of the sect" of Christians, xxviii. 22, and when St. Paul saith in commendation of himself, that he lived κατὰ τὴν ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν, "according to the exactest sect (or heresy) of their religion," xxvi. 5, and also in the ancient Jewish writers; as when Josephus gives an account of the three αἱρέσεις, "heresies," or φιλοσοφίας, "philosophical opinions" of the Jews, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2, et de Bello Jud. lib. ii. cap. 12, yet seeing the prayer against the Christians, called beracoth haminim, if we may credit the Jews, was made by R. Samuel in the time of Gamaliel; and seeing Justin Martyr* doth inform us, that they very early sent their emissaries to all nations against the Christians, representing them as αἵρεσις ἄθεος καὶ ἄνομος, "an antheistical and wicked heresy," we have reason to believe, that in this sense they accused Paul as a ringleader of "the heresy of the Nazarenes."

[5] Ver. 15. Both of the just and of the unjust.] This seemeth necessarily to be added, because the doctrine of the pharisees, according to Josephus,† restrained the resurrection to the just, condemning the unjust to perpetual torments

[6] Ver. 16. Ἐν τούτῳ δὲ, And herein.] The critics say, that here and 2 Cor. v. 2, ἐν τούτῳ signifies interim, interea, "in the mean time," but I think without any necessity; for in both places it may either signify ἐπὶ τοῦτο, ob hanc rem, "for this cause," or have relation to the former verse; so here ἐν τοῦτῳ hath relation to ἐλπίδα ἔχων, and signifies, "having hope in this thing;" and in the other place it hath relation to ὄντες ἐν τῷ σκήνει, and signifies, "Being in this tabernacle, we groan."

[7] Ver. 17. After many years I came to bring alms.] The alms brought by him from Antioch (xi. 29, 30), cannot be here intended, they being brought by him and Barnabas, but seven years at most after his conversion; and nothing which he here relates touching purification, and concerning the Jews of Asia finding him in the temple, happening then: but only when he went up to Jerusalem with the alms and oblations of the churches of Macedonia and Achaia; then had he his vows upon him (xviii. 18), then did the Jews from Asia take hold of him in the temple (xxi. 17).

[8] Ver. 20. If they have found any evil doing in me while I stood before the council.] Hence it appears that he thought not he did evil in saying to Ananias, the high-priest, "God shall smite thee," &c.

[9] Ver. 22. Ἀκριβέστερον εἰδὼς τὰ περὶ τῆς ὁδοῦ.] It seems to me evident, that these words cannot admit the explication of Grotius and others, that Felix deferred them that he might have a more exact knowledge of Christianity: but that having his residence at Cæsarea, where Cornelius the centurion and his friends were converted, where Philip the evangelist dwelt, and where there were many disciples (xxi. 8. 16), he became thus acquainted with the way of Christianity.

23 And (then) he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, and to let him have liberty (from his bonds), and that he should forbid none of his acquaintance to minister or come unto him.

24 And after certain days, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess (who had left her husband Isis or Azizus, king of the Emisseni, and had married Felix, an uncircumcised person, contrary to the law), he sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ.

25 And as he (Paul) reasoned of [10] righteousness, temperance (Gr. justice and continence), and (of) judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; (and) when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.

26 He hoped also (being a taker of bribes) that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him (from his chain): wherefore he sent for him the oftener, and communed with him.

27 But [11] after two years (not of the government of Felix, ver. 10, but of St. Paul's imprisonment,) Porcius Festus came into Felix' room: and Felix, (being) willing to shew the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound.

[10] Ver. 25. Περὶ δικαιοσύνης καὶ ἐγκρατείας καὶ τοῦ κρίματος, Of justice and continency, and of the judgment to come.] Of this Felix, Tacitus* informs us, that per omnem sævitiam et libidinem jus regium servili ingenio exercuit, "he practised all cruelty and lust in his government," thinking that he might do† cuncta malefacta impunè, "all wickedness without punishment." And Josephus‡ informs us of Drusilla, that leaving her husband, king Isis, she married with a heathen, Felix, doing evil and transgressing, τὰ πάτρια νόμιμα, "the laws of her country:" to persons so unjust, Paul discourseth very appositely of justice and chastity, against which they had both so highly offended, as knowing that it was to little purpose to speak to them of Christianity till they forsook their sins: and discoursing also of "a judgment to come," where Felix could not hope to escape unpunished, as here he did, it is no wonder that Felix trembled; and that Drusilla did not so also, was an argument of her Jewish confidence, that she might then escape by being a daughter of Abraham.

[11] Ver. 27. Διετίας δὲ πληρωθείσης, But after two years.] Baronius is here mistaken, who conceives that these "two years" are the two first years of Nero's reign, whereas indeed he continued procurator, as Bishop Pearson saith, till the sixth year of Nero. The two years plainly relate to St. Paul's being taken by the Jews in the temple, and put into the castle by the chief captain Lysias, which was, saith the same bishop, in the fourth year of Nero.

CHAPTER XXV.

1 Now when Festus was come into the (government of the) province, after three days he ascended from Cæsarea to Jerusalem.

2 Then the high priest and the chief of the Jews informed him against Paul, and besought him,

3 And desired (Gr. desiring this) favour against him, that he would send for him to Jerusalem, (they) [1] laying wait in the way to kill him.

4 But Festus answered, that Paul should be kept at Cæsarea, and that he himself would depart shortly thither.

5 Let them therefore, said he, which among you are able, go down with me, and accuse this man, if there be any wickedness in him (for which he ought to be punished by the Roman laws).

6 And when he had tarried among them more than ten days, he went down (from Jerusalem) unto Cæsarea; and the next day sitting on the judgment seat (he) commanded Paul to be brought (before him).

7 And when he was come, the Jews which came down from Jerusalem stood round about, and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove.

8 While he answered for himself, (Gr. he apologizing, That) [2] neither against the law of the Jews (Acts xxviii. 17), neither against the temple (xxiv. 12), nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended any thing at all.

9 But Festus, (being) willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me?

10 Then said Paul, I stand at Cæsar's judgment seat, where I (being a Roman) ought to be judged: to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest; (they being now unable to prove any charge they lay against me, ver. 7.)

11 For if I be an offender (Gr. if indeed I have been unjust), or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof they accuse me (true, or punishable by death), [3] no man may deliver me unto them (who wait

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XXV.

[1] Ver. 3. Laying wait in the way to kill him.] We need not wonder that the high-priest and chief of the Jews should be thus bloody-minded against Paul, when about this time they were arming one against the other. For at the latter end of the procuratorship of Felix, Josephus* informs us, that there was, τοῖς ἀρχιερεῦσι στάσις πρὸς τοὺς ἱερεῖς, καὶ τοὺς πρώτους τοῦ πλήθους τῶν Ἱεροσολυμιτῶν, "a sedition betwixt the high-priests, and the priests, and chief men of Jerusalem, and that every one of them gathered a band of the most bold and seditious men, and became a leader of them; and that they reviled, and threw stones at one another;" and that the high-priests were so impudent, "as to send their servants to take away the tithe-corn of the priests, so that some of them perished for hunger."

* Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 6.

[2] Ver. 8. Neither against the law of the Jews.] For he had committed nothing against the customs of their fathers (xxviii. 17), and "to the Jews he became as a Jew" (1 Cor. ix. 20), nor against the temple, for he had not profaned it, nor raised any tumult in it (xxiv. 18), nor against Cæsar, whom he commanded all men to obey as God's ordinance (Rom. xiii.).

[3] Ver. 11. Οὐδείς με δύναται χαρίσασθαι αὐτοῖς, No man can deliver me to them.] i. e. No man can justly do it; I being not only an innocent person, having done them no wrong (ver. 10), but also a Roman, and therefore one who ought to be judged not by them, or their laws, but at the tribunal of Cæsar, by the Roman laws: so the world δύναται is often used to signify that only which may be lawfully done, as v. g. Exod. viii. 26, οὐ δύναται γενέσθαι οὕτω, "It is not meet so to do;" Deut. xii. 17, οὐ δυνήσῃ φάγειν, "Thou mayest not eat of it within thy gates;" Acts x. 47, τίς δύναται; "Who can forbid water?" (see the note on Mark ii. 19.)

for an opportunity to kill me, ver. 3). [4] I appeal unto Cæsar.

12 Then Festus, when he had [5] conferred with the council, answered, Hast thou (or, thou hast) appealed unto Cæsar? (and therefore) unto Cæsar shalt thou go.

13 And after certain days king Agrippa (tetrarch of Galilee) and Bernice (his sister) came unto Cæsarea to salute Festus.

14 And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king, saying, There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix:

15 About whom, when I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests and the elders of the Jews informed me, desiring to have judgment (of death, ver. 16) against him.

16 To whom I answered, (Gr. That) [6] it is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him.

17 Therefore, when they were come hither, without any delay on the morrow I sat on the judgment seat, and commanded the man to be brought forth.

18 Against whom when the accusers stood up, they brought none accusation of such things as I supposed (they would, no charge of sedition or of offence against the Roman laws):

19 But had certain questions against him of their own superstition, and of (i. e. concerning) one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive (again).

20 And because I doubted (whether I ought to judge) of such manner of questions, I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these matters.

21 But when Paul had appealed to be reserved unto the hearing of Augustus, I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cæsar.

22 Then Agrippa said unto Festus, I would also hear the man myself. To morrow, said he, thou shalt hear him.

23 And on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, [7] with great pomp (or retinue), and was entered into the place of hearing, with the chief captains, and principal men of the city, at Festus' commandment Paul was brought forth.

24 And Festus said, King Agrippa, and all (ye) men which are here present with us, ye see this man, about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with (or besought) me, both at Jerusalem, and also here, crying (out) that he ought not to live any longer.

25 But when I found that he had committed nothing worthy of death, and that he himself hath appealed to Augustus, I have determined to send him.

26 Of whom I have no certain thing to write unto my lord. Wherefore I have brought him forth before you, and specially before thee, O king Agrippa, that, after examination had (of him), I might have somewhat to write.

27 For it seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him.

[4] I appeal unto Cæsar.] Hence it appears that Paul owned even Nero for his prince and supreme governor upon earth; and, (2.) that in cases of necessity, Christians may have recourse even to heathen judicatures, especially when they have to do with persons who are aliens from the faith.

[5] Ver. 12. Συλλαλήσας μετὰ τοῦ συμβουλίου, Conferring with the council.] Not with the council of the Jews, as Chrysostom conceives; for they never would have advised him to admit of Paul's appeal, or to send him to Cæsar out of their reach; but as Grotius saith, with his own Roman council, which assisted him.

[6] Ver. 16. It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die before—he have his accusers face to face, &c.] Thus Philo* saith of them, that "they yielded themselves to be common judges, hearing equally the accusers and defendants, and condemning no man unheard." And Appian in Grotius saith the same: this also was the law of the Jews, to which Nicodemus appealed in the case of Christ, John vii. 51.

[7] Ver. 23. Μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, With great pomp.] i. e. With a great train of attendants, as the word signifies in Laertius, when he saith,* Bion had φαντασίαν ἀκολουθῆσαν αὐτῷ, "a great train of mariners following him;" or with great splendour, as when Athenion† was carried to Athens in a chair of state with silver and purple hangings, the people ran out to see the sight, no Roman ever entering the city, ἐν τοσαύτῃ φαντασίᾳ, "in so great splendour;" though after there is mention of many servants going before, and following after him, which makes for the first sense. See more instances of this acceptation of the word in Dr. Bois on the place. And to them add that of Bardesanes in Eusebius, that the Bastrian women appeared on horses adorned with gold and jewels, μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, "with great pomp," and with a train of young men and maidens attending them (Euseb. Præp. Evang. lib. vi. cap. 10, p. 276).

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Then Paul stretched forth the hand (to the people to keep silence), and (then he) answered for himself: (saying,)

2 [1] I think myself happy (i. e. I judge it no small advantage to me and my cause), king Agrippa, because (that) I shall answer for myself this day before thee touching all the things whereof I am accused of the Jews:

3 Especially because I know thee to be (not only a person of a good temper and sedate mind, but also) expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews: wherefore I beseech thee to hear me patiently.

4 My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, (where I was bred up at the feet of Gamaliel, xxii. 3,) know all Jews;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XXVI.

[1] Ver. 2. Ἡγημαι ἐμαυτὸν μακάριον, I count myself happy.] Though this phrase may signify no more than, "I look upon it as a considerable advantage," as when we call a lucky man a happy man, and so the word μακάριος and felix are often used in profane authors, and אשרי in the Hebrew, as when Leah calls her son Asher, Gen. xxx. 13, saying, "I am happy, for the daughters shall call me happy;" and Jeremy inquires, "Wherefore are all they happy," i. e. prosperous, "who deal very treacherously?" (see Ps. cxxvii. 5, cxxviii. 3, cxxxvii. 8, 9;) yet I believe the apostle here respects not any personal advantage, but the benefit Christianity might receive from what he was to say before a person so able to judge of it.

5 Which knew (this of) me from the beginning, if they would testify (the truth of me), that [2] after the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee.

6 [3] And now I stand and am judged for the hope (ἕστηκα κρινόμενος ἐπ' ἐλπίδι, I stand questioned about the hope) of the promise made of God unto our fathers:

(I saying that is accomplished by the coming of Jesus Christ; and that this is proved by the resurrection of him from the dead; they denying his resurrection, and therefore expecting the accomplishment of this promise by the coming of some other person to be their Messiah:)

[2] Ver. 5. Κατὰ τὴν ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν, &c. According to the exactest sect of our religion, I lived a pharisee.] That they were so according to the opinion of the Jews, Josephus* testifies, by saying, this was "a sect of the Jews, which was thought εἰσεβέστερον εἶναι τῶν ἄλλων, καὶ τοὺς νόμους ἀκριβέστερον ἀγηγεῖσθαι, "to be more pious than others, and more exact in the interpretation of their laws," that they did,† μέγα φρονοῦν ἐπ' ἐκριβάσει τοῦ πατρίου νόμου, "esteem highly of themselves for their exactness in the law," and that they were the sect οἱ περὶ τὰ πάτρια νόμιμα δοκοῦσι τῶν ἄλλων ἀκριβείᾳ διαφέρειν, "who seemed to excel others in their exact knowledge of the customs of their fathers,‡ καὶ οἱ δοκοῦντες μετ' ἀκριβείας ἐξηγεῖσθαι τὰ νόμιμα, and to be most exact in the interpretation of their laws:" and indeed, comparatively, they seem to have been the exactest of their celebrated sects; for the sadducees, by denying the resurrection, and all future punishments, took away the rewards of a virtuous, and gave liberty to a vicious life. The essenes, being Jews by nature, were guilty of a great schism, in separating themselves wholly from the worship of the temple, and of equal disobedience in not bringing their sacrifices§ to the temple, and of idolatry in making prayers or religious addresses‖ to the sun, as Josephus, who lived three years among them, testifies, if πρὸς αὐτὸν refers to ἥλιον· but seeing the same Josephus saith, that they were πρὸς τὸ θεῖον ἰδίως εὐσεβεῖς, "especially religious towards God," and brings the words following as a proof of that, I think these prayers were offered rather to God than to the sun (see the note on Col. ii. 22, 23).

[3] Ver. 6, 7. And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made to our fathers.] Why Paul here speaks as if he were questioned touching the article of the resurrection of the dead in general, see the note on xxiii. 6, and why he speaks of the twelve tribes, see note on James i. 1; but whereas he styles the resurrection, "the promise made to their fathers," and saith, the twelve tribes served God in expectation of it, this needs a little explication, because many deny that any such promise was made to the fathers, or can be found in the Old Testament. I therefore assert,

First, that it is evident from the history of the Maccabees and other writings, both sacred and profane, that the Jews then, and the pharisees afterward, did believe the resurrection of the body. Thus the second son saith, 2 Macc. vii. 9, "The King of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, unto everlasting life," εἰς αἰώνιον ἀναβίωσιν ζωῆς ἀναστήσει· the third and fourth express their hope to be "raised up by God to life again," ver. 11. 14, and the mother of them bids them not doubt "but the Creator of the world would give them breath and life again." That the pharisees believed this doctrine, we learn not only from Josephus, but from their satisfaction that Christ had put the sadducees to silence in that matter, Matt. xxii. 34, and for their stickling for St. Paul himself upon this declaration, that "he was called in question for the hope of the resurrection," Acts xxiii. 9.

Secondly, That they conceived their hope was built upon the covenant of God made with them, and the promise of God made to them, is also evident from their words; for the last of these seven martyrs is introduced, saying, "Our brethren are dead under God's covenant of everlasting life," ver. 36. Josephus* introduceth the mother of these seven children, comforting her dying sons with those words of Moses, "I kill, and I make alive," Deut. xxxii. 39, and "It is your life and length of days," ver. 47, and that of Solomon, Prov. iii. 18, "Wisdom is a tree of life to them that lay hold on her," and that of Ezekiel, xxxvii. 3, "Shall these dry bones live?"

Thirdly, They had just reason both from the law and prophets for this hope; from the law, for thence our Saviour proves the resurrection of the body, Matt. xxii. 31, 32 (see the note there). And that our Saviour did not there argue for the felicity of the souls of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob only, is evident from this, that he argues for something future, which should happen to them ὅταν ἀναστῶσι, "when they shall arise;" whereas in truth, and in the opinion of the Jews themselves, the souls of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were with God already: Josephus† saith, that "they who die for God, ζῶσι τῷ Θεῷ ὥσπερ Ἀβραὰμ, Ἰσαὰκ, καὶ Ἰακὼβ, καὶ πάντες οἱ πατριάρχαι, shall live with God, as do Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the patriarchs."

2. From the prophets; the words of Daniel being these, "Many of them that slept in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to everlasting confusion," xii. 2; where note, that though men in misery and affliction are sometimes said to sit, or dwell in the dust, Isa. xxvi. 19, xxvii. 1, Neh. iii. 18, yet οἱ καθεύδοντες, "they that sleep in the dust," doth always signify they that die, as Job vii. 21, xx. 11, xxi. 6, and hath no other sense in scripture. And, (2.) that though men that sit in the dust may be raised out of that afflicted, into a very comfortable and pleasant state, yet, seeing they must shortly die, they can in no propriety of speech be said to arise to life eternal. (3.) From the law and the prophets; for saith Paul, xxiv. 14, 15, "I worship the God of our fathers, believing all things that are written in the law and the prophets, having hope that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust;" and here, ver. 23, "I say nothing but what is contained in the law and the prophets, that Christ shall be the first ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν, of those that rise from the dead," plainly insinuating, that the resurrection of others after Christ was contained in the law and the prophets. Hence the apostle tells us, that the champions of the Jewish church all died in faith, in expectation of "a better resurrection," Heb. xi. 35. 39.

And, Lastly, That this hope was rightly built upon the covenant of God, that he would be "their God" (Gen. xvii. 7), is evident, for that to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is to be that God who will raise them from the dead, we learn from our Saviour's argument, Matt. xxii. 32, and that he was therefore "called their God," because "he had prepared for them a heavenly city," from Heb. xi. 15, and from his promise made to the spiritual seed of Abraham, according to those words of the apostle, Gal. iii. 29, "If ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed; and heirs according to the promise" (see the note there). And (3.) from the promise of entering into his rest, Heb. iv. 3. 9 (see the note there). And (4.) from the promise of a Messiah, it being one of their fundamental articles, that their "Messiah shall raise the dead, and bring them into paradise" (see Maimonides Expl. 10, Tract. Sanhedrin, p. 136, and Dr. Pocock's notes, p. 109, 110). And, lastly, this seems evident from the nature of the thing; for God being the Father of our spirits, which are immortal, and must live for ever, it is absurd to think his promises to the obedient should relate only to this present life, and yet he should engage them to be faithful to the death, and suffer here the worst of evils for his sake; since if they "had hope only in this life, they must of all men be most miserable" (1 Cor. xv. 19).

7 [4] Unto which promise (of the Messiah) our twelve tribes, instantly (or earnestly) serving God day and night, hope (yet) to come. For which hope's sake (περὶ ἧς ἐλπίδος; concerning which hope), king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews, (for saying, that Jesus, whom they have crucified, God hath raised from the dead, and that he is the hope of Israel, xxviii. 10, some of them saying, on the contrary, that there is no resurrection of the dead at all; others denying that Christ is risen from the dead.

8 Of the first I inquire,) Why should it be thought (τί κρίνεται; why is it judged) a thing incredible with you, that God (infinite in power and wisdom) should (be able to) raise the dead?

9 (As for the second, I was once of their opinion; for) I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth (i. e. in opposition to those who believed that he was the Christ, and that he was risen from the dead).

10 Which thing I also did in Jerusalem: and many of the saints (i. e. the Christians) did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests (and elders so to do, xxii. 5); and when they were put to death, I gave my voice against them (i. e. I, in the instance of St. Stephen, approved of the sentence, viii. 1).

11 And I punished them oft in every synagogue (where I found any of them), and (by these punishments) compelled them to blaspheme (the name of Jesus); and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them (forcing them to fly from Judea) even unto strange cities.

12 Whereupon as I went to Damascus (the metropolis of Syria) with authority and commission from the chief priests, (that if I found any of them there in the Jewish synagogues, I should bring them bound to Jerusalem, ix. 2,) 13 At midday, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me and (about) them which journeyed with me.

14 And when we were all fallen to the earth, I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? it is (or will be) hard for thee to kick against the pricks (i. e. to fight against God. See ix. 5).

15 And I said, Who art thou, Lord? And he said, I am Jesus (of Nazareth) whom thou persecutest.

16 But rise, and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen (now), and of those things in the which (i. e. for the discovery of which) I will appear unto thee;

17 (And in testifying of them, I will be with thee,) delivering thee from the people (of the Jews), and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee,

18 To open their (blind) eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and (an) inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me.

19 Whereupon, O king Agrippa, (having had this convincing testimony of the resurrection of this Jesus) [5] I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision:

20 But shewed first unto them of Damascus (where this vision happened), and (then to them) at Jerusalem, and (so) throughout all the coasts of Judæa, and then to the Gentiles, that they (of the Jews) should repent (of their great sin in crucifying this Jesus) and (should) turn to God, and do works meet for (Gr. meet works of) repentance.

21 For these causes the Jews caught me (as I was) in the temple, and went about to kill me (xxi. 31).

22 Having therefore obtained help of God, (according to the promise made by Jesus, ver. 17,) I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great (the resurrection of Jesus, and in this) saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come (to pass:

23 Viz.) [6] That Christ (the Messiah of the Jews) should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead (so as to return no more to death, Acts xiii. 34), and (that he) should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles.

24 And as he thus spake for himself, Festus said with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad (or transport thee).

25 But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus; but I speak forth the words of truth and soberness (or, of a sound mind).

26 For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also (πρὸς ὃν καὶ, to whom therefore) I speak freely (of them): for I am persuaded that none of these things (concerning the resurrection of Christ, or even my conversion,) are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner (but was of public cognizance).

27 King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets (to whose testimonies I appeal for the truth of Christ's sufferings and his resurrection? ver. 22, 23.) I know

[4] Ver. 7. To which promise, τὸ ἐνδεκάφυλον ἡμῶν, &c., our twelve tribes—hope to come.] That some of the twelve tribes remained in, and some of them returned to, the land of Israel, see proved, note on James i. 1. Why St. Paul saith he was questioned touching this hope of the resurrection in the general, when he was only questioned concerning the resurrection of Christ from the dead, see the chief reason, note on xxiv. 15. To which add, that St. Paul connects these things thus, because in the truth of the thing, and according to the testimony of the apostles, and even the sentiments of the Jews, the resurrection was to be effected by the Messiah, or by Jesus Christ, saying, that "God would raise us up by Jesus" (1 Thess. iv. 4), and that "God had appointed him to be the judge both of the quick and dead" (Acts x. 47), and had given assurance that he would judge all men by him, "in that he had raised him from the dead" (Acts xvii. 31), he being risen as "the first that should rise from the dead" (ver. 23 of this chapter), or "the first-fruits of them that sleep" (1 Cor. xv. 22). Hence it is so expressly noted, iv. 1, 2, that "the sadducees were grieved," not that the apostles declared that Jesus "was the Christ," or that he was risen, but that they taught "through Jesus the resurrection from the dead." Note also, that he represents this as the hope of the twelve tribes, though it was denied by the sadducees; because, as Josephus* informs us, εἰς ὀλίγους ἄνδρας οὖτος ὁ λόγος ἀφίκετο, they were but few, and these few, when they designed to be magistrates, were forced to profess the doctrine of the pharisees, διὰ τὸ μὴ ἄλλως ἀνέκτους γενέσθαι τοῖς πλήθεσιν, "seeing the common people would not otherwise have endured them." And that the apostle here spake with respect to the doctrine of the sadducees, appeareth from the following words, ver. 8, "Why should it be judged a thing incredible that God should raise the dead?" It being only the sect of the sadducees, which held this incredible, and that which did exceed even the power of God (Matt. xxii. 29).

[5] Ver. 19. I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision.] For, saith Grotius, though this vision gave him sufficient conviction of the truth, it left it in his power to obey or disobey it, as you will find it proved in the appendix to the sixth chapter of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians.

[6] Ver. 23. Εἰ παθητὸς ὁ Χριστὸς, That Christ hath suffered.] Τὸ εἰ, ἀντὶ τοῦ ὅτι,—ei here being put for ὅτι, that, saith Œcumenius (see note on 1 Tim. v. 10, Heb. iii. 11).

that thou believest (them; to them therefore I remit thee).

28 Then Agrippa said unto Paul, [7] Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.

29 And Paul said, I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds (i. e. as to faith in Christ, though not as to the bond I suffer for it).

30 And when he had thus spoken, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them:

31 And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds (by the Roman laws, by which he is to be judged).

32 Then said Agrippa unto Festus, This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar (to whose judgment he is therefore now to be reserved).

[7] Ver. 28. Ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις, &c. Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.] So Plato, ἔγνων οὖν καὶ περὶ ποιητῶν ἐν ὀλίγῳ τοῦτο, "I almost knew the same touching the poets;" and ἐπ' ὀλίγου is interpreted σχέδον, schol. Aristoph. p. 837. And that they, who interpret these words thus, "Wouldest thou in so little time persuade me to be a Christian?" must mistake, is evident from the following words of the apostle, "I would to God, that not only ἐν ὀλίγῳ, ἀλλ' ἐν πολλῷ, all that hear me were not almost only, but altogether such as I am."

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 And when it was determined that we should sail into Italy, they delivered Paul and certain other prisoners unto one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band (i. e. of the band of the legion of Augustus).

2 And entering into a ship of Adramyttium (a sea-town of Mysia), we launched (forth), meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia; [1] one Aristarchus, a Macedonian of Thessalonica (and a companion of Paul), being with us.

3 And the next day we touched at Sidon. And (there) Julius courteously entreated Paul, and gave him liberty to go unto his friends to refresh himself.

4 And when we had launched from thence, we sailed under Cyprus, because the winds were contrary (to us).

5 And when we had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, we came to Myra, a city of Lycia.

6 And there the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing into Italy; and he put us therein.

7 And when we had sailed slowly many days, and scarce were come over against Cnidus, the wind not suffering us (to go on directly), we sailed under Crete, over against (the promontory of) Salmone;

8 And, hardly passing (by) it, came unto a place which is called The fair havens; nigh whereunto was the city of Lasea.

9 Now when much time was spent, and when [2] sailing was now dangerous, because the (yearly) fast (of expiation) was now already past, Paul admonished them,

10 And said unto them, Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives.

11 Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and the owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul.

12 And because the haven was not commodious to winter in, the more part (of the passengers) advised (us) to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter; which (Phenice) is an haven of Crete, and lieth toward the south west and north west.

13 And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence (from that haven), [3] they sailed close by Crete.

14 But not long after there arose against it (the ship) [4] a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XXVII.

[1] Ver. 2. One Aristarchus.] He was a convert of Macedonia, who accompanied Paul in his travels from Macedonia to Jerusalem (Acts xix. 29, xx. 4), was a coadjutor with him in the work of the gospel (Philem. 24), went with him to Rome, and was there in bonds with him (Col. iv. 10), and is therefore here taken notice of as a companion of St. Paul's.

[2] Ver. 9. And sailing was now dangerous, διὰ τὸ καὶ τὴν νηστείαν ἤδη παρεληλυθέναι, because the fast was now already past.] That is, the annual fast of expiation for the sins of the people of Israel, which began on the tenth of the month Tisri, answering to the twenty-fifth of our September, was already past, and so the time of sailing became dangerous by reason of the winter, and of the Michaelmas flows which were then upon the sea. Thus Philo* informs us, that this feast of tabernacles was held μετὰ τὴν μετοπωρινὴν ἰσημερίαν, "after the winter equinoctial;" and the same feast of tabernacles, which was on the fifteenth of the same month, is said by Josephus† to be celebrated, τρεπομένου τὸ λοιπὸν τοῦ καιροῦ πρὸς τὴν χειμέριον ὥραν, "when it began to be winter:" and Philo‡ adds, that Flaccus was carried from Egypt to Rome, ἀρχομένου χειμῶνος, "at the beginning of winter, ἔδει γὰρ αὐτὸν καὶ τῶν ἐν θαλάττῃ φοβερῶν ἀπολαῦσαι, it being fit that he who had disturbed all things by land should be disturbed by the tempests of the sea;" and in his Legatio ad Flaccum,* he saith, that "the beginning of autumn was τελευταῖος πλοῦς τοῖς θαλαττεύουσιν, the last time for mariners to put to sea." See more of this in Dr. Hammond's note upon the place.

[3] Ver. 13. Ἆσσον παρελέγοντο τὴν Κρήτην, They sailed close by Crete.] The Vulgar has made this the proper name of a place, and indeed there was such a place near Troas and Mitylene, mentioned Acts xx. 13, 14, but that was at too wide a distance from Crete to be here mentioned; there were four other places of that name mentioned by Schmidius here, but none of them were near Crete; Stephanus, as he is cited by Lorinus, saith, Assos is πολίχνιον Κρήτης, "a little city of Crete;" but then Pliny informs us that it was not a sea-port, but situated in Mediterraneo, "in the Mediterranean," lib. iv. cap. 12, p. 213. Others therefore think this is an adverb, used by Homer, Hesiod, and Herodotus, to signify quickly, or near to the place, as Phavorinus and other grammarians say it doth, and so the whole should be rendered thus, "Loosing from the incommodious harbour," mentioned ver. 12, "with a favourable wind, propiùs præterlegebant Cretam, they sailed by Crete near to it."

[4] Ver. 14. Ἄνεμος τυφωνικός, ὁ καλούμενος Εὐροκλύδων, A tempestuous wind called Euroclydon.] Ventus typhonicus, saith Pliny,† "is a whirlwind," and the name of it here mentioned is thought by Grotius, Bochart, and Dr. Hammond, to be Εὐροακύλων, as it is rendered by the Vulgar, that is, the north-east wind, that being opposite to the south-west wind, mentioned ver. 12.

15 And when the ship was caught (i. e. driven along by it), and [5] could not bear up into (i. e. resist) the wind, we let her drive.

16 And running under a certain island which is called Clauda, we had much work to come by the boat (i. e. to draw it to us):

17 Which when they had taken up, they used helps, undergirding the ship (with ropes, to preserve it from splitting); and, fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, (they) strake sail, and so were driven.

18 And we being exceedingly tossed with a tempest, the next day they lightened the ship;

19 And the third day we cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship.

20 And when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved (or escape) was then taken away.

21 But after long abstinence Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and [6] not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained (i. e. sustained) this harm and loss.

22 And now I exhort you to be of good cheer: for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship (only).

23 For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose (apostle) I am, and whom I serve,

24 Saying, Fear not, Paul; thou must be brought before Cæsar: and, lo, God hath given thee (the life of) all them that sail with thee (provided they will hearken unto thee).

25 Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer: for I believe (in) God, (and therefore rest assured) that it shall be even as it was told me.

26 Howbeit we must be cast upon a certain island.

27 But (and) when the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, about midnight the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country;

28 And (they) sounded (with their plummet), and found it twenty fathoms (of water): and when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, and found it (the water) fifteen fathoms (deep).

29 Then fearing lest we should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day (that by the help of the light they might discern the shore).

30 And as the shipmen were about (Gr. and the shipmen seeking) to flee out of the ship, (to that end) when they had let down the boat into the sea, under colour as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship, 31 Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, [7] Except these (mariners) abide in the ship (to conduct it), ye cannot be saved.

32 Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

33 And while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat (i. e. he exhorted them to eat, till the day appearing, they might employ themselves otherwise), saying, [8] This day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing (i. e. observed no times of eating).

34 Wherefore I pray you to take some meat: for this is for your health (and let not the fear of death hinder you): for there shall not an hair fall from the head of any of you (ye shall not die).

35 And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat.

36 Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat.

37 And we were in all in the ship two hundred threescore and sixteen souls (i. e. persons).

38 And when they had eaten enough, they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea.

39 And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into

[5] Ver. 15. We could not, ἀντοφθαλμεῖν τῷ ἀνέμῳ, bear up against the wind.] So the word properly imports, but metaphorically, we could not resist or stand up against the force of it; so Polybius* saith of the Messenians, that they could not, ἀντοφθαλμεῖν πρὸς τὸ βάρος τῶν Λακεδαιμονίων, "resist the force of the Lacedemonians;" and that they could not πρὸς τὴν ὁρμὴν ἀντοφθαλμεῖν, "resist their impressions" (see more instances in Budæus and Bois).

[6] Ver. 21. Ἔδει μὲν μὴ ἀνάγεσθαι, You should not have loosed from Crete, κερδῆσαί τε τὴν ὕβριν ταύτην καὶ τὴν ζημίαν, to have gained this harm and loss.] Great industry is used here to carry off these words from their native sense, to make ὕβρις "signify a tempest, and κερδαίνειν, to escape, whereas there needeth no such artifice, for it was indeed ὕβρις, "an infamy" to them to be such unskilful mariners as to put to sea when the season of the year rendered their voyage so dangerous; and having been forced for their own safety to lighten the ship, and to cast out some of her lading and tackling to preserve themselves, they might well be said, κερδαίνειν τὴν ζημίαν ταύτην, jacturam hanc lucri in loco ponere, or "to count this loss their gain;" the particle μὴ, which here seems necessary to be repeated, shows that κερδαίνειν here cannot signify to escape, seeing the sense would then run thus, Ye should not have escaped the loss. Though, since κερδαίνειν seems to bear this sense in those words of Aristotle,† ᾧ καὶ λόγον ζημίαν ἣν λαβεῖν, τὸν τὸ τοιοῦτον κερδαίνοντα εὐτυχῆ φαμὲν, "We call him fortunate who escapes that punishment or damage he reasonably might have suffered;" in this sense the words run thus, "You should not have loosed from Crete, but stayed there, that you might have escaped this infamy and loss."

[7] Ver. 31. Except these abide in the ship ye cannot be saved.] This shows, as Grotius well notes, that what was said, ver. 21, was to be understood with this limitation, Si me audiatis, "If ye will hearken to my counsel;" and also with this proviso, that you will do that which is in your power, and God hath given you skill and ability to do; those that could swim being saved by swimming, and they that could not by getting upon boards and broken planks of the ship (ver. 43, 44): for in all promises in which God is said to give this or that, this must be understood, because he hath already given that which he hath given us faculties, or abilities and wisdom to obtain; so that we cannot want or fall short of it, unless we wilfully neglect to use the faculties which God hath given us for that end: they therefore having with them mariners, skilled in conducting of the ship, and power sufficient to retain them in it, St. Paul informs them, that God's promise of their safety was to be effective by their means, and belonged not to them who fully neglected them.

[8] Ver. 33. This is the fourteenth day that ye have continued fasting, having taken nothing.] It being impossible for them, without a miracle, to continue fasting fourteen days without eating any thing, some render the words thus, "You have continued expecting the fourteenth day as a critical day," which they were either to find safety in, or were not like to outlive; but as we read nothing of such a critical day, so the πολλὴ ἀσιτία, "long fasting," mentioned ver. 21, and continued till this day, proves the contrary. The meaning therefore seems to be this, that they had not set times of eating, but what they ate was seldom, little, and without order, or assembling together for that end. Thus Zetzes saith,* that Hesiod speaks thus, οὐδέ τι σῖτον ἤσθιον, "They ate no meat, διὰ τὸ μηδ' ἐν τοῖς καιροῖς τῶν τραπεζῶν—ἐσθίειν, because they ate not at meal-times."

the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship.

40 And when they had taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoised up the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore.

41 And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground; and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmoveable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves.

42 And the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out, and escape (justice).

43 But the centurion, (being) willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose; and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land:

44 And the rest (got), some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 And when they were escaped (to land), then they knew that the island was called [1] Melita (now Malta).

2 And the [2] barbarous people shewed us no little (or ordinary) kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us every one (into their houses), because of the present rain, and because of the cold.

3 And when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them (Gr. but Paul turning many sticks, and laying them) on the fire, there came [3] a viper out of (from) the heat, and fastened (herself) on his hand.

4 And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet (divine) vengeance suffereth not to live.

5 And he shook (Gr. then he shaking) off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm.

6 Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly: but after they had looked a great while (i. e. expected this long), and (yet) saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and (Gr. changing their minds, they) [4] said that he was a god.

7 (And) In the same quarters (Gr. in that place) were possessions (habitations) of the chief man (the governor) of the island, whose name was Publius; who received us (into them), and lodged us three days courteously.

8 And it came to pass, (Gr. so it was) that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux: to whom Paul entered in, and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him.

9 So when this was done, others also, which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed:

10 [5] Who also (Gr. and they) honoured us with many honours (or presented us with much provisions); and when we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary (for us).

11 And after three months we departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the isle, [6] whose sign was Castor and Pollux.

12 And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days.

13 And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium: and after one day the south wind blew, and we came the next day to [7] Puteoli:

14 Where we found (Christian) brethren, and were desired (I and Aristarchus) to tarry with them seven days: and so we went toward Rome.

15 And from thence, when the [8] brethren (of Rome) heard of us, they came to meet us (some) as far as Appii forum, and (others to) The three taverns: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XXVIII.

[1] Ver. 1. Μελίτη, The island was called Melita.] It is now called Malta, and is famous for the knights of Rhodes, and hath yet a place called "the arrival or haven of St. Paul;" that it was this African Malta, and not the other Illyrican Melite, or Melatine, see proved by Bochartus, Phaleg. par. iii. lib. i. cap. 26.

[2] Ver. 2. Οἱ δὲ βάρβαροι, The barbarous people.] Dr. Lightfoot thinks that these barbarians were Africans brought thither by the Carthaginians when they had possession of that island. Bochartus from Diodorus Siculus saith, they were Φοινίκων ἄποικος, "a colony of the Phœnicians," who sailing upon their merchandise to the western ocean,* καταφεύγῃν εἶχον ταύτην τὴν νῆσον εὐλίμενον οὖσαν, "made this island their refuge, for the convenience of its havens;" but the Phœnicians abounding in Africa, the difference betwixt these two opinions is not great. As for the word barbarous, Strabo† informs us, that it was the name πάντων ἐπὶ παχυστομοῦντων, "given to all that spake gross and rough language;" and that afterward the Greeks used it, ὡς ἐθνικῷ κοινῷ ὀνόματι ἀντιδιαιροῦντες πρὸς τοὺς Ἕλληνας, "as a common name by which they distinguished themselves from other nations." However, these barbarous people were taught humanity by the light of nature; they had their notions of divine justice, or nemesis, from tradition; they therefore did believe there was a providence which did protect and reward the good, and punish the evil-doer.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἔχιδνα, A viper.] Of this viper, see Bochart. Hieroz. par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 2.

[4] Ver. 6. They said he was a god.] Perhaps Hercules ἀλεξίκακος, who was worshipped in that island, saith Ptolemy,‡ and was one of the gods of the Phœnicians. Vide Lucian. de Deâ Syrâ, et Euseb. Chron. N. 142.

[5] Ver. 10. Πολλαῖς τιμαῖς ἐτίμησαν ἡμᾶς, Who honoured us with many honours.] i. e. "Gave us many gifts and provisions for our voyage:" so "What is thy name," saith Manoah to the angel, "that we may do thee honour?" Judg. xiii. 17, ἵνα δωρεὰν παραστῶμεν, "that we may tender thee a gift," saith Josephus. See this import of the word τιμὴ, note on 1 Tim. v. 3.

[6] Ver. 11. Παρασήμῳ Διοσκούροις, Whose sign was Castor and Pollux.] The picture of these two supposed sons of Jupiter was painted on the forepart of the ship, they being, in conjunction, thought propitious to mariners, and looked upon, when thus appearing, as a sign of a tempest ceasing; and yet in a ship having such an idolatrous image, St. Paul refuses not to sail, nor doth St. Luke refuse to use that name; these being used only as the name of the ship in which they sailed, as Dr. Hammond here notes.

[7] Ver. 13, 14. We came to Puteoli, where we found brethren.] It is not to be wondered that there should be Christians there, seeing Strabo† informs us, that it was ἐμπόριον μέγιστον, "a very great mart town, where there were havens made by art for the goodness of the river."

[8] Ver. 15. The brethren came to meet us as far as Appii Forum, and The Three Taverns.] These "three taverns" were nearer to Rome than Appii Forum, as appears from the words of Cicero to Atticus.‡ It is not to be wondered that

16 And when we came to Rome, the centurion delivered the (other) prisoners to the captain of the guard (i. e. of the prætorian band): [9] but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him.

17 And it came to pass, that after three days Paul called the chief of the Jews together: and when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people, or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans.

18 Who, when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of death in me.

19 But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar; not that I had ought to accuse my nation of.

20 For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that for (that Messiah and that resurrection which is) [10] the hope of Israel [11] I am bound with this chain.

21 And they said unto him, We neither received letters out of Judæa concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came (hither) shewed or spake any harm of thee.

22 But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest (of them who are called Nazarenes): for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against.

23 And when they had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging; [12] to whom he expounded and testified (that) the kingdom of God (was come), persuading them concerning Jesus (that he was the Christ), both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening.

24 And some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not.

25 And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken (Gr. Paul having spoken) one word (that nearly touched them, viz. ὅτι, That) well spake the Holy Ghost (i. e. rightly) by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers,

26 Saying, Go unto this people, and say (prophetically to them), [13] Hearing ye shall (will) hear, and shall (will) not understand; and seeing ye shall (will) see, and (will) not perceive:

27 For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing (Gr. they hear heavily with their ears), and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted (Gr. should turn themselves), and I should heal them.

28 Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it.

29 And when he had said these words, the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.

30 [14] And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, 31 Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.

there should be many Christians then at Rome, though perhaps no apostle had been there to preach to them. For since Christianity had now continued twenty-eight years from the ascension of our Saviour, and "the sound of it had gone through all the world," Rom. x. 18, it is reasonable to expect, that as it converted Cornelius and his kinsmen to the faith, so it should prevail on many other Romans in all places; and that Rome being the place to which, ob majorem principatum, "there was a general conflux from all places of the world,"* as both heathen and Christian writers have observed, it should be stocked with Christian brethren from all parts.

[9] Ver. 16. Τῷ δὲ Παύλῳ ἐπετράπη μένειν καθ' ἑαυτόν, But Paul was permitted to dwell by himself.] They who were sent prisoners out of the provinces were usually sent to the præfectus prætorii,† or general of the camp; it was therefore a favour that St. Paul was thus permitted to dwell in his own hired house; and this kindness perhaps was shown him, either through the testimony the centurion had given of him as a good and virtuous man, or by reason of a letter sent by Festus to Cæsar concerning him, that he was guilty of no crimes committed against the Roman laws.

[10] Ver. 20. For the hope of Israel.] i. e. Either for my faith in Jesus, the true Messiah, who is the hope of Israel; or for the hope of the resurrection of the dead (Acts xxvi. 6), which the Jews expected from the Messiah.

[11] I am bound with this chain.] Having a chain on his right hand, by which he was bound to the soldier that kept him; the chain being also on the soldier's left hand, and so long that they may go conveniently together. Thus Athenion* tells the men of Athens, that Mithridates had made Quintus Oppius ὀέσμιον, "a prisoner," or "one bound with a chain," as St. Paul often speaks, and had bound Manlius Aquilius ἁλύσει μακρᾷ, "with a long chain to one Bastarne, who being on horseback, dragged him along on foot, bound to him with a chain five cubits long." Sometimes, for greater security, they were bound to two soldiers, by two chains, one fastened to their right, the other to their left hand, as St. Peter was, Acts xii. 6, 7, and St. Paul, Acts xxi. 13.

[12] Ver. 23. (2.) Here we have the plain reason why St. Luke ends his history, because, as the bishop of Chester saith, St. Paul came not to Rome till the seventh of Nero, in the month of February; and in the ninth of Nero, i. e. after two years, he was set at liberty, and leaving Rome went into some other part of Italy, intending to go from thence into Judea (Heb. xiii. 23, 24), and so here ends St. Paul's stay at Rome, and with that St. Luke's history.

TO CHAP. II. VER. 27.

I know not one objection against that exposition which I have given of the phrase, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell;" only it may be said, that if this be the proper import of the words, we have no reason to believe that Christ descended into hell; for this can never be an article of Christian faith, unless it be either expressly or virtually delivered in that scripture which is the rule of faith: now it is certain that it is not delivered in any other place of scripture; not in those words of the apostle Paul, "He that ascended is the same that descended first into the lower parts of the earth" (Eph. iv. 9), for that phrase only signifies that Christ's body was buried in the earth, as Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Photius there say, not that his soul descended into hell; the phrase is plainly taken from the psalmist's words, "They that seek my soul to destroy it shall go into the lower parts of the earth," Ps. lxiii. 9, where if it signifies, "they shall go to hell," the foxes must go thither also; for the words following are, "They shall be a portion for foxes." Not from that passage of St. Peter, 1 Pet. iii. 19, "By which Spirit he went and preached to those in prison:" for as they in prison do not there signify those who were naturally dead, but only the gentiles dead in trespasses and sins, and by the prophet Isaiah thrice styled οἱ ἐν φυλακῇ, "they who are in prison;" so certain it is, the Spirit, by which he is said to go and preach to them, was not his own spirit, by separation of which from the body he was dead, but the Holy Spirit by which he was quickened; for which reason St. Austin, ep. 99, pronounceth of this place, that omninò ad inferos non pertineat, "it belongs not at all to Christ's descent into hell;" if then it cannot be proved from this place, it must be owned that it hath no sufficient ground at all in scripture.

To this I answer, first, in the words of Bishop Pearson, "That in the Aquileian creed, where this article was first expressed, in the fourth century, there was no mention of Christ's burial; but the words of their confession ran thus, 'Crucified under Pontius Pilate, he descended in inferna.' From whence there is no question but the observation of Ruffinus, who first expounded it, was most true, that though the Roman and oriental creeds had not these words, yet they had the sense of them in the word buried. It appeared therefore that the first intention of putting these words in the creed, was only to express the burial of our Saviour, or the descent of his body into the grave." Now doubtless the burial of Christ's body, or its descent into the grave, is an article of faith clearly delivered in holy scripture.

Secondly, I add, that the phrase καταβαίνειν, or κατελθεῖν εἰς ἅδην, or εἰς ᾅδου (τόπον), "to descend into hades," in the Old Testament and the apocryphal writers, still signifies, to go down into the grave, or sepulchre, and so cannot refer to the soul, but the body only; in this sense Jacob says, Gen. xxxvii. 35, καταβήσομαι εἰς ᾅδου, "I will go down to the grave to my son mourning:" so Numb. xvi. 30. 33, "If the earth swallow them up, καὶ καταβήσονται ζῶντες εἰς ᾅδου, and they go down alive into the pit, καὶ κατέβησαν εἰς ᾅδου, and they went down alive into the pit;" Job. vii. 9, ἐὰν ἄνθρωπος καταβῇ εἰς ᾅδην, "If a man go down to the grave he shall come up no more;" and, xvii. 16, καταβήσονται εἰς ᾅδην, "They shall go down to the grave, they shall rest in the dust;" Isa. xiv. 11, κατέβη εἰς ᾅδου ἡ δόξα σου, "Thy pomp is gone down to the grave, the worm is spread under thee;" and, ver. 19, "Thou shalt be as those that are dead, καταβαινόντων εἰς ᾅδου, like those that go down into the grave:" so Esth. xiii. 7, κατελθόντες εἰς ᾅδην, "They going down to the grave, we shall be free from trouble;" and Baruch iii. 19, "They are vanished, καὶ εἰς ᾅδου κατέβησαν, and gone down to the grave." And according to this sense, which Dr. Hammond and others put upon the words, "He continued for some time in the grave," it is also a plain article of Christian faith.

Thirdly, It is most certain, that though the creeds of the church were very numerous, yet in none of them was this descent into hell found till the close of the fourth century, when it was first put into the symbol of the church of Aquileia; for, saith the reverend Bishop Pearson, "It is not to be found in the rules of faith delivered by Irenæus, lib. i. cap. 2, by Origen, lib. περὶ Ἀρχῶν, in Proœm., or by Tertullian, adv. Praxeam, cap. 2, de Virg. Veland. cap. 1, de Præscrip. adv. Hær. cap. 13. It is not expressed in those creeds which were made by the councils as larger explications of the apostles' creed: not in the Nicene or Constantinopolitan; not in that of Ephesus or Chalcedon; not in those confessions made at Sardica, Antioch, Seleucia, Sirmium, &c. It is not mentioned in several confessions of faith delivered by particular persons; not in that of Eusebius Cæsariensis, presented to the council of Nice, Theodoret, lib. i. cap. 2, not in that of Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra, delivered to Pope Julius, Epiphan. Hær. lxxii., not in that of Arius and Euzoius, presented to Constantine, Socrat. lib. i. cap. 19, not in that of Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea, delivered in to the synod of Seleucia, Socrat. lib. ii. cap. 40, not in that of Eustathius, Theophylus, and Silvanus, sent to Liberius, Socrat. lib. iv. cap. 11. There is no mention of it in the creed of St. Basil, Trac. de Fide in Asceticis; in the creed of Epiphanius, in Ancorato, cap. 120, or of Gelasius, Damasus, Macarius, &c. It is not in the creed expounded by St. Cyril, though some have produced that creed to prove it; it is not in the creed expounded by St. Austin, de Fide et Symbolo; not in that de Symbolo ad Catechumenos, attributed to St. Augustine; not in that which is expounded by Maximus Taurinensis; not in that so often interpreted by Petrus Chrysologus; nor in that of the church of Antioch, delivered by Cassian, de Incarn. lib. vi.; neither is it to be seen in the MS. creeds set forth by the learned archbishop of Armagh. Indeed it is affirmed by Ruffinus, that in his time it was neither in the Roman nor the oriental creeds, Sciendum sanè est, quòd in ecclesiæ Romanæ symbolo non habetur additum, Descendit ad inferna, sed nec in orientis ecclesiis habetur hic sermo (Ruff. in Exposit. Symboli). 'It is certain therefore' (nor can we disprove it by any acknowledged evidence of antiquity), 'that the article of the descent into hell was not in the Roman, or any of the oriental creeds.'" Now had they conceived those creeds in which this article was wanting deficient in a necessary point of Christian doctrine, could they have styled all, or any of them, a perfect confession, comprising "the whole doctrine of faith, the whole of Christian doctrine, the comprehension and perfection of the Christian faith, a comprisal of all the articles of faith, a symbol that speaks of every part of faith, the faith sufficient for salvation, the life-giving, the saving faith, the saving knowledge, the only truth, which they received from the apostles, the only rule which admits of no correction, no addition, and no diminution, the only faith delivered by the church to be kept by her children?" Could they have told us, that "the most learned could believe no more, and the meanest Christian did believe no less; that they needed to know no more, that they desired to believe no more, that they believed this first, that nothing more was to be believed, that in it nothing was to be innovated?" Could they have said expressly, that "the apostles delivered in it whatsoever they thought necessary for all believers; and that they indited it to be a mark by which he should be known who preached Christ truly according to the rules of the apostles; and by producing of which it might be known" (saith Ruffinus) "whether he were an enemy or a companion." And, lastly, could their great and general councils have defined so often, that "it should be lawful for no man* ἑτέραν πίστιν προφέρειν, ἢ συγγράφειν, ἢ συντιθέναι, to introduce, write, or compose another faith besides that which was defined by the Nicene council?" These are the words of the third general council, where presided that Cyril of Alexandria, who, in his letter to John of Antioch, saith, "We by no means permit the faith defined, ἤγουν τὸ τῆς πίστεως σύμβολον, or the symbol of faith made by the holy fathers met at Nice, to be shaken by any; nor do we suffer ourselves or others to change one word, or transgress one syllable of what is there contained." This epistle, saith Mark, bishop of Ephesus, was read and approved by the fourth general council, which also decreed,† μηδενὶ μηδόλως ἐξεῖναι, προσθεῖναι τῷ συμβόλῳ τούτῳ ἢ ἀφελεῖν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, "that it should be lawful for no man to add any thing to this symbol, or take any thing from it, or to change it at all, or transform it into another symbol." Athanasius,* speaking of the synod of Ariminum, saith, that "the orthodox, and true servants of the Lord defined, that men should be contented with that faith alone, which was held at Nice, καὶ μηδὲν πλέον ἢ ἔλαττον παρ' ἐκείνην ζητεῖν καὶ φρονεῖν, and mind, and seek for nothing more or less, and that they deposed them who taught the contrary." And again, that "they should† μηδὲν πλέον ζητεῖν, seek for nothing more than what was confessed by the fathers at Nice." In the fifth general synod, John, patriarch of Constantinople, saith, "We have taken care,‡ τὸν Σεμέλιον τῆς πίστεως κατὰ τὴν ἁγίων πατέρων παράδοσιν ἀβράγῃ διαμένειν, that the foundation of faith might remain inviolate according to the tradition of the holy fathers." And this determination they declared was made,

First, Because this venerable symbol, saith the general council of Chalcedon,§ ἀρκεῖ εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν ἐντολῆς τῆς ἀληθείας, "sufficeth to the perfect knowledge of the truth;" and as the bishop of Ephesus well notes upon that place, "It is manifest,‖ ὅτι τῷ τελείῳ οὐδὲν ἐλλείπει, nothing is wanting to what is perfect;" they also said there was no need of adding any thing to it, "because it was sufficient,¶ εἰς ἀνατροπὴν πάσης ἀσεβοῦς αἱρέσεως, for the subversion of every wicked heresy, πᾶσαν ἀσεβεστάτην αἵρεσιν ἀνατρέψαι, to overthrow all the most ungodly heresies," and that it was στηλογραφία κατὰ πάσης αἱρέσεως, "an inscription as upon a pillar against all heresies."

Secondly, Because they would not alter the traditions they had received from their forefathers: "We," saith Cyril, in the general council of Ephesus, "have taken this care that nothing shall be added to, or altered in, the Nicene symbol, as being mindful of him that said, μὴ μέταιρε ὅρια αἰώνια ἃ ἔθεντο οἱ πατέρες σου, Remove not the ancient bounds which thy fathers have set."

Thirdly, Because they would not give occasion to any to suspect their faith as imperfect, or that any article of faith was wanting in the creeds already made. Thus the synod of Sardis decreed, μηδὲν ἔτι περὶ πίστεως γράφεσθαι, "that nothing more should be written touching the faith," but "that all should rest satisfied with the faith confessed by the Nicene fathers,†† διὰ τὸ μηδὲν αὐτῇ λείπειν, because it was deficient in nothing; and ἵνα μὴ ἡ Νεκαία γραφεῖσα ὡς ἀτελὴς οὖσα νομισθῇ, lest that of Nice should be esteemed imperfect," and a pretence should be given to as many as will to write and define touching the faith. The orthodox fathers in the council of Ariminum professed,‡‡ that they were "children of the Nicene fathers; but if," say they, "we should dare to take away any thing from what they have written, ἢ προσθεῖναί τι, or add any thing to it, we should be spurious children, κατήγοροι τῶν γεγεννηκότων γενόμενοι, as being accusers of what they did, who delivered τὸν ἀκριβῆ κανόνα τῆς πίστεως, an exact rule of faith." And again they declare it,§§ ἐπικίνδυνον, "a dangerous thing to add any thing to, or take any thing from, the Nicene creed, because if either of these things should be done, ἔσται τοῖς ἐχθροῖς ἄδεια τοῦ ποιεῖν ὅπερ βούλονται, the enemies would have liberty to do what they would." And Athanasius in his epistle‖‖ to John and Antiochus his presbyters commands them, τοὺς πλέον τι ταύτης ἢ ἔλαττον λαλεῖν θέλοντας ἀποστρέφειν, "to reject them who would say more or less than was contained in that creed." And the bishop of Ephesus well argues,¶¶ that we can suffer nothing by keeping to the same faith, which the divine fathers confessed and believed, since none but madmen can accuse it of imperfection.

Now hence it demonstratively follows, that these creeds which wanted this article must be a perfect digest of all things necessary to be believed now, and throughout all succeeding ages of the world; for how can it be necessary for any Christian to have more in his creed than the apostles and the Christians of the first four centuries had? May the churches of after ages make the narrow way to life more narrow than our Saviour, his apostles, and the fathers left it? When the whole church hath so expressly taught that this faith was sufficient for the perfect knowledge of the truth, that in it nothing was deficient, may others yet come after them, and by adding to them any other article remove the ancient bounds which our fathers have set? What reason can any man give, why any person should not be saved now by the same faith, which was sufficient for salvation in the first days of the apostles, and the first four centuries? Are we wiser than they? Or, are our doctors more learned, or more faithful? Is there another covenant made with the church since their days? Are other terms of salvation since made? Or, is God less merciful to us than he was to them? Is not the famous rule of Lirinensis this, Quod ab omnibus, quod ubique, quod semper? "That which was always, and every where believed of all, that is the rule of faith?" And must it not hence follow, that there can be no new article, no declaration obliging us to believe any thing, which was not always matter of the Christian faith? I conclude this head with the words of the judicious Dr. Barrow, "That the inserting this not only as an article distinct from Christ's death, burial, and continuance in the state of death, but also necessary to be believed as such, reflects upon the more ancient compilers, both of this and other breviaries of faith, as the Nicene and Constantinopolitan councils, Irenæus, Tertullian, &c., who left it out; which they should not have done, if it contain any thing highly material, and different from what is here otherwise expressed; whose credit is (as I conceive) more to be tendered than that of their juniors and followers, unknown to us; and so much more, for that in a matter of this kind defect or omission is less tolerable than any redundance of expression; which inconvenience may seem in a manner to reach higher, even to St. Paul himself, who, in the fifteenth chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, declaring the sum of what he both learned and taught concerning our Saviour's last grand performances, only mentions his death, burial, and resurrection; 'I delivered unto you first,' says he, 'that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he arose again the third day;' which enumeration of his we may, it seems, well acquiesce in, as sufficient and complete, and may thence, with great probability, infer, that no other descent of our Saviour into hell, besides his death and burial, was by him understood, or delivered in his catechetical discourses and preachings, as a point of faith."

Fourthly, I add, that these words may be admitted as a distinct article of faith, contained in the holy scriptures, in a very good sense, very agreeable to the word descent, and to the import of the word hades; for the scripture doth assure us, that the soul of the holy Jesus being separated from his body, went to paradise (Luke xxiii. 43): and thence it must descend into the grave or sepulchre to be united to his body, that it might be revived, and thus it may be truly said, "He was dead and buried, his soul descended afterward into hades," to be united to his body, and his body being thus revived, "he arose again the third day." Hence Grotius, on that place of St. Luke, saith, Qui symbolo fidei Christianæ ascripserunt κατέβη εἰς ᾅδου, Christi verbis optimè id tueri potuerunt, "They who added this article to the symbol of faith, may best defend themselves by those words:" nor, saith he, was this addition superfluous, seeing it proves the separate existence of the soul from the body, which many philosophers denied, and others doubted of.

ON

THE EPISTLES.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

GILBERT,

LORD BISHOP OF SALISBURY,

CHANCELLOR OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

My Lord,

Though, since I had the happiness to be admitted to an acquaintance with a person of your character and merit, and have had a large share of your favour, I have had obligations to make some public acknowledgment of it; yet had I never so fair an opportunity to do it, as this work, which now craves your lordship's acceptance, doth afford.

For, such a particular veneration and profound affection for the sacred records as your lordship, upon all occasions, shows, may not only render this attempt to add some light unto them acceptable, but even cover the imperfections that you must needs discover in it.

Since therefore it is customary to dedicate works of this nature to persons of great eminence in station, and more raised worth, I thought myself obliged to set forth these labours under your lordship's patronage, not only to express my gratitude, but also out of justice to that goodness which moved your lordship not only to peruse, but to approve this work, and to suggest many things, which otherwise would have been wanting to it.

I am here carried to say somewhat of the pattern you set us in an unwearied diligence in the discharge of your high function; but I know you cannot bear it, and that you had much rather see your clergy imitate you in this, than hear them commend you for it. I will therefore rather study from your example, how to do my own duty, than publish to the world how you do yours.

That God would still continue your good lordship as great a blessing as you are an honour to our church, and give you a sure but late enjoyment of celestial blessings, to which your soul, by its devout affections and indefatigable labours, still aspires, is the continual prayer of,

My Lord,

Your lordship's most obliged,

Most humble, and most obedient servant,

DANIEL WHITBY.

PREFACE

TO THE READER.

By way of preface to this work, some things there be of which I think fit to advertise the reader, and some things in which I shall beg his favour. And,

First, Because it may be useful to read the epistles of St. Paul, not in the order in which they are placed in our Bibles, but rather in that order of time in which they were written, I here think fit to place them according to that order, following the chronology of Bishop Pearson.

A. D. 52. The First Epistle to the Thessalonians.
A. D. 53. The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians.
A. D. 57. The First Epistle to the Corinthians.
The Epistle to the Galatians.
The Second Epistle to the Corinthians.
The Epistle to the Romans.
A. D. 62. The Epistle to the Ephesians.
The Epistle to the Philippians.
The Epistle to the Colossians.
The Epistle to Philemon.
A. D. 63. The Epistle to the Hebrews.
A. D. 65. The First Epistle to Timothy.
The Epistle to Titus.
A. D. 67. The Second Epistle to Timothy.

I have in the prefaces to these epistles given the reasons why I place the writing of them about the time assigned; only of the time of writing the Epistle to the Galatians I have there said nothing: I therefore here subjoin the reason why it is placed in the same year with the First Epistle to the Corinthians; viz. because St. Paul, at his first coming to Galatia, converts them to the Christian faith (Acts xvi. 6), at his second advent, he strengthens the brethren there (Acts xviii. 23), and in his epistle to them, he "marvels that they were so soon removed from him that called them to another gospel" (i. 6); it therefore could not be written long after he had been with them to strengthen them, which yet was before he had begun his three years' abode at Ephesus (Acts xix. 1. 31), at the very close of which the First Epistle to the Corinthians is supposed to have been written.

I desire the reader to take an estimate of the true date of these epistles, not from what may have slipped from me by the bye in a note, and hath been overlooked in the review of my papers, but from what is here set down, and is confirmed in the prefaces to these epistles.

The use that may be made of observing this order, I shall exemplify in two instances; of which the First is that of Demas, concerning which Dr. Lightfoot, Harm. p. 137, Beza, Esthius, and others say, that though he left Paul for a season, yet after he returned to him: because, say they, in two epistles, written after that to Timothy, in which he is said to have "forsaken him, having loved this present world" (2 Tim. iv. 10), he is reckoned among the coworkers with Paul, viz. Col. iv. 14, Philem. 24. But I have destroyed the foundation of this argument by establishing the opinion of the ancients, that the Second Epistle to Timothy was the last that St. Paul writ; and therefore the opinion of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, that he did μετὰ ταῦτα ῥαθυμεῖν, "afterward become slothful," and, saith Œcumenius, returned again, εἰς Ἑλληνισμόν, "to heathenism," is the more probable.

The second relates to that opinion of Grotius, that St. Paul spake for a time as if he had believed that the day of judgment might happen in his time, and that this is proved from 1 Cor. xv. 53, 2 Cor. v. 1—3. Whereas in his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, writ four years before those to the Corinthians, he saith what is sufficient to show he could not be of that opinion, or have declared any thing of that nature, and therefore could not afterward say any thing to that purpose (see the note on 1 Thess. iv. 15).

Secondly, I advertise the reader that this work has been retarded by the animadversions of Mr. Le Clerc upon the reverend and learned Dr. Hammond; which having perused, I found so many things said in favour of the Arians, and so many unworthy reflections upon the writings of St. Paul, that I chose rather to review and transcribe a considerable part of this work, than suffer those things to pass without an antidote. I acknowledge him to be a learned person, and honour his parts, and I know he cannot justly be offended with me, for being concerned for what I judge to be the truth, and for the honour of St. Paul, who has been somewhat rudely handled by him.

Thirdly, That I have been so often forced to differ from the same reverend person he attacks sometimes so indecently, is to be a matter of regret; but it hath been truly observed by others, that this great man had two darling opinions, viz. That the heresy of the Gnostics, and the destruction of Jerusalem, were the great things to which no little part of these epistles had relation; in which I have offered my reasons why I dissent from him, retaining still a just veneration for his parts and piety.

Lastly, I advertise him, that I have, as exactly as I could, made indexes, (1.) of all the Greek words and particles, (2.) of all the scripture phrases explained, and (3.) of all the material doctrines handled in these annotations.

The things in which I beg the reader's favour are,

First, That where he finds or thinks that I have erred either in point of doctrine, or the interpretation of the scriptures, as doubtless in the latter I have sometimes done, he would be so kind as to let me know my errors; which, upon conviction, I will not only own, but do it with all due acknowledgments and thankfulness to him who shall do that kind office to me.

Secondly, That if in any thing I seem to him to differ from the received doctrine of the church of England, as some may haply conceive I do in the annotations on the fifth chapter to the Romans; he would do me the justice to believe, that as he thinks I do, so I conceive I do not contradict her doctrine; and also would consider, that even the church of Rome allows her commentators to vary from the sense of any particular scripture on which they build their doctrines, provided they say nothing which doth expressly contradict them.

Thirdly, That if he should receive any advantage from this work, especially if it should be so happy as to suggest to him any thing which may render him the better man, he would give God the glory of it, and pray for,

His friend and servant,

DANIEL WHITBY.

THE

CONCERNING

THE DIVINE AUTHORITY OF THESE EPISTLES,

AND OF

THE TRUTH OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

CONTENTS.

§ I. That what is declared in these epistles as necessary to be believed or done, must be as necessary to be believed and done as what is contained in the gospels: that there are some things necessary to be believed and done, contained in these epistles, which are not clearly delivered in the holy gospels. §. II. The truth of the Christian religion proved, (1.) from what our Saviour promised and undertook, and what the apostles declared concerning the gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost. §. III. (2.) From plain matter of fact concerning this effusion of the Holy Ghost, and his miraculous gifts related in the epistles. §. IV. (3.) From the confident appeals of the apostles and primitive professors to those gifts, in their contests and debates with friends and adversaries, believers and rejecters of the Christian faith. §. V. (4.) From the prayers and thanksgivings made for them, the exhortations and directions given in these epistles concerning these miraculous gifts. §. VI. (5.) From what is required to be done and suffered by all Christians upon no other inducements or enjoyments, than what depended on the truth and certainty of these gifts. §. VII. (6.) That these epistles were indited whilst the apostles lived, and are proved genuine by more authentic arguments than can be produced for any book, writing, charter, law, or statute. The external arguments to prove them genuine. §. VIII. The internal arguments. §. IX. The truth of Christianity proved, (7.) from a particular consideration of these gifts; as (1.) the gift of healing. §. X. (2.) Of ejecting devils out of men, their temples, and their oracles. §. XI. (3.) From the gift of tongues. §. XII. (4.) Of prophecy. §. XIII. (5.) Of discerning spirits. §. XIV. That these extraordinary gifts were conferred upon all other churches not mentioned in these epistles. §. XV. That they continued in the two first ages of the church. §. XVI. What engagements the truth of Christianity lays upon us to live suitably to the rules delivered in those sacred records. The danger of those who neglect their salvation.

That these epistles were indited by divine assistance, and were received from the beginning, as epistles written by the conduct and assistance of the Spirit of God, I have endeavoured to evince in the general preface to the gospels.

§. I. Hence then it follows, that what the apostles have delivered in these epistles as necessary to be believed or done by Christians, must be as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, as what was personally taught by Christ himself, and is contained in the gospels; they being in the writing these epistles, the servants, apostles, ambassadors, and ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God; and the doctrines and precepts they delivered in them being the will, the mind, the truth, and the commandments of God.

Now evident it will be to any one who judiciously reads these epistles, that they contain some things delivered and done which were not clearly taught by Christ whilst he was on earth, nor are clearly delivered in the gospels; as we may learn,

First, From the doctrines contained in these epistles: as, v. g. that "by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Rom. xiii. 20); that both Jew and gentile, being under condemnation, were only to be "justified freely by God's grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God had set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood" (ver. 25); that "if righteousness came by the law, then was Christ dead in vain" (Gal. ii. 21); that "as many as are of the law are under the curse" (iii. 16); that "if we be circumcised, Christ shall profit us nothing; Christ is become of none effect to them that are under the law; they are fallen from grace" (v. 2. 5); that the law was to "continue only till the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 10), and was then to be disannulled "for the weakness and unprofitableness of it" (vii. 18); that "Christ is a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec" (v. 5, 6); that "he hath an unchangeable priesthood;" that he in heaven is continually "making intercession for us, and therefore is able to save us to the utmost" (vii. 24, 25): for all these doctrines clearly delivered in these epistles, are either not to be found at all, or not so clearly in the gospels.

Secondly, In these epistles only have we instructions about many great and necessary duties; as, v. g. that all our thanksgivings are to be offered up to God in the name of Christ (Eph. v. 8. 20, 1 Thess. v. 18, Heb. xiii. 14, 15): the duties which we owe to our civil governors are only hinted in these words of Christ, "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," but are enlarged upon in the Epistles to the Romans, ch. xiii., to Titus, iii. 1, and in the first Epistle of St. Peter, ii. 10. 17: so also are the duties we owe to our spiritual superiors taught more expressly in these epistles, Gal. vi. 6, 1 Thess. v. 12, 13, Heb. xiii. 17, 18. In fine, all the particular duties belonging to the relations of husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, are particularly handled in these epistles, Eph. v. 28. 33, vi. 1. 9, Col. iii. 11. 25, but are scarce ever mentioned in the gospels. But it may be objected, Obj. 1. That these epistles were written to those who were in the faith already, and so could not be designed to teach them the fundamental articles, and points necessary to salvation, or to instruct them in what was necessary to make them Christians.

Ans. It follows not from their being Christians already, that the apostles designed not to write to them in these epistles of any fundamental articles or points necessary to salvation, for it is very plain they do so. Paul, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xv. 3, writes of the resurrection of the dead, and of Christ's death and resurrection, as of doctrines necessary to be believed; and in his Epistle to the Galatians, of seeking justification by the works of the law as a thing opposite to, and destructive of, the grace of Christ. And since there were among them "false apostles, and deceitful workers," who corrupted the word, and "handled the word of God deceitfully" (2 Cor. ii. 17, iv. 2); yea, "corrupted their minds from the simplicity of Christ" (xi. 3), "turned them from him that called them to another gospel" (Gal. i. 6), sought to "deprive them of their reward" (Col. ii. 18, 19), and separate them from their head, Christ Jesus; who "put away a good conscience, and so make shipwreck of the faith" (1 Tim. ii. 19); whose "doctrine did spread as a gangrene, and overthrew the faith of some" (2 Tim. ii. 16); many "disputers of corrupt minds turning from the truth" (1 Tim. vi. 5), many "unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, who subverted whole houses, teaching things that they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake" (Tit. i. 10, 11): must not these things administer occasion to these sacred penmen to endeavour to establish and confirm them in the faith, by letting them they wrote to know the moment of those articles, the necessity of that faith, they had been taught, and the pernicious consequences of those practices to which they were seduced by these deceivers?

Again, seeing these writings were intended as a rule, not to them only to whom they were sent, but to all future ages of the church; and the Spirit expressly told them, that "in the latter days some should depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils" (1 Tim. iv. 1, 2); that "the time would come when they would not endure sound doctrine, but would turn their ears from the truth" (2 Tim. iv. 3, 4); when "false prophets should arise among them, bringing in damnable doctrines, whose pernicious ways many should follow" (2 Pet. ii. 1, 2); seeing they knew, that "after their departure grievous wolves would enter in, not sparing the flock" (Acts xx. 29, 30); must not all these considerations give just occasion to them to write of the great articles of Christian faith, and the necessary points of Christian conversation, to preserve them, and those that come after them, from their damnable doctrines and pernicious ways?

Moreover, this objection is therefore insignificant, because the apostles do inform us, that they found it "safe to write the same things" to them they had heard (Phil. iii. 1), "though they knew the truth, and were confirmed in it" (1 John ii. 21), "that they might have these things always in remembrance" (2 Pet. i. 12. 15); and that some who, for the time of their conversion, might have been great proficients in the faith, had yet "need to be taught again the first principles of the oracles of God" (Heb. v. 12).

Obj. 2. It also may be said, "that these epistles were writ upon particular occasions, and without those occasions had not been written; and so cannot be thought necessary to salvation."

Ans. This objection is neither exactly true of all the epistles, nor of all that is contained in them. Not of all the epistles, for it appears not that five of the general epistles, or that the Epistles to the Romans, to the Ephesians, and to the Hebrews, were writ upon particular occasions, unless the instructing men in the faith, and preserving them from heresy, or apostasy, be called particular occasions; and where this doth appear, it is very evident, that when the apostles had writ what they thought proper upon those occasions, they add many excellent rules of piety and virtue.

Ans. 2. Secondly, Were it exactly true that all the epistles were writ upon particular occasions, it will not follow hence that they were not directed in writing them by the Holy Spirit; or that they contain nothing necessary to be believed or done, in order to salvation: for the book of Psalms was not only writ upon particular occasions, but was also adapted to and fitted for them. The prophets were all sent by God to testify against, and call the Jews to repentance for sins committed in their time, to reform their manners, or comfort them in their distresses, that is, upon particular occasions; but will it therefore follow, that they did not write by the assistance of the Spirit of God, or that there is nothing in the Psalms, or in the prophets, which was necessary to be believed or practised by the Jews? Moreover, the Gospel of St. Luke was writ upon a particular occasion, viz. to instruct Theophilus in the certainty of the things he had been taught, and yet Epiphanius informs us, that "the Holy Ghost compelled and stimulated him to the work."* The Gospel of St. Mark was writ, say the ancients, at the request of the converts at Rome, and yet he writ it, saith Epiphanius, Πνέυματι ἁγίῳ ἐμπεφορημένος, "by the impulse of the Holy Ghost."† They also say, that St. John was importuned by all the Asiatics to write his gospel; and yet, saith Epiphanius, "the Holy Spirit did inwardly impel him to the writing of it."‡ The Gospel of St. Matthew, say they,§ was indited at the request of the Hebrews, that he might supply by writing the want of his presence with them. So that we see the writings of the apostles and evangelists may be occasionally penned, and yet be the products of the Holy Ghost, and contain things necessary to be believed and done.

Ans. 3. The particular occasions of some of these writings being the errors or waverings of Christians in fundamental points, as appears from the Epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, &c., and in others the busy industry of "false apostles and deceitful workers," to pervert them from the faith; that these epistles were writ on such occasions, is rather a presumption that they were writ upon some fundamental points, than that they could not be indited upon these occasions.

Moreover, great advantages arise from the occasional writing these epistles, and such as might induce the Holy Spirit to excite them to that work. For,

1. All the occasions which they took to write from the disorders, errors, heresies, and mistakes, which at first crept into the church, render these writings standing rules for the decision of like cases through all future ages.

2. The deportment of the apostles towards these erroneous persons and disorderly walkers, the care they used to recover, or inform them better, the zeal and tenderness they showed, and the rules they laid down in those cases, are excellent precedents and directions for all church governors, in cases of like nature.

3. All the occasions which they had to write for the direction of church governors, how to "behave themselves in the church of God," to give rules for the qualifications of those who were to be admitted to those offices, and touching their behaviour in them for the settlement of the affairs of the church, and the decent and regular performance of divine service, afford us standing rules of government, and of admitting and ordaining a succession of those divers orders in the church.

Lastly, These various occasions give us full assurance, that these epistles must be written in those very times when these disorders happened, and these errors crept into the church, and so take off all jealousy or suspicion that they were writings contrived in the following ages of the church; whereas, had their writings been only systems of theological doctrines and rules of life, which equally concerned all the ages of the church, it might have been more plausibly objected, that they were framed by some Christian bishops assembled for that end.

§ Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. iii. cap. 24. Chrys. Hom. 1 in Matt.

Obj. 3. But if all or most of the truths declared in these epistles were to be received and believed as fundamental articles, what then became of those Christians who were fallen asleep before those things in the epistles were revealed to them?

Ans. 1. This question equally concerns the evangelists, and more especially the Gospel of John, which, say the ancients, was either the last portion of scripture* which was written, or the last save his epistles, it being written after his return from his exile in Patmos to Ephesus; and so if it contain any fundamental articles, as necessary rules of life, what became of those Christians who died before they were revealed in it?

Ans. 2. We say not, that all or most of the truths, declared either in the epistles or gospels, are to be accounted fundamental or necessary articles; but only that some of them ought to be so accounted, especially those which have this character of a necessary article, or rule of life; that the denial or nonpractice of them, is represented as that which will endanger our salvation, or cut us off from the communion of the church.

Ans. 3. It is also a precarious supposition, that they who died before the epistles were writ to them, must die before the necessary things contained in them were revealed to them, seeing we know that the apostles writ the same things which they had preached before: and Luke writ his gospel, that Theophilus "might know the certainty of the things he had been taught;" and in those times of the effusion of the Spirit of wisdom and of knowledge, they had an unction which could teach them all things (1 John ii. 27), and so supply the unavoidable defects of outward teachers.

Obj. 4. The gospel was to be preached "to the poor," now they are not capable of sublime notions, nor can they comprehend mysterious reasonings.

Ans. 1. Whether this objection be intended against the necessity of believing the epistles of Paul only, or also the Gospel of John, is uncertain; the sublime notions and mysterious reasonings being common to both.

Ans. 2. There seemeth no necessity of troubling the poor common people with sublime notions, or mysterious reasonings, since both the ancient church and our own catechism declare that all the articles of Christian faith, common to all that bear that name, are comprised in the apostles' creed. For when the child saith, "My godfathers and my godmothers promised I should believe all the articles of the Christian faith," since it is evident they only stipulated for the belief of the apostles' creed in baptism, and when he doth rehearse those articles, he only doth rehearse the apostles' creed; it is certain that, by our catechism, it must be supposed to contain all the articles of the Christian faith.

Moreover, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to make such persons have a right conception of the spiritual nature and the attributes of God, or to enable them, by reason, to prove the providence of God, or the immortality of the soul; but yet these things must be proposed to them as articles or foundations of their faith. And as it is not very difficult for them to learn from scripture the truth of these things, so neither is it difficult from the same scripture to learn the truth of all the articles of the apostles' creed, even in that sense in which all Christian ages did receive them.

In a word: were these mechanics as much concerned for spirituals as they are for temporals, as many of them have attained to great proficiency in their respective arts, so might they also, by a Christian diligence, attain a competent proficiency in all the necessary articles of Christian faith, and in the rules of Christian piety, or of their duty to God and man. Now Christianity being "that doctrine which is after godliness" (Tit. i. 1), I believe nothing is proposed in it as necessary to be believed to salvation, which hath not some tendency to the promotion of true piety.

§. II. Having thus established the divine authority of these epistles, I shall endeavor to confirm the truth of the Christian faith from what is copiously delivered in them.

This is of absolute necessity in this degenerate age, in which all manner of impiety exceedingly abounds, and men are by their lives disposed and even concerned to question the truth of that religion, and of those writings, which threaten the severest punishments to their enormities; and so industriously, and even impudently, pursue this black design both in their discourses and writings.

Now to prove, against these enemies of revealed religion, the truth and certainty of the Christian faith, from what is copiously delivered in these epistles, it will be only requisite to show, that they contain a declaration of such things as could not possibly be true, but they must also be a full and convincing demonstration of the truth of the Christian faith, and that we have great reason to believe the truth of what is thus related by them. And,

(1.) That they contain a declaration of such things as could not possibly be true, but they must also be a full and convincing declaration of the truth of the Christian faith, the declaration they afford will be sufficient to evince: for it was this,

That the miraculous gifts and powerful operations of the Holy Ghost were plentifully afforded to them who preached the gospel to the world, and also to those Christian churches which received the gospel, and embraced the faith they taught.

By way of preface to what I shall collect from these epistles, concerning these miraculous gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost, it may deserve to be considered, that as the blessed Jesus "spake as never man spake," that is, delivered such just, holy, beneficial commands, as never were before made known to the world; and did, for confirmation of his doctrine, "the works that no other man did:" so was he pleased to lay the truth of his prophetic office upon such future and miraculous events, as no impostor that had any wit would undertake, or could be able to perform.

For the prophecies which he had undertaken to fulfil, and his own frequent declarations, made it necessary, (1.) That he should die a peculiar death, i. e. by being lifted up upon the cross. (2.) That in three days he should rise again. (3.) That after his resurrection his gospel should in the space of forty years, or before the destruction of Jerusalem, be propagated throughout the world, or the whole Roman empire. (4.) That, in order to the propagation of it, the Holy Ghost should plentifully be vouchsafed to his apostles, and should endue them with power from on high, and even enable them to do greater works than he himself had done (John xiv. 12).

At the great day of the feast of tabernacles, when all the Jews assembled at Jerusalem were joyful in their beth haschoavah, or "house of drawing water," and were (say their traditions) in expectation that the Holy Ghost should fall upon them, "Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink: he that believeth in me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living waters. This spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him should receive" (John vii. 37, 38). And at the close of his life on earth, he comforts his disciples with the promise of this Holy Ghost, who should continue with them, not only to "teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance;" but also to "convince the world of sin, because they believed not in him; and of his righteousness," who was so gloriously exalted to the right hand of God his Father; and of a future "judgment, because the prince of this world," being cast out from those he had possessed, "was judged" (John xvi. 7. 11). And after his resurrection he speaks thus to them: "Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you, for ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, not many days hence" (Luke xxiv. 49): "and ye shall receive power, after the Holy Ghost is come upon you, and ye shall be witnesses to me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and to the utmost parts of the earth" (Acts i. 8). And, lastly, to encourage others to believe the doctrine which they taught, he saith, "These signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues, they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." Now I desire to know whether any thing of this nature was ever undertaken, or laid as the foundation of their credit, by any other author of any doctrine, religion, sect, or heresy? Whether they ever made their own violent death and resurrection the foundation of their veracity; or promised the like powers and assistances, when they were risen, to those who should promote or should embrace their doctrine? Or, whether that which no man else durst undertake, was not performed by the holy Jesus so effectually, as that his doctrine presently prevailed, and was received throughout the world, in spite of all the opposition of men and devils made against it, and wrought in Christians such a lasting faith, as time and vice, though most concerned to do it, were never able to deface?

But though we have no instances of any other persons that made the like attempts, yet do our Lord's disciples tread exactly in their master's steps: for the first thing which they declared to the world was this, that the forerunner of their Lord, John the Baptist, when Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the regions about Jordan, and in particular the pharisees and sadducees, the publicans and soldiers, repaired to his baptism, declared in the audience of them all, There was one shortly to come after him, one that stood then among them, who would "baptize them with the Holy Ghost, and fire" (Matt. iii. 11). They also add, that their Lord both before and after his resurrection made a like promise to them, that he would suddenly send down upon them the Spirit promised by the Father, that they should "receive power from on high, and be baptized with the Holy Ghost," and so should be enabled to be witnesses of his resurrection and of his doctrine.

When these apostles had themselves received the Holy Ghost, they declare, they only had received what God had promised by the prophet Joel, saying, ii. 28, "It shall come to pass in the last days, I will pour my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams," Acts ii. 16, where note, that it is a received rule among the Jews, that "the last days," when used by the prophets, do signify the times of the Messiah (see the note on 1 Tim. iv. 1). Note also, that God of old revealed his will to his people by visions, dreams, and by prophetic revelations; so that this is a promise, that in the days of the Messiah God would miraculously pour his spirit upon men, and by that Spirit would enable them to prophesy, and to reveal his will to others. Yea, they say boldly to all that stood amazed at it, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost; for the promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." Here then we see how fully they both claim a promise of the Holy Ghost made by their Master to them, and also promise the like gift to them who should believe and be baptized in his name.

Now, these promises were actually performed and made good before they were indited, and put in the records of the Christian faith, the writings of the apostles and evangelists, or they were not; if all these promises were fulfilled before the records which contain them were indited, then had Christ sent the Holy Ghost upon the apostles, and given them the promise of the Father, then the believing Jews and gentiles were actually baptized with the Holy Ghost, and were enabled to "speak with tongues and prophesy;" and so Christ must have given certain demonstration both of his resurrection and his promises: but if these promises were not made good before these records were indited, then the whole story of John, and of the Acts of the Apostles, might easily have been convinced of falsehood by many thousand living witnesses, both in Jerusalem and in all other places where they lay the scene of this great dispensation; because they had heard nothing of these things, but from their histories: then, by the suffrage of our own evangelists, our Lord's forerunner must be a deceiver, when he declared the Messiah should "baptize them with the Holy Ghost and fire," whom he had then baptized with water; yea, in those very histories designed to convince others that Jesus was Christ, they must leave on record a promise, made not to them only, but to all believers, which never was fulfilled; the apostles also must be falsely introduced, saying, "This was that which was spoken by the prophet Joel," and with the greatest impudence promising that Holy Ghost to others which they themselves had not received; and surely then those Jews which after all Christ's miracles required a sign, would have required of the apostles, Where is that great effusion of the Spirit promised by the prophet Joel, which may assure us, that the times of the Messiah are now come? Where is that fiery baptism? Where are those rivers of spiritual water which your pretended Christ, and his forerunner, promised? Let us see them that we may believe him. With what face could St. Peter promise that Holy Ghost to others, upon faith in Christ, which they themselves had not received? or with what face could Luke declare he did this before such an audience, of which the greatest part must be then living, and so as with that promise to convert three thousand souls, had neither these converts, nor this audience, found any experience of that affair? In fine, if these apostles were not assisted with these miraculous powers of the Holy Ghost, they must be well assured, that he who had so oft engaged whilst he lived to send this Comforter to them, and at his resurrection promised, that in a few days they should all be baptized with the Holy Ghost, was a deceiver and false prophet; and then what motive could they have, or how could they conceive it a thing possible, to be his witnesses successfully to the uttermost parts of the earth? If by the coming of the Holy Ghost upon them they were indeed enabled to speak all languages; this gift was a sufficient confirmation of the resurrection and ascension of that Jesus who thus made good his promise to them. If they had no such gift, how was it possible that such unlearned persons, who only understood their mother-tongue, should discourse in their several languages to the Romans, Grecians, Egyptians, Persians, Armenians, Scythians, Indians, and all the barbarous nations of the world? And to what purpose was it for them to travel to those nations, to stand mute among them, or else to tell a story to them of which they could not understand one word? If, as the sacred story doth inform us, they preached the word "with demonstration of the spirit, and power;" if they "went forth preaching every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following, God also bearing witness to them by signs and miracles, and by divers powers and distributions of the Holy Ghost," then might they boldly say, "We are his witnesses of these things, and so is the Holy Ghost, which God hath given to those that obey him" (Acts v. 32). But if no such assistance was vouchsafed to them, what evidence could they give to the world that he had sent them on this errand? or how could they expect to reverse all the ancient laws and religions of the world, and to persuade all nations to own and worship, as the great Saviour of the world, one who was lately "hanged on a tree?" Their compliance therefore with this mission, and their continuance in this testimony under those dreadful miseries they suffered for it, as well as their incredible success in the propagation of the Christian faith to every nation, will not suffer us to doubt that they were well assured of the completion of this promise to them, and so of Christ's miraculous assistance of them.

§. III. Moreover, these epistles do almost severally contain sufficient proofs of the effusion of the Holy Ghost upon believers, and of his miraculous assistance of the first preachers of the Christian faith, and jointly do concur to make this evidence triumphant over infidelity. For,

First, Paul writes to the Romans thus; "I long to see you, that I may impart to you some spiritual gift, to the end you may be established," Rom. i. 11 (see the note there). "For I know," saith he, "that when I come to see you, I shall come in the fullness, τῆς εὐλογίας, of the blessing of the gospel of Christ," xv. 29, i. e. that fullness of spiritual gifts with which all Christians were blessed in Christ Jesus, according to that promise of the prophet Isaiah. xliv. 2, 3, "Fear not, Jacob my servant, and Israel whom I have chosen, for I will put my Spirit on thy seed, καὶ τὰς εὐλογίας μου, and my blessings on thy children." Now that the apostle came to Rome both scripture and the whole current of antiquity attest: either then he came to them with "the fullness of the blessings of the gospel of Christ," and did impart unto them those spiritual gifts which tended to confirm them in the Christian faith, or he did not: if he did impart them, he gave them an assured demonstration of the certainty of Christian faith; if he did not, he himself ministered to them a full objection against his own apostleship: for this must render him a vain boaster of things he was not able to perform, and a deceiver of the church of Rome. And why then doth he speak thus to them? "I have whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to God: for I will not dare to speak of any thing which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the gentiles obedient in word and deed, in the power of signs and wonders, and in the power of the Spirit of God" (Rom. xv. 17—19). These powers, saith he, have accompanied my preaching "from Jerusalem, round about unto Illyricum, and this grace," saith he, "was given to me of God, that I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the gentiles, ministering the gospel of God to them, that the offering up of the gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost." Where he compares himself, preaching the gospel, to the priest, conversant about his sacrifice, to prepare and fit it to be offered: the gentiles, dedicated by him to the service of God, are his sacrifice or oblation; the Holy Spirit conferred upon them is the libamen by which they are sanctified, and rendered acceptable to God. Moreover, the Epistle to the Romans must be false, or else it must be sent by the apostle before he had seen Rome, for it contained an intimation that he had not then seen them, a desire to see them, and a promise to come to them; for, saith he, "I make it my request to God, if by any means now at length I might have a prosperous journey, by the will of God, to come to you, for I long to see you" (Rom. i. 10, 11. 13): and, "I often purposed to come to you, but was let hitherto:" and again, "I have been much hindered from coming to you; having therefore a great desire these many years to come to you, whensoever I take my journey into Spain I will come to you" (xv. 22—24). It is also certain that he afterward did see them; for after his appeal to Cæsar he was sent to Rome, and lived there at least two years: he therefore must have sent his epistle to them, and they must have received it before that time. In a word, from those words in the close of this epistle, xv. 25, 26, "But now I go to Jerusalem to minister to the saints; for it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints that are at Jerusalem;" it is evident he writ this epistle before that collection was carried by him to Jerusalem in the third year of Nero, and sent it from Corinth, as the postscript saith. Note also, that this epistle is often cited by Clemens and Polycarp.

In his epistle to the church at Corinth, he declares, they were "enriched with all utterance and knowledge, or in tongues and prophecy," 1 Cor. i. 5 (see the note there): that they abounded "in every thing, in faith, in utterance, and knowledge" (2 Cor. viii. 7), "so that they came behind the other churches in no gift." His twelfth chapter begins thus: "Now concerning spiritual gifts, I would not have you ignorant, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed; and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit; and there are differences of administrations (or offices in the church to which these gifts belong), but (all proceeding from) the same Lord; and there are diversities of operations (performed by these gifted men), but it is the same God who worketh all (these operations) in (them) all" (ver. 4—6). Then he proceeds to the enumeration of the gifts conferred upon the officers and members of the church, viz. the gifts of knowledge, wisdom, prophecy, and the discerning of spirits; the gift of miracles, of faith, of healing, of divers kinds of tongues, and the interpretation of them; saying, that "God had placed in the church, first apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that, miracles; then gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues;" concluding with this question, "Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles? have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret? But covet earnestly the best gifts; and yet show I to you a more excellent way (even that of charity: for) though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I can remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing" (xiii. 1, 2): "for prophecies shall fail, and tongues shall cease, and knowledge shall be done away, but charity never faileth" (ver. 8).

Now this epistle must be indited and sent to them whilst their schisms, contentions, and disorders remained, because it was designed to correct them, and whilst Paul was in a capacity to come to them, and so before his bonds, because he saith, "The rest will I set in order when I come" (xi. 34). Hence, after notice given of their schisms, contentions, and divisions, he adds, "These things have I in a figure transferred to myself and Apollos for your sakes, that you might learn in us, not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up, for one against another" (iv. 6), saying, "I have also sent Timotheus to you, and I myself will come unto you shortly;" and then he puts the question to them thus, "What will you? that I come unto you with a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?" (ver. 16—19.) Ch. v. he commands them to "put away" from them, and to "deliver up to Satan," the incestuous person; and that accordingly they did so, his second epistle shows, in which he writes to them to forgive and comfort him (2 Cor. ii. 7).

Moreover, he writes part of this epistle in answer to some questions they had sent to him, which required a speedy answer, as being cases of conscience which concerned their conversation, their freedom from idolatry, and the preservation of weak Christians. The rest of his epistle is spent in endeavouring to correct their great disorders about the sacrament, their church assemblies, and the use of their spiritual gifts (ch. xi. and xiv.), and their great error touching the resurrection (ch. xv.), and to give directions touching their charity (ch. xvi.). All which things required speedy instructions; and that this epistle was sent accordingly, the words do manifest: "When I come, whomsoever you shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality to Jerusalem; and if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me" (xvi. 3, 4). "Now I will come to you when I pass through Macedonia, and it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you" (ver. 5, 6). I say, hence it is evident, that they soon received this epistle; for they accordingly made their collections, with which he went up to Jerusalem; and in this second epistle he apologizes for not coming to them, according to those words, i. 16, 17. Moreover, the second epistle is a strong confirmation of the first, in which he hath pointed out unto them those disorders which he would have remedied, those things he would have done before his coming; for then in this he tells them their obedience to his former letter had filled him with joy and comfort, that his instructions concerning the incestuous person had found so good effect, that they approved themselves to be clear in this matter, and caused him to rejoice, that he could have such confidence in them in all things (ch. vii.). Whence it is evident, that they had not only then received, but in some measure had complied with the instructions given them in that epistle.

Add to this, that Clemens Romanus, with the whole church of Rome, in an epistle sent to the Corinthians, not many years after this of Paul's was written, declares (§. 2), that there was πλήρης ἁγίου Πνεύματος ἔγχυσις ἐπὶ πάντας, "a full effusion of the Holy Ghost upon them all;" and that Paul "had written to them an epistle touching their divisions about himself" (§. 37), and Cephas, and Apollos; which is a great confirmation, both of the early knowledge and use of this epistle in the church, as also of the truth of what Paul relateth in it, touching the gifts of the Holy Ghost conferred upon them.

In his Epistle to the Galatians, he compares himself with the "chief of the apostles," and the pillars of the church, declaring, that "he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, was as efficacious in him towards the gentiles;" that these pillars saw, and "perceived by the grace given to him, that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to him, as the gospel of the circumcision was to Peter, and therefore gave to him the right hand of fellowship; that he with Barnabas should go to the gentiles, and they to the circumcision" (ii. 7—9); adding, for consolation to the gentiles, that "Christ had redeemed them from the curse of the law, that the blessing of Abraham might come upon the gentiles, that they might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (iii. 13); and also, that "through the Spirit they did wait for the hope of righteousness by faith" (v. 5).

Now in this epistle, he mentions the "life that he now lived in the flesh" (ii. 20), his fear of them, his desire to see them, and the desire of the false brethren to exclude him from any share in their affections, and the persecutions he yet suffered in the flesh (iii. 2, iv. 11. 15. 17. 20, v. 11): and he concludes it thus: "You see how large a letter I have written to you with my own hand;" and "from henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus" (vi. 11. 17). Which words demonstrate, that this epistle must be written and sent to them whilst he lived, after he had suffered greatly for the name of Christ. Moreover, the occasion of it shows it must be written by Paul himself; for it was written upon occasion of some Judaizers, who preached up the necessity of circumcising the gentiles, and requiring them to observe the law of Moses, and who endeavoured to disparage this apostle, who had taught the contrary, as inferior to other apostles, and his doctrine as contrary to what they taught: now these distempers requiring a speedy remedy, we cannot doubt but the apostle sent this epistle to them, as soon as he had heard how they had been perverted from the sincerity of the faith. It is also cited by Polycarp ad Philip. §. 5.

In his Epistle to the Ephesians, he tells them, he was made "a minister of the gospel according to the gift of the grace of God given to him, by the effectual working of his power" (iii. 7); and, that "to every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ:" for "he ascending up on high, gave gifts unto men:" and "he gave some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers;" and that all these had their spiritual gifts (see the note on iv. 7, 8. 11): and adds, that "after they believed they were sealed with the Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, till the redemption of the purchased possession" (i. 13, 14).

Now in this epistle he makes mention of his bonds, and of his being then "an ambassador in bonds" (vi. 20), saying, "I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you gentiles; I Paul, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you" (iii. 1, iv. 1). This epistle therefore must be sent unto them whilst he was in bonds at Rome; and so it must be sent unto them Anno Christi 62, since Paul was set at liberty the next year. He also adds, that it was sent by Tychicus, whom he sent to them on purpose, to make known his affairs whilst he abode at Rome, and begs their prayers for courage in making known the mystery of the gospel, whilst he was thus in bonds (vi. 19—22).

Moreover, this epistle is cited by Clemens (Ep. ad Cor. §. 46), about six years after the writing of it. It is twice cited by Polycarp (§. 1. 12), in his epistle to the Philippians. Ignatius (§. 12), in his epistle to the Ephesians, saith, that Paul in his whole epistle made mention of them in Christ Jesus: so early was this epistle known to and read by the Christians.

In his Epistle to the Colossians, he declares, that he had laboured in preaching the gospel to them, according to the energy of him that wrought with him, ἐν δυνάμει, by a mighty power (i. 29), and saith, "Let the word of God dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs" (iii. 16). Now in this epistle he saith, that he then "rejoiced in the afflictions which he suffered for them" (i. 24). He also speaks of his "solicitude for them, and those of Laodicea, and for as many as had not seen his face in Christ," of his "salutation with his own hand" (iv. 18), and of his bonds, and of his sending Tychicus and Onesimus, to give them an account of his affairs, and of the salutations of many brethren. He therefore, and they also, must be all alive when this epistle was sent to them.

In his Epistle to the Thessalonians, he testifies, his gospel "came unto them not in word only, but in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance," and that "they received the word with much affliction," but yet "with joy of the Holy Ghost" (1 Thess. i. 5, 6); and for this he appeals to their own experience, adding these words, "Ye know what manner of persons we were amongst you for your sakes;" whence he infers, that he that despised his admonitions, "despised not man, but God, who also had given them this Holy Spirit" (iv. 8).

Now in this epistle he speaks of his absence from them, and of his great desire to see them (1 Thess. ii. 17), of his solicitude for their steadfastness under their sufferings (iii. 5, 6), his sending Timothy to give him an account of it, his comfort when he heard that they stood firm; and maketh Sylvanus and Timotheus his associates in sending it. This epistle therefore must be written whilst both they and he were living, and it is cited by Polycarp in his epistle to the Philippians, §. 11.

In his epistle to Titus, he speaks thus (iii. 5, 6): "According to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Now, of epistles thus written to particular persons, I think it needless to prove that they were written whilst both Paul and they were living, and were not sent unto them from, or in another world: though that is here sufficiently proved from these words, iii. 12, "When I shall send Artemas to thee, or Tychicus, be diligent to come to me to Nicopolis."

Arg. 2. §. IV. Secondly, That God vouchsafed to the professors and first propagators of the Christian faith these admirable powers, and various distributions of the Holy Ghost, is farther evident from this consideration, that the apostles, in all their contests and debates with friends and adversaries, believers and rejecters of the Christian faith, false apostles, antichrists, corrupters of it, and apostates from it, appeal with greatest confidence to these miraculous operations and distributions of the Holy Ghost.

In their first controversy, touching the resurrection of our Lord, gainsaid by the rulers of the Jews, Peter speaks thus to them: "The God of our fathers hath raised up Jesus whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted to his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and remission of sins. And we are his witnesses of these things; and so is also that Holy Ghost whom God hath given to them that obey him" (Acts v. 30—32). And again, "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are all witnesses: therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shown forth this, which ye now see and hear" (Acts ii. 32, 33). Now evident it is, this plea could not be offered to convince these rulers, by an appeal to their own senses, without the highest impudence and plain confusion of their cause, had there been no effusion of the Holy Ghost imparted to the apostles who attested, and believers which embraced this faith; nor could it have been published in that generation, and recorded by Luke, as made by the apostles before so great an auditory, if it had been false, so many witnesses being then living to confute this story.

Secondly, The next dispute arose betwixt Peter and the converts of the circumcision, accusing him as a transgressor, for eating and conversing with Cornelius, and other uncircumcised persons; in which case his apology runs thus: "As I began to speak, the Holy Ghost fell on them, as upon us at the beginning. Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as he did to us, who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ; what was I, that I could withstand God?" (Acts xi. 15—17.) And thus he puts to silence the zealots for the circumcision, men too tenacious of their rites, too zealous for the law, to be satisfied with any thing that did not carry with it a convincing evidence.

Thirdly, A third contest arose at Antioch, where some believing Jews contended, that it was necessary to circumcise the gentile converts, and to command them to observe the law of Moses: this vain pretension Peter baffles by this argument, that "God who knows the hearts bare them witness," that whilst uncircumcised they were accepted with him, by "giving them the Holy Ghost even as he did to us, and putting no difference betwixt them and us, purifying their hearts by faith;" and thence concluding that by endeavouring to "put this yoke" on the believing gentiles, they would "tempt," that is, would disbelieve, and even oppose themselves to that God who had vouchsafed so clear a demonstration of his acceptance of them, not being circumcised (Acts xv. 8, 9). Hence also the whole college of the apostles write unto them thus: "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost to lay upon you no such burden" (ver. 28).

Fourthly, When the zealots had infected the church of the Galatians with the pernicious doctrine of the necessity of circumcision, and of the observation of the law of Moses, Paul writes thus to them: "O foolish Galatians! who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth? This only would I learn of you: Received ye the Spirit (in his miraculous gifts and operations) by (obedience to) the works of the law, or by hearing of faith?" (Gal. iii. 1, 2.) If by the latter, as ye know ye did, this is a demonstration that your justification and acceptance with God, is the fruit of faith in Christ, not of obedience to the law of Moses; this the apostle reassumes, saying, "He that ministereth the Spirit to you, and worketh miracles among you, doth he it by (virtue of your obedience to) the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" We see then this was the chief argument which carried the cause in the council at Jerusalem, and which is urged by Paul to confirm the Galatians in the truth, and silence those who laboured to prevail upon them to admit of circumcision, and the observance of the law of Moses: this confirmation therefore of the truth of the Christian faith was such, as none concerned to do it then were able to gainsay, much less can any now find reason to doubt of it.

In the epistle to the church of Corinth, he is even forced to prove the truth of his apostleship, against those "false apostles and deceitful workers" who had set up against him, and for the satisfaction of those Corinthians who "sought a proof of Jesus Christ speaking in him" (2 Cor. xiii. 3). He therefore justifies and confirms it by declaring that "the signs of an apostle been have wrought among them (by him), in all patience, in signs and wonders, and in mighty deeds" (2 Cor. xii. 12); that he "was not a whit behind the very chief of the apostles" in these gifts (xi. 5, 6); that both he and his fellow-labourers among them approved themselves as the ministers of Christ "by the Holy Ghost, by the word of truth, and by the power of God" (vi. 6, 7); that they to whom he writ were "manifestly declared to be his letters commendatory," as being "the epistle of Christ ministered by him, written not with ink, but by the Spirit of the living God" (ch. iii.), and that they "came behind the other churches in no gift" (xii. 13). To the Galatians infected with the like distemper, he declares, that "he who wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, was as efficacious in him towards the gentiles;" and that this was so manifest even to the chief of the apostles, that they were, by the grace vouchsafed to him, convinced that the gospel of the uncircumcision was by Christ committed to his charge.

Some there seem to have been among the members of the church of Corinth, who "had not the knowledge of the truth," and who even questioned whether "Christ was among them or not:" to them he testified that the church of Corinth "came behind the other churches in no gift," and that by this "the testimony of Christ was confirmed among them" (1 Cor. i. 5—7, see the note there): that the word he preached was not delivered "in the enticing words of human wisdom," but "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, that their faith might not seem to consist in the wisdom of man, but in the power of the Holy Ghost" (ii. 4, 5); that God had established them in Christ, by "giving the earnest of his Spirit in their hearts" (2 Cor. i. 21, 22). Now for the truth of what he thus delivers, he makes a solemn and religious appeal to their own hearts and consciences, saying, "We are made manifest to God, and we trust also we are made manifest in your own consciences" (2 Cor. v. 11), "for we are not as many who corrupt the word, but as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ" (ii. 17). "We do by manifestation of the truth commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (iv. 2). Yea, he appeals to all prophets and spiritual men among them, not only for the truth, but also for the divine authority of his epistles, saying, "If any man be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I write unto you are the commandments of God" (1 Cor. vii. 3. 7). Now evident it is, that arguments of this nature neither could be urged by this apostle without confusion to his cause, and the impairing of his credit; nor, being offered, could prevail upon the church of Achaia, and other churches, to own him as a true apostle, and his epistles as "the commandments of the Lord," had not the matter of fact, on which they did entirely depend, been incontestable. For, had these things been false, or questionable, they whom he styleth "false apostles and deceitful workers," must have been able to reply, that he himself, in his appeal to the miraculous operations of the Holy Ghost for confirmation of his doctrine and apostleship, must have been guilty of that very crime he laid to their charge; and all the churches to which he had directed these epistles, must rather be confirmed in the suspicions they had entertained against him, than wrought off from them by these vain pretences and false surmises of those distributions of the Holy Spirit, of which they had found no experience, and had received no convincing evidence.

The believing Jews lay under two dangerous distempers: the first was that which James takes notice of in his epistle, viz. that faith alone would be sufficient to save them without works; and upon this the heretics mentioned by Irenæus,* and others, grounded their licentious doctrines, that they might live as they listed, they being not to be saved by good works, but by faith only. The second was a proneness to apotasy, or falling back from the faith to Judaism, to avoid persecution: and this the heretics also so far improved, as to declare it lawful, in times of persecution, to commit idolatry,† and to deny Christ with the mouth. Now in opposition to the first assertion, Paul, in his second chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, shows the necessity of taking more abundant heed to the precepts of Christianity, as being all confirmed by signs and miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost; and therefore puts to them the question thus: "If the word spoken by angels was firm, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed to us by them that heard it; God also bearing them witness both with signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will?" In opposition to their proneness to apostasy, he declares it a most dreadful thing to fall from the profession of the Christian faith, after they had received such strong convictions of it, by those gifts of the Holy Ghost they had received with it: for, saith he, "It is impossible for them who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and yet fall away, to be renewed to repentance, seeing they crucify again the Son of God, and put him to an open shame" (vi. 4—6, see the note there). Again to such "there remains no more sacrifice for sin, but a fearful looking-for of judgment and fiery indignation, seeing they trample under foot the Son of God, and count the blood of the covenant, by which they were sanctified, an unholy thing, and reproach the Spirit of grace" (x. 26. 29, see the note there). Now visible it is, that the foundation of both these arguments depends upon the certainty of this matter, that God confirmed the truth of the doctrine delivered by Christ and his apostles, by divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, and that Christians then were made partakers of those gifts.

Lastly, Against the seductions of the antichrists and the deceivers, which were then crept into the church, St. John fortifies the believers with these words: "These things have I written concerning them that deceive you. But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any one teach you, but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie; and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him" (1 John ii. 26, 27). And again, "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; for many false prophets are gone out into the world. By this ye shall know the Spirit of God; every spirit that confesseth Jesus Christ coming in the flesh, is of God; and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God" (iv. 1—3, see the strength of the argument in the note there). And it is the Spirit that witnesseth that Jesus is the Son of God, "because the Spirit is truth" (v. 6). "He that believeth in the Son of God hath the witness in himself" (ver. 10). Now when men thus lay claim in their epistles to their converts to the power of God co-operating with them in the promotion of the faith, declaring, that he testified to the truth of what they preached, by divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost; when they confidently speak of an unction of the Spirit of truth abiding in them, of which they to whom they write were made partakers, and by this very argument endeavour to convince them what a dreadful thing it would be for them to despise the admonitions they had given, or to neglect the great salvation they had tendered to them; there can remain no cause of doubting of the truth of these assertions, especially when they to whom they write not only do continue steadfast in the faith, but also do admit those writings, which assert these things, as divine records, and the word of God.

And this argument will be much strengthened from this consideration, that the primitive professors, in all the conflicts with Jews, gentiles, magicians, false prophets, heretics, and false pretenders to be the successors of the apostles, still used this argument from the miraculous operations the Christians then performed, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost they still received and exercised, as an effectual confirmation of the Christian faith, and a sufficient confutation of the pretences of their adversaries; v. g.

First, From this they prove to the Jews, that God had deserted them, and was now graciously present with the Christian assemblies; that the Shechinah and prophetic gifts,* which were long since departed from them, were still extant among Christians, and exercised both by men and women.

Secondly, Hence they triumph over the heathen deities,† that by the name of Jesus such cures were wrought on the diseased, as none of their supposed deities could perform; and that they by this name expelled those devils which their conjurors could not expel, and forced them to confess they were evil spirits.

Thirdly, They triumph over the Simonians‡ and Gnostics, the magicians and heretics of their times, by the same arguments, that they could neither cure all diseases, nor expel all kinds of devils, as the Christians did.

Fourthly, By this they, after the example of Paul, 1 Cor. xii. 3, and of John, 1 John iv. 1—3, taught Christians to distinguish§ betwixt true and false prophets; and by this they confuted the Montanists, because they left no succession of prophets, which yet continued in the true church of Christ. Some heretics finding themselves unable even to pretend to such a gift of prophecy as the gospel of John had promised, and the epistles of Paul mentioned, rejected both that gospel and those epistles. Now these, saith Irenæus,‖ are unhappy men, qui gratiam prophetiæ repellunt ab ecclesiâ, "who go about to exclude the grace of prophecy from the church, and thereby make themselves false prophets," i. e. assertors of things in God's name which they have not received from him.

Lastly, As for the true successors of the apostles, Irenæus¶ informs us, that cum successione apostolatûs charisma veritatis certum secundûm beneplacitum Patris acceperunt, "with their succession they received the gift of truth;" and hence infers, that ubi igitur charismata Domini posita sunt, ibi discere oportet veritatem, "where therefore these gifts of the Lord are placed, there the truth is to be learned."

Arg. 3. §. V. The prayers and the thanksgivings made for these divine assistances, the charges the apostles gave concerning them, the exhortations and directions which they send to Christian governors and churches, touching these gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost, are a convincing demonstration that they were frequent, and notoriously exercised in the church of God. For instance, "I thank my God," saith the apostle to the church of Corinth, "for the grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ, that in every thing ye are enriched by him in all utterance and all knowledge (or in tongues and prophecy), so that ye come behind the other churches in no gift" (1 Cor. i. 5—7, see the note there). He begins his epistle to the church of Ephesus thus: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ" (Eph. i. 3, see the note there): praying that the same God would "give to them the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him" (ver. 17). He prays for the Romans, that they may "abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost" (xv. 13), and for his Colossians, that "they may be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding" (i. 9).

Having convened the Asiatic bishops, he requires them to "take heed to the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers" (Acts xx. 28). To the church of Rome he speaks thus: "Having therefore, χαρίσματα διάφορα, different gifts, whether prophecy, let us do it according to the proportion of faith; or ministering, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching," Rom. xii. 6—8 (see the note there). He exhorts the Ephesians and Colossians, to be filled with the Spirit, speaking to themselves in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, Eph. v. 18, 19, Col. iii. 16. Two of his admonitions to his Thessalonians are conceived in these words, "Quench not the Holy Spirit, despise not prophecy," 1 Thess. v. 19, 20. To his son Timothy he speaks thus: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy," 1 Tim. iv. 14. And in his second epistle, "Stir up the gift that is in thee by the putting on of my hands," i. 6, for, saith he, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, love, and wisdom," ver. 7. He exhorts him also to "keep the good thing committed to him by the Holy Ghost that dwelleth in him," ver. 14. Now, in these epistles he speaks of himself as a prisoner and a sufferer for the cause of Christ, saying, "Be not thou ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, nor of me his prisoner;" he tells him, he was "ready to be offered, and the time of his departure was at hand;" informs him, that "Demas had forsaken him," and desires him "when he came to him to bring Mark with him," 2 Tim. i. 8, ii. 8. 10, iv. 6. 10—12. He speaks of Hymenæus and Alexander, "whom he had delivered up to Satan," and saith, "These things I write unto thee, hoping to come to thee shortly," 1 Tim. i. 20, iii. 14. All which are evident proofs that these epistles must be sent to Timothy, whilst Paul was living and was a prisoner at Rome. Peter advertiseth the converted Jews that the gospel was preached to them "by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven;" and he gives these instructions to them for the use of their extraordinary gifts: "As every man hath received the gift, so let him minister, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God; if any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ," Pet. iv. 10, 11. Now the messenger by which he sent this epistle, and the salutations in the close of it, show that it was written whilst Mark and Sylvanus were living.

But the great scene of these directions and admonitions lies in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, where he exhorts them to "covet earnestly" spiritual gifts, but chiefly that of prophecy, 1 Cor. xiv. 1, to "covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues," ver. 39. Moreover, he directs them in the due exercise of these spiritual gifts after this manner: "Forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church," ver. 12; "Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret," ver. 13. And again, "If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at most by three, and let one interpret; but if there be no interpreter, let him keep silent in the church," ver. 27, 28; "Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the others judge," ver. 29; "If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace: for ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted," ver. 30, 31. In the same chapter he chides them for using these spiritual gifts without profit to the hearer, and so as to breed confusion in the church. "How is it," saith he, "brethren, that when you come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation? Let all things be done to edifying," ver. 26, declaring that, by using tongues not understood in the assembly, they would give the infidel and unbeliever occasion to say they were mad, ver. 23. "But if all prophesy," saith he, "and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all; he is judged of all: and thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth," ver. 24, 25. So notorious are these gifts supposed to be, not only to the saint, but to the infidel, and so powerful for his conversion. Now had these great apostles given thanks for gifts conferred upon these churches which they never had enjoyed; had they exhorted them to desire, and earnestly to covet, to stir up and excel in gifts they never had, and which were not imparted to any members of the church; had they given these grave directions and solemn charges, touching those gifts of prophecy and revelation, of tongues and the interpretation of them, which never had been exercised in that of Corinth, or any other Christian church; had they severely chid them for abusing those gifts they never had, and shown themselves so much concerned to correct an abuse of which they were incapable, as having not the use of what they are supposed to abuse; had they condemned the murmurings of them who had them in a less, the boastings of them who had them in a higher measure, by such inquiries as these, "What hast thou which thou hast not received? And if thou hast received (them), wherefore dost thou boast, as if thou hadst not received (them)?" 1 Cor. iv. 7 (see the note there); and showing the necessity that there should be such a diversity of gifts and operations in the body, 1 Cor. xii. 14—27, and done and said all this without a just foundation; this must have rendered those epistles, in which these passages are contained, the matter of their derision and disdain, rather than worthy to be owned as the oracles of God: and those apostles which indited them must rather have been esteemed by them brain-sick enthusiasts, than men inspired by the Spirit of God.

Since then these writings generally were received as divine records by all Christians, and by those very churches to which they were indited, it must be certain, that in all these assertions they contain matter of unquestionable truth, and only spake of those spiritual gifts of which these churches had a full experience; there being, saith Clemens Romanus in his epistle writ soon after to them, "a full effusion of the Holy Ghost" upon them all.

Arg. 4. §. VI. This will still be more evident, if we consider what Christianity the author and the propagators of it required of all that would embrace the Christian faith, and what were the encouragements they tendered as the chief inducements so to hope, believe, and act, or suffer, as Christianity required. And,

First, They call upon all Christians to take up the cross of Christ daily, and for his sake to "forsake father and mother, wife and children, goods and relations, and even life itself," declaring that without this they cannot be Christ's disciples, Luke xiv. 26, 27, informing them, that "all that will live godly must suffer persecution," 2 Tim. iii. 12, that "through many tribulations they must enter into the kingdom of God," Acts iv. 22, that they were "called to suffer," and were "appointed to this very thing," 1 Thess. iii. 3, 4, 1 Pet. ii. 21. Accordingly we find that the Corinthians were "partakers with them of their sufferings," 2 Cor. i. 7; that the Galatians had "suffered many things," Gal. iii. 4; that to the Philippians it was "given, not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his sake," Phil. i. 29; that Paul commends the Colossians for their steadfastness in the faith under all their persecutions, i. 11, and prays they "may be strengthened with all might, according to his glorious gospel, to all patience, and long-suffering, with joyfulness," ii. 5. He saith the Thessalonians suffered the same from their countrymen, as did the believing Jews from theirs, 1 Thess. ii. 14; that he sent Timothy to "stablish and to comfort them concerning their faith," and to exhort them "not to be moved at those afflictions to which they were appointed," iii. 34; adding that he "gloried in them in the churches of God, for their patience and faith in all their persecutions," 2 Thess. i. 4. In his Epistle to the Hebrews he saith, they "suffered a great fight of afflictions, partly while they were made a gazing-stock, both by reproaches and afflictions, and partly whilst they became companions of them who were so used," and that they "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods;" and he exhorts them "not to cast away their confidence," because they had "need of patience," Heb. x. 32. 36, and, after the example of that cloud of witnesses which he had set before them, to run their Christian race with patience, xii. 1. Peter tells the same believing Jews, they "were in heaviness for a season through manifold temptations," 1 Pet. i. 6, desiring them "not to think it strange concerning the fiery trial which was come to try them," iv. 12. These tribulations they exhort them to endure with faith and courage, patience and perseverance, joy and triumph; and yet the only thing they offer them to raise this joy and comfort, engage them to this perseverance, and to support them under their fiery trials, is the promise, or the actual vouchsafement, of the Holy Ghost helping their infirmities, that as they were partakers of the sufferings of the apostles, so should they be also of their consolations, 2 Cor. i. 7, that "if they suffered for the name of Christ, happy were they; for the Spirit of glory and of God should rest upon them," 1 Pet. iv. 14. This, say they, ye have found, "for you became followers of the Lord, and of us, having received the word with much affliction, and with joy of the Holy Ghost," 1 Thess. i. 6, and may well suffer hardships as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, for God "hath not given us the spirit of fear, but τῆς δυνάμεως, of courage," to endure, of that love which casts out fear, and of that prudence which will instruct us how to bear or to escape them (2 Tim. i. 7). Now if this promise was sensibly made good to them under these afflictions, they by it did receive an earnest of the truth of Christian faith, and an assurance of God's concern to comfort and reward their Christian patience in his cause. But if under these fiery trials they found no sensible experience of the Holy Ghost thus helping their infirmities, no inward joys, supports, and consolations of the promised Comforter, what reason had they to continue to "take joyfully the spoiling their goods," the loss of credit, life, and all their worldly comforts, for the profession of that faith, which had so palpably deceived them in the chief motive which it offered to engage them to suffer for the name of Christ, or for the truth and divine authority of those epistles which contained these apparent falsehoods?

This argument may be enforced from the consideration of the multitude of Christian martyrs in the first three ages of the church, all which could have no other motive thus to suffer, but this promised assistance of the Holy Ghost at present, and the assurance which this earnest of the Spirit gave them of an eternal state of happiness hereafter; and so if they had no experience of this assistance under sufferings, and no assurance of such an "earnest of the Spirit" in their hearts, must suffer all these dreadful things without just ground or motive, which even a heathen Cicero* doth represent as a thing impossible to be performed, the hardness of some Jewish zealots, and some deluded Christian sects, in suffering, being no instance to the contrary; for though they mistake the application of this future happiness, in prospect of which they thus endure, to themselves, the principle upon which they suffer is undisputably true, and owned even by

* Nullo igitur modo fieri potest ut quisquam tanti æstimet æquitatem et fidem, ut ejus conservandæ causâ nullum supplicium recuset, nisi iis rebus assensus sit, quæ falsæ esse non possunt. Acad. Quæst. lib. ii. n. 25, 26.

Epicurus himself; Ut voluptates omittantur majorum voluptatum adipiscendarum causâ, aut dolores suscipiantur majorum dolorum effugiendorum gratiâ, "That we should part with our temporal enjoyments for a season here, for a better and more enduring substance, and suffer these light afflictions, which are for a moment, that we may escape more lasting and intolerable torments," this being only, saith Torquatus,* the choice which the wise men of Epicurus ought to make. In a word, the manner of their sufferings doth give us full assurance that the assistance of the Holy Ghost, which Christ and his apostles promised to the true believers, was accordingly vouchsafed to the Christian martyrs and confessors, they being enabled to bear the greatest sufferings, not only with undaunted courage, "putting off the body," saith Origen,† "more cheerfully than a philosopher would put off his coat;" "despising death," saith Lucian,‡ "and willingly submitting to it;" but with great joy and exultation, being "strengthened to all long-suffering with joyfulness" (Col. ii. 5), "rejoicing§ in tribulations, counting it all joy when they fell into divers temptations, and happy when they did endure them" (James i. 3. 12), and rejoicing when they were in heaviness through manifold afflictions" (1 Pet. i. 6): yea, sometimes with‖ miraculous experience of consolations under all their sufferings, causing this joy and gladness in them; and sometimes with a perfect freedom from all sense of pain under the most afflicting torments; as in the case of the evangelist St. John,¶ and of Blandina, these sufferings not being able to extort from them one complaint or groan.†† Now this being done as well by‡‡ children and the weakest sex, by the idiot as well as by the wisest sages, gives a full demonstration of the truth of that assertion of Eusebius,§§ That the love of Christ, the hopes of immortality, and the Spirit of the Father, inspired them with this courage; for what else could create such joys and exultations, or suggest such comforts and supports under the sharpest trials? What could procure to them a freedom from the sense of pain, under the greatest torments and most intolerable burdens to flesh and blood?

Secondly, Again, they engage all Christians in the most difficult acts of self-denial and mortification of all carnal lusts, in the cutting off their right hands, and the plucking out their eyes; in patience under, and the forgiveness of, the greatest injuries; in love and charity to the worst of enemies, in temperance as to the pleasures and honours of this present life, in a deadness to the world, and the enjoyments of it, in piety, and purity, and heavenly mindedness, because they cannot otherwise be Christ's disciples, cannot be worthy of him (Matt. x. 37, 38), they cannot enter into his kingdom (Matt. xix. 23, 24), but shall hereafter be denied and rejected by him (Matt. x. 32, 33). Now what could such threats signify to them who were not, by his miracles, and by experience "of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," convinced that he was indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world? The encouragement they give them to be thus steadfast, immoveable, always abounding in the fear of the Lord, was only the promise of a future and unseen reward, chiefly to be enjoyed after the resurrection of the body, which, to the sadducees among the Jews, and the whole race of heathen sages, seemed a thing incredible. It is therefore not to be imagined, that so many myriads of Christian converts should renounce all the pleasures of the flesh, all the gratifications of this present world, all their old rites, religions, customs, evil habits, submit to all this self-denial and mortification, only to be partakers of these unseen blessings after the resurrection, without a full assurance that they hereafter should enjoy them. Now the only assurance which the apostles and holy scriptures did afford them of this blessed resurrection and eternal happiness, was the miracles by which their doctrine was confirmed, the powers, gifts, and distributions of the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to them. After the dissolution of this body, we expect, say they, "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; we groan, desiring to be clothed with this house from heaven, that mortality may be swallowed up of life. Now he that hath wrought this hope within us, is that God who hath given us the earnest of the Spirit" (2 Cor. v. 1—5). And again, "The promises of God are all yea and amen," or sure and certain, "in Jesus Christ;" and "He who hath established us with you," in expectation of them, "is that God who hath anointed us, and sealed us, and given the earnest of his Spirit in our hearts" (2 Cor. i. 20, 21); enabling us by the Spirit "to wait for the adoption, even the redemption of the body" (Rom. viii. 23), adding, that by the Spirit of adoption they were enabled to cry, "Abba, Father" (ver. 15, 16); that he "bore witness with their spirits that they were the sons of God," the love of God being "shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, which God had given them" (Gal. iv. 6). Hence they continually declare, that "after they believed, they were sealed with the Spirit of promise, which was the earnest of their inheritance till the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 13, 14); that by him they were "sealed up to the day of redemption" (iv. 30), that he was the "earnest of their future inheritance;" that they were not ashamed of their hope, they "through the Spirit waiting for the hope of righteousness" (Gal. v. 5), and "abounding in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 13). Hence he is styled by John, "the witness of God within" them, 1 John v. 19, and by this, saith he, do we Christians know, that "God abideth in us, and we in him," even "by the Spirit that he hath given us," iv. 13. By all which sayings it appears, that if these things were true, they to whom this assistance of the Holy Spirit was vouchsafed, must be very sensible of his dwelling and his acting in them; that they could plainly know they had this "unction from the Holy One," and could be hence assured of the divine affection to them, and of their future hopes and expectations, since otherwise he could be no such seal, pledge, and earnest to them, and no such witness of God within them, and no such confirmation of their faith, or token of the love of God: and if these things were false, and they had no such sensible experience of the good Spirit acting and abiding in them, if they found no such confirmation of their hopes from any inward testimony and outward operations of the Holy Ghost, they must not only have no certain ground or motive to assure them of that future recompense, which was the only reason which could induce them to embrace and to continue steadfast in the Christian faith, but must have a convincing demonstration that the whole doctrine of Christianity depended on a false suggestion of such a sensible and certain testimony of these future hopes, of which they never had, nor could have, any knowledge or experience; and that the apostles and first assertors of this faith had laid the whole foundation of their hopes upon a false and a precarious appeal to their own consciences, concerning that of which they had no knowledge or experience. And being once assured of this, that the great fundamentals of the Christian faith were bottomed on a confident appeal to their perception of those things, of which they who embraced this faith had yet not found the least experience, it is incredible to believe they should continue steadfast in and endure such continual persecutions for that faith, and should receive those very records as the word of God which made these false appeals unto their conscience and experience.

§. VII. I think I have sufficiently made it appear that these epistles, which contain these things, must be indited whilst the apostles lived, and so they must be sent to those churches and persons to whom they are directed, at a time when all the members of those churches must be able to discern the truth or falsehood of what is thus asserted in them: yet, because the pretence that it might be otherwise containeth the whole strength of scepticism, let it be farther noted,

First, That these epistles from which these things are cited, one alone excepted, bear the names of the apostles, by whom they are supposed to be written: now had they not been really indited by them, this could not have been done by any, but he must put a cheat upon Christians, and substitute his own inventions for the word of God.

Secondly That all of them, excepting one, which is yet proved to be genuine in the preface to the Epistle to the Hebrews, have been delivered down unto us by the perpetual and uncontrolled tradition of the whole church of Christ, as the undoubted works of these apostles, and as the word of God. Moreover, it is apparent from the writings of Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, that even from the apostles' days they have been cited, read, and generally received as such. Now this is a tradition more general, and of a firmer credit, than any other book, writing, charter, law, or statute whatsoever can pretend to. Consider,

Thirdly, That the tradition which concerns these books was a tradition concerning things of the highest moment, and which it was the interest of all Christians to be well assured of, these writings being at present the chief ground of their support under their sharpest trials, and of their future hopes; they therefore must be writings which they were concerned to get and keep, to hear and read. They were books written to whole churches and nations, yea, to all that "called on the name of Christ Jesus in every place;" who could not easily have received and yielded such a firm assent unto them, as we know they did, had the apostles, by whom they were converted, given no intimations of them. They were also books of the greatest opposition to the vain tradition of the Jews, and to the superstition of the heathens, to the "false apostles and deceitful workers," and which denounced upon them the greatest plagues and judgments, which must oblige them narrowly to search into the flaws that could be spied in them, and, as much as possible, to labour to discover the falsehood or imposture of them: and yet these works were not denied by them to be the books of those apostles whose names they bear, though the apostles themselves, especially St. Paul, was persecuted by them with a restless malice, as an apostate from the law; and upon this account all his epistles were rejected by those Jewish Christians, who maintained the necessity of the observance of the law of Moses: most of them also are writ about that very controversy, and against those very men who pleaded the necessity of circumcision, and of observing the whole law of Moses; which yet could be no controversy after the ruin of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple, seeing that rendered the observation of the precepts of that law for the most part impossible. They were books which could not be spread abroad in the apostles' days, and in their names, unless the apostles had indited and sent them to these churches; or be esteemed as the great charters of the Christian faith, if the apostles were so forgetful of them as not to let those persons, for whose sake they were written, know it. They were books which pretended to a commission from the holy Jesus, to leave a rule of life and doctrine to mankind, which was intrusted only in the hands of the apostles, all others still pretending to deliver only what they received from them. They also were indited partly to confirm the Christian faith, and to engage men to believe it; partly to put an end to the contentions, and rectify the errors which had crept into the church in the apostles' days, and needed speedy reformation; partly to justify themselves against false brethren, and to assert the truth of their apostleship; and partly to preserve their proselytes from such as did pervert the faith, and to instruct them how to bear up in fiery trials, and to support the souls of Christians under the miseries they suffered from a persecuting world; and therefore they were written on such grounds as did require a quick dispatch upon these errands to the churches for which they were intended: and so the apostles must be supposed to give early notice of them, and to divulge them to the Christian world, whilst they to whom they were committed were able to disprove them if they had been false.

Let us consider all the writings which pass for true authentic records in the world, and we shall find there is not any reason to conceive them such, which is not with advantage applicable to these books.

The arguments which can be offered to prove a book or writing genuine, are only of two kinds; external, from the testimony of persons who lived near to the times of the author; and internal, from the things contained in and asserted by those writings, and the firm faith they obtained among them to whom they were directed and committed.

The external testimonies have their force partly from the number and the eminence of the testators, their nearness to the times when such a book is said to be written, or such a writing published by the original copies, preserved by those to whom they were at first committed, and from the general reception and citation of them as such writings and records.

Now as for these external evidences, no writings can compare with those epistles I have mentioned, they having all the circumstances by which any writing can be proved genuine, and many others of great weight, which are peculiar to them, and which no other writing can pretend to. I say, they have all the circumstances to prove them genuine, which any other writing can pretend to. For,

First, Their originals were preserved in their respective churches till Tertullian's time; who speaks thus to the heretics of his age, or of the third century,* "Go to the apostolical churches, where their authentic epistles are still recited, representing the voice and face of each of them."

Secondly, They were not doubted of, but, as Clement† and Origen say, all that I have cited, excepting only the Epistle to the Hebrews, mentioned by Peter, were generally received by all orthodox Christians throughout the world.

Thirdly, The writers by whom they were cited, lived either in those times when they were written, as Clemens Romanus, or in the very next age, as Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, and were therefore styled apostolical men.

Fourthly, They were very eminent both for their learning, and for their sufferings for the faith contained in them, or for their opposition to it, as Celsus was; now sure we have unquestionable certainty of such books as have been handed down to us by the tradition of all ages of the church, inserted into all her catalogues, cited by all her writers as books of a divine authority, and by her very adversaries preserved so long in their originals, and of which never any doubt was made by any genuine member of the church of Christ. I add,

Secondly, That there are many circumstances of great weight to confirm these testimonies, which are peculiar to these writings: as

First, A general dispersion of them through those places which were converted to that faith which the apostles preached: for the apostles, saith Irenæus, "first preached the gospel, and after, by the will of God, in scripturis nobis tradiderunt, delivered it to us in the scriptures, to be hereafter the pillar and foundation of our faith" (Lib. iii. cap. 1). Eusebius saith that "the first successors of the apostles, leaving their countries, preached to them who had not yet heard of the Christian faith, and then delivered to them, as the foundation of their faith, τὴν τῶν θείων εὐαγγελίων γραφήν, the writings of the holy evangelists" (Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 37).

Secondly, The translation of them into other languages; that of the Syriac being so ancient that it leaves out the Second Epistle of St. Peter, and the Second and Third Epistles of St. John, and the Revelation, as being for a time controverted in some of the eastern churches: that of the Latin, styled in Jerome's time "the old translation," and very probably made from the beginning of a settled church among them; for the Latin church could not be well without a Latin version, it being the custom of all churches to read these scriptures on the Lord's-day; which sure they would not do in a language not to be understood by those that heard it.

Thirdly, The constant reading of them in public and in private, in their assemblies, and in their closets and families. "On Sunday," saith Justin Martyr,* "all the Christians in the city or country meet together, and then we have read unto us the writings of the prophets, and τὰ ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀποστόλων, the monuments of the apostles;" and having read them, they did publicly† τὰς θείας ἑρμηνεύειν γραφὰς, "expound them to the people:" that they were also read by the most eminent and pious Christians every day, that‡ discat unusquisque ex scripturis sanctis officium suum, "every one might learn his duty from the holy scriptures," we learn from the question in the Constitutions of Clement,§ "Whether a man ought, the day after he had done the duties of wedlock, or been subject to any involuntary defilement, βιβλίου θίγειν, touch the book;" and the declaration of Clement,‖ that "the matrimonial duties should not be done, ὁπηνίκα εὐχῆς καὶ ἀναγνώσεως ὁ καιρός, when was the time of prayer, or reading of the scriptures; and that the sacrifices of the true gnostic¶ were, εὐχαί τε καὶ αἶνοι, καὶ αἱ πρὸ τῆς ἑστιάσεως ἐντεύξεις τῶν γραφῶν, prayers and praises, and the reading of the holy scriptures before meals." And seeing Irenæus saith that "he who had a care of his salvation might read the form of his faith in the epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians;" since that epistle,†† and the epistle of Clement‡‡ to the church of Corinth, which were their genuine works; yea, the epistle of St. Barnabas,§§ and the book of Hermas,‖‖ which two were reckoned as apocryphal, were read publicly in many churches, doubtless they must be more concerned to read the undoubted writings of the apostles, which they esteemed the rule of faith, which they styled¶¶ libri deifici, "books which transformed them into a divine nature;" which they looked upon as the records of their eternal interests, as books by which they must be judged at the last day, and according to which they should be punished or rewarded everlastingly.

Fourthly, The early perusal of them both by Jews and heathens, who writ against them, and did endeavour to destroy them, that so they might cause the Christian faith to perish, but never did deny them to be indeed the works of the apostles, whose names they bore: by Jews, for Trypho speaks thus at least of the gospels, "The precepts contained in your gospels are so great, that I suspect no man can keep them, ἐμοὶ γὰρ ἐμέλησεν ἐντυχεῖν αὐτοῖς, for I took care to read them." The Ebionites,* who also were Jews, rejected all the epistles of Paul, as gathering from them that he was an apostate from the law of Moses. The heathens; for Celsus† not only boasts that he knew all things belonging to the Christians, but often carps at the writings of the evangelists and of Paul. And indeed the Christians freely offered them to be perused by them: "For that we may not seem to impose upon you," saith Justin Martyr to the Roman emperor, "we offer to you some of the doctrines of Christ; and you, being emperors,‡ may ἐξετάσειν, search whether we truly have been taught, and teach these doctrines." And again, "The prince of evil spirits is by us called a serpent, Satan, and the devil, ὡς καὶ ἐκ τῶν ἡμετέρων συγγραμμάτων ἐρευνῆσαντες μαθεῖν ἐδύνασθε, as you may learn by searching into our writings."§ "Thou who thinkest we are not concerned for the safety of Cæsar," saith Tertullian,‖ "look into the words of God, quas neque ipsi supprimimus, et plerique casus ad extraneos transferunt, which we do not suppress, and which many accidents bring into the hands of heathens." From their endeavours to destroy the Christian faith by burning these books, came the edicts of Diocletian,¶ τὰς γραφὰς ἀφανεῖς πυρὶ γίνεσθαι προστάττοντα, "commanding that the scriptures should be committed to the flames," and the actual burning of them where they could be found, and the tormenting of the Christians to deliver up the scriptures.

Fifthly, The direful torments which the Christians chose to suffer, rather than they would desert the faith contained in these books, or deliver them up to their tormentors, and the infamy of those that did so, they being branded with the odious name of traditors. Now what writings in the world have been so generally dispersed, and so much perused by all sorts of persons, friends, foes, assertors of, and enemies to, the faith of Christians? What laws, or writings whatsoever, have been so early translated into other languages? Who were so much concerned to peruse them, as were all Christians to peruse the laws of Christ? Who suffered so much for them as the Christians did? Since then this early reading of them in public, and in private, by the Christians, this general dispersion of them through all Christian churches, this quick translation of them into other languages, this constant suffering for them, are all corroborating circumstances of the unquestionable evidence all Christians had obtained that they were genuine works, and truly what they did pretend to be, it is also clear these writings are more worthy to be received as genuine, and writings of unquestionable truth, than any profane writings in the world.

§. VIII. The internal arguments, which usually are or can be offered to prove other writings genuine, are only taken from the things contained in them, that they were proper to the times in which the author was supposed to write, and from the freedom of them from any thing which is not well consistent with those times, which are all mean and trifling things, compared to those internal arguments which these epistles do afford, that they are the authentic records of those apostles whose names they bear, and that those things which they assert, touching the gifts and powerful operations of the Holy Ghost, both exercised by them and conferred on other churches, were unquestionably true. For,

First, It is not once nor twice, it is not by the bye, but it is frequently, professedly, and upon all occasions, they refer to these miraculous powers and spiritual gifts, as yielding a full proof and confirmation of the testimony they gave of Christ, and that Christ was among them, and as a demonstration of the truth of their apostleship against all opposers, and of the preference of that faith which was attended with them, above the law, which some desired to observe; spending whole chapters in discoursing of these spiritual gifts, distinguishing them somewhat nicely into gifts, administrations, and operations; ranking them under nine several heads, and specifying the very names of those who did by office exercise them, and showing the necessity there was of this variety of gifts and operations in the body, appealing to the senses, the consciences, and the experience of those to whom they wrote, touching the truth and certainty of what they had asserted touching those spiritual gifts, by such inquiries as these: "What! know ye not that Christ is among you?" 2 Cor. xiii. 5; "Am I not an apostle? Surely I am so to you: for the seal of my apostleship are ye in the Lord," 1 Cor. ix. 1, 2; It is manifest you are "the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God," 2 Cor. iii. 3; "Surely the signs of an apostle have been wrought among you in all patience, in signs and wonders and mighty deeds," 2 Cor. xii. 12; "Have you received" from the false apostles "another spirit which ye have not received from us?" xi. 14; "This only would I learn of you, he that ministered to you the Spirit, and wrought miracles among you, did he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye (desirous to be) made perfect in the flesh?" Gal. iii. 3—5; "Our gospel came not to you in word only, but in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance, as ye know what manner of persons we were among you," 1 Thess. i. 5. Which words are either plain inquiries upbraiding their doubtfulness and hesitation in so plain a case, or else appeals unto their certain knowledge of these things; nor is it to be wondered that they should make these confident inquiries and appeals, seeing the external miracles, and the internal gifts and distributions of the Holy Ghost, mentioned in those epistles, were either such of which even infidels might from the nature of them be convinced, or such as, from some outward and sensible appearances and effects, or by their inward operations, made themselves known to them who heard and saw them. For instance, the working of miracles, the casting out of devils by the name of Jesus, and the healing the sick through faith in his name, the gift of prophecy, or foretelling things future, the discerning of spirits, the gift of tongues, and the interpretation of them, if truly done, were things self-evident, and could not well be exercised without a sensible demonstration to all that saw, perceived, heard, or felt them, that they were performed; and therefore God, by assisting the apostles, and by enabling others to perform them, must give full "testimony to the word of his grace:" and the apostles, by this constant appeal to them as to things which their own eyes had seen, and their consciences bore witness to, and they in person had performed, must appeal to the senses and experience of those to whom they writ, in matters subject daily to their experience, and to the senses of the members of those respective churches, touching the truth of their apostleship, and of the confirmation they pretend to have given of it. Now, as it seemeth highly incredible that persons able to write the deepest mysteries and the exactest precepts of morality, should be so foolish as to confirm them only by an appeal to the senses and experience of those very men of whom they were assured that they had never seen, or done, or found the least experience of any of the things they mentioned; so is it still far more incredible, that an appeal of such apparent falsehood, made to the consciences of men who never saw these miracles, or found these comforts of the Holy Ghost, and never had these gifts of tongues, interpretation, healings, prophecy, which these epistles tell us were their daily exercise, should embrace these very epistles as divine, these records as the word of God. And yet we know both they and other churches did thus actually esteem them, and receive them as such, and therefore must be well assured, that what they thus asserted of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, were things confirmed to them by their own senses and experience.

Secondly, Add to this, that these men, in these very writings, confidently say, that this was their rejoicing, "even the testimony of their conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity they had their conversation in the world, and more abundantly towards them," 2 Cor. i. 13, and that "they writ no other things than what they did acknowledge, and they trusted would acknowledge to the end," v. 11. "We are," say they, "made manifest to God, and we trust also we are made manifest in your consciences," v. 11. They represent it as a great absurdity, that they should be "found false witnesses of God," 1 Cor. xv. 15. They distinguish themselves from others they call "false apostles and deceitful workers," by this very character of their sincerity. "For we," say they, "are not as many, who corrupt the word of God; but as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ," 2 Cor. ii. 17; "We have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully, but by manifestation of the truth, commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God," iv. 2; yea, for this they appeal to the Searcher of all hearts, and to the consciences of those to whom they write, saying, "Our exhortation was not of deceit, or guile: for neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know; nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others: ye are witnesses, and God also, how holy, and justly, and unblameably, we behaved ourselves among you that believe," 1 Thess. ii. 3. 5, 6. 10. Now with what face could these things be asserted by men who knew that they, in these epistles, had told such things as even the senses and experience of those to whom they wrote must know to be the greatest falsehoods? Or how could they to whom they wrote give credit to such impudent untruths as these must be, if the relations which they made of these miraculous operations of the Holy Ghost had been fictitious things? This therefore is a farther evidence of their sincerity and truth in these relations.

Thirdly, Let us consider how the apostle treats those churches of Corinth and Galatia, in which he speaks most copiously of these operations of the Holy Ghost, and how they stood affected to the apostle Paul. The Corinthians, in his first chapter, are represented as schismatical; in his third, as carnal; in the fifth, as glorying in an incestuous person; in the sixth, as contentious, to their own shame, and to the scandal of Christianity; in the eighth, as murderers of them for whom Christ died; in the tenth, as murmurers, tempters of Christ, fornicators, idolaters, partakers of the table of devils; in the eleventh, as coming to the Lord's supper, "not for the better, but the worse," offending in it both against the rules of charity, and temperance, and faith, in "not discerning the Lord's body;" in the twelfth and fourteenth, as guilty of emulation, schisms, and contentions, touching spiritual persons, and of vain-glory, scandal, and confusion in the exercise of their spiritual gifts; and in the fifteenth, as deniers of that resurrection, which was the great foundation of all the future hopes of Christians. In his second epistle he declares his fears that he might "find among them debates, envyings, wrath, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings;" and that he should find among them "many who had not yet repented of the uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness, which they had committed," 2 Cor. xii. 20, 21. And for these things, if not reformed, he threatens he would "use sharpness," and "come to them with a rod," 2 Cor. x. 6, xiii. 2. He charges the Galatians with apostasy, admiring that "they were so soon removed from him that called them to another gospel," i. 6, and represents them as foolish and bewitched for falling from that gospel, by which they had received these spiritual gifts, to the beggarly elements of the law, iii. 1. 5. Now how could the Corinthians be guilty of such emulations about spiritual persons, or such disorders in the exercise of their spiritual gifts, provided there were among them no such persons, and they had no such gifts? How could they fear the lashes of his rod, on the account of crimes of which they neither were nor could be guilty? Why should they not be rather for Cephas or Apollos, than for Paul, if Paul imposed upon them with false stories and sensible untruths? Or why should not the Galatians even quit that gospel in which he endeavoured to confirm them only by an appeal to that which they must know to be a lie.

Moreover, the affections of the members of these churches were not so firm to him, their esteem of him was not so great, as that he might securely lessen it by venturing on these arts of falsehood, for he found some of his Corinthians "puffed up" against him, and preferring others much before him (1 Cor. iv. 18), charging him with lightness and inconstancy (2 Cor. i. 17), and "walking according to the flesh" (x. 2), looking upon him as a man too much transported, and almost beside himself (2 Cor. v. 13), as "base in person, and in speech contemptible" (x. 10): he complains that they were "straitened in their bowels of affection" towards him, and that the "more he loved them, the less he was beloved" by them (2 Cor. xii. 15), that they questioned his apostleship, and even sought a proof of Christ speaking in him (xiii. 3). He represents the Galatians as men who questioned his apostleship and doctrine, or at least thought him much inferior in both to others, ch. i., and in the second, as supposing he dissembled with them, and elsewhere preached himself that circumcision he condemned in them, v. 11, yea, who looked upon him as their enemy, and were even ready to exclude him, iv. 16, 17. Now under these circumstances could he hope to repair his credit with them, and to establish his apostleship they questioned, by an appeal to, and a relation of, such things as both their senses and experience knew to be manifest untruths? But,

Fourthly, Could it be supposed that these churches were so stupid and insensible, that they did not, or so partially affected to these apostles, that they would not, take notice of these things? These epistles inform us of other subtle and industrious adversaries, men zealous to oppose and to adulterate the gospel which he preached, and desirous to find occasions to depress and lessen the promoters of it, and to advance themselves above them (2 Cor. x. 12, xv. 11, 12). Paul complains, that the Corinthians had among them "false apostles, and deceitful workers, who transformed themselves into the apostles of Christ," when in truth they were "ministers of Satan," 2 Cor. xi. 13. 15, "men who corrupted the word of God," ii. 17, and sought to "corrupt them from the simplicity that is in Christ," xi. 3; that among the Galatians there were evil agents, who "troubled them, and would pervert the gospel of Christ," i. 7, "false brethren, who come in privily to spy out their liberty," ii. 4, men that desired to "exclude" the apostles, that they might be affected by them, iv. 17, men who constrained them to be circumcised, and observe the law, and yet keep it not themselves, but only did this lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ, vi. 12, 13, wishing they were "cut off who" did thus "trouble them," v. 12. The like he saith, Phil. i. 15, 16, iii. 18, Col. ii. 4. 8. 19, 20, 1 Tim. i. 5, 6, vi. 3—5, 2 Tim. ii. 17—19, iii. 5. 8, Tit. i. 10, 11. Now if he himself were a vain talker, and "deceitful worker," one who endeavoured to impose upon them with false tales, with what face could he object those things to others of which he was himself so guilty? Or how could they whom he so confidently doth accuse as guilty of these things, neglect this obvious reply to such an accusation, that he himself, in his appeal to the miraculous operations of the Holy Ghost, for confirmation of his doctrine and apostleship, had done the very thing he laid to their charge? We have no reason to suspect that all or any of these adversaries neglected any pains or diligence to search into the truth of what Paul thus offered to confirm his doctrine, and magnify his office; and to vindicate himself from the aspersions which they cast upon him. Since then we never find the truth of these relations questioned by any of those Jews, who so insatiably thirsted for his blood, or by those Judaizing Christians, those of the circumcision, who so vehemently inveighed against his doctrine, his person, and his office; and since we are assured by the event, that if they ever made any such attempts they all proved ineffectual, and insufficient to impair the credit of those writings in the Christian world; it may be certainly concluded, that these epistles could not be convinced of falsehood, but contained matter of unquestionable truth in these assertions touching the powerful operations of the Holy Ghost.

Lastly, Let us consider what the apostles suffered for this testimony, and what it cost them to propagate this faith throughout the Christian world, and in what tragical expressions they are set forth in scripture; "God," saith Paul, "hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death, for we are made a spectacle to the world, to angels, and to men. Even to this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, are naked, and buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; and labour, working with our hands. Being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it: being defamed, we entreat: we are made as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things to this very day," 1 Cor. iv. 9. 11—13; that they "died daily;" or "stood in jeopardy of it every hour," 1 Cor. xv. 31; that they "approved themselves as ministers of Christ in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings," 2 Cor. vi. 4, 5. "We were," saith he, "pressed above measure, beyond strength, insomuch that we despaired of life," 2 Cor. i. 8; and in the eleventh chapter he gives such a dreadful account of his own afflictions as can scarcely be read without trembling. Now by what motive could they be acted in the publication of that faith, for which they suffered all that wit and malice could inflict upon them, but the conviction of the truth of what they published; seeing they actually lost all in this, and could expect no blessings in another world for calling God to witness to a lie? The moralists assure us, that it is impossible for men to act without appearance of some good to be pursued by that action; that love of life, and a desire of self-preservation, is common to us with the brutes, and it is as natural both for them and us to avoid misery and torments: if then the apostles did actually abandon all the enjoyments and expectations both of this and of a better life, and wilfully subject themselves unto the worst of misery and torments, in propagation of a testimony from which they could expect no profit or advantage, they must be even bereft of common sense, renounce the natural instincts of mankind, and be in love with misery and ruin. I confess, it is possible for men to lay down their lives for false opinions, provided they believe them true; but if the apostles were guilty of any cheat at all in this matter, they must be guilty of a known imposture, and so must sacrifice their lives for falsehood, i. e. for that from which they could expect no good at all; which seems so inconsistent with the common principles of reason and self-love, that nothing can be more incredible.

And this, I hope, may be sufficient to convince any reasonable person that these epistles must be written whilst the apostles lived, and be their genuine writings, and then the truth of what they do so copiously assert concerning the miraculous gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost, vouchsafed to the believers of those times, cannot be reasonably contested.

First, From a particular consideration of the gifts they mention.

Secondly, From the reason we have to believe that these extraordinary gifts were equally conferred upon all other Christian churches, as upon those which the apostles mention in their epistles, and also were of a lasting continuance among them.

First, From a particular consideration of the miraculous operations and the gifts they mention. Now they were of two sorts:

The healing of the sick, and the curing of the lame, blind, and maimed, the raising of the dead, the ejecting of devils out of men, and from their oracles and temples: which being performed by the apostles and primitive professors of Christianity upon others, I style outward operations.

Or else those inward gifts by which the understanding was enlightened, and was enabled to discern that which their natural powers could not reach, as, the gift of speaking with unknown tongues, of prophecy, of discerning spirits. I begin with

The gift of healing the sick, and the diseased. Of which let it be noted,

First, That this gift was not confined to the apostles, but was conferred on the inferior clergy, and other members of the church indifferently: for amongst the gifts conferred upon the church, the apostle mentions χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων, those "of healing," 1 Cor. xii. 9, and, ver. 29, they who exercised those gifts are reckoned after apostles, prophets, teachers, as being both distinct from them and inferior to them; and ver. 30, the question is thus put, "Have all the gifts of healing?" James directs the sick and the diseased to the rulers of the church, with the promise that the "prayer of faith," joined with the holy oil, "should heal the sick," James v. 14, 15. And this is by our Saviour promised as one of the signs that should "follow them that believed" in his name; "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover," Mark xvi. 18. This being therefore made as well the matter of a promise, as of their frequent prayers; had not these prayers been answered, and this promise verified, Christianity would have, in probability, been blasted by it.

Secondly, This gift continued frequent and notorious in the three first ages of the church, and the salutary influences of it were dispersed throughout the world. Soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, the Christians, saith Epiphanius,* "returned from Pella, σημεῖα μέγαλα ἐργαζόμενοι ἰάσεων, working great miracles of healing." Amongst the operations of the Holy Ghost conferred at baptism upon the converts of his time, Justin Martyr† enumerates, τὸ τῆς ἰάσεως, "the gift of healing." Irenæus‡ proves the certainty of our Lord's resurrection, from those miracles which his disciples performed still in his name: "For some of them," saith he, "cast out devils, others heal those that are diseased, and even now the dead have been raised, and continue with us many years. The spirits of many dead men have returned again, and the man hath oft been given to the prayers of the saints, the whole church of that place requesting it with prayer and fasting."—"Even to this day," saith Origen,§ "there remain footsteps of that Holy Spirit, who appeared in the shape of a dove among the Christians, for ἐξεπάδουσι δαίμονας, καὶ πολλὰς ἰάσεις ἐπιτελοῦσι, they cast out devils, and perform many cures." And again,‖ "Even now the name of Christ exempts men from ecstasies, scares away δαίμονας ἤδη δὲ καὶ νόσους, devils and diseases. Some footsteps and remainders of the miracles which Christ performed¶ ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις καὶ μέχρι νῦν γίνεται, are to this day done in the church by the name of Jesus." And, lastly, to that inquiry of Celsus, "What magnificent work hath your Jesus done?" he answers, "This is one magnificent work, that μέχρι σήμερον, even to this day his name doth heal diseases." Now of the truth of what they thus deliver, they pretend,

First, To be themselves eye-witnesses. "We can produce," saith Origen,†† "a vast number of Greeks and barbarians who believe in Christ; some of whom, as a token of the power of that faith they have embraced, heal diseases by invocation of the name of God and Christ: καὶ ἡμεῖς ἑωράκαμεν, and we ourselves have seen many delivered by these things from dangerous symptoms, ecstasies, and madness, and ten thousand other evils which neither men nor devils could exempt them from."

Secondly, They call the God of heaven to witness to the truth of what they say: "We have seen many such things," saith Origen,‡‡ "being present, and beholding them with our eyes, which should we write the heathens would laugh at them as things feigned, ἀλλὰ γὰρ Θεὸς μάρτυρ τοῦ ἡμετέρου συνειδότος, but God is witness to my conscience, that I do not endeavour by false testimonies to commend the doctrine of Christ."

Thirdly, They appeal to the testimonies of their very enemies. For thus Tertullian§§ speaks to Scapula, a judge in Carthage: "All these things may be suggested to thee from thy office, and the advocates of it, who have received these advantages from Christians; for the notary of one, the child and kinsmen of another, have been freed by us from devils: et quanti honesti viri (de vulgaribus enim non dicimus) aut à dæmoniis, aut valetudinibus remediati sunt? And how many honourable men (for we speak not of the vulgar) have been delivered from devils or diseases by the Christians? It was Proculus," saith he, "the Christian, that healed with oil Evodus; which so ingratiated him to Severus, that he kept him in his palace to his death." And,

Lastly, By this very argument they triumph over the like attempts of heretics and heathens, who pretend to do these things by magic, or that their gods performed the same. 1. Over those heretics, who, knowing these miraculous cures were frequently performed by the orthodox, were forced to pretend the like. Thus Irenæus comparing the miracles of Christians with the magical operations of Simon Magus, Carpocrates, and others of that gang: "This," saith he,* "is sufficient to confute them, that they can neither give sight to the blind, nor hearing to the deaf, nor cure the weak, the lame, the paralytic, nor those that are diseased in any other part of the body; which yet," saith he, "was often done by Christians to the benefit of the heathens." 2. Over the like pretences of the heathens, who boasted that† πολλαὶ σωμάτων πηρώσεις ἰάσθησαν, "their gods did many cures, that they gave‡ morbis medelam, spem afflictis, opem miseris, medicine to the diseased, hope to the afflicted, help to the miserable; and that their gods had often cured§ multorum hominum morbos valetudinesque, "the diseases of many." For to this they do not only answer, by saying they had no assurance that their demons, however courted by them, could heal the infirmities of human bodies, as Origen‖ replies to Celsus; and that if they had any thing of this kind, it was only by applying medicines, and directing them to such meats, such potions, and such juices of herbs, that is, saith Arnobius, "by showing the skill of a physician rather than the power of a god:" but that they could do nothing of this nature worthy to be named with that which Christ and his apostles did; "he," say they, "with a word commanded the blind to see, the lame to walk, and cured all diseases with a touch of his hand. Now, can you show us any among all your magicians,¶ consimile aliquid Christo millesimâ ex parte qui fecerit, who have done any thing in the least resembling Christ?" Yea, Quid simile dii omnes quibus opem dicitis ægris et periclitantibus latam? "What like to this have any of your gods, to whom you do ascribe the cure of the sick, performed?" That whereas their gods could not transmit their supposed powers to others, our Jesus derived this power to the meanest, "to rustics, fishermen, day-labourers,†† and did himself nothing which he gave not them also power to do:" and that the name of Jesus restored them to perfect health who were incurable by all the powers of human art, the assistance of the demons or of the heathen deities. "Seeing you have the confidence," say they, "to bring the cures of the heathen deities into contest with those of Christ, how many thousand shall we instance in, who have in vain repaired with supplications to all the temples of the gods; in vain have tired the ears of your admired Æsculapius?‡‡ Quid ergò prodest ostendere unum aut alterum fortassè curatos, cùm tot millibus subvenerit nemo? And what availeth it, to tell us of the good success of two or three, when the complaints of thousands receiving no help from them show their want of power to assist the needy?"

Let it be then considered, that the Christians, for three whole centuries together, healed many myriads throughout the world, who laboured under those diseases which were incurable by all the arts of men and devils; that they made frequently the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, the blind to see, and sometimes raised the dead, by invocation of the name of Jesus; and we shall find just reason to conclude,

"this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes."

§. X. Secondly, Our Lord promised, that they who believed in him should "cast out devils," which promise he performed with such a constant scene of glorious instances, and such amazing circumstances, if in this matter we may credit the primitive professors of, and martyrs for, Christianity, that it is not possible for any man to doubt the truth and certainty of the Christian faith, who does not look upon them as impudent untruths and lying legends. For,

First, Let us consider to whom this power was committed over this "strong man armed," over these "principalities, and the rulers of the darkness of this world." Our blessed Saviour having said, "Behold, I give you authority over all the power of the enemy," great multitudes of Christians gave a continual demonstration of the truth of this prediction. For "that our Lord was sent for the destruction of these evil spirits, καὶ νῦν ἐκ τῶν ὑπ' ὄψιν γινομένων μαθεῖν δύνασθε, you may now learn," saith Justin Martyr,* "from what is done before your eyes; for many Christians throughout all the world, and in the very city of your empire, have healed many that were possessed of the devil, and still do they eject them by invocation of the name of Jesus, whom none of your enchanters, conjurers, or sorcerers were able to expel." —"Those Christians are not few," saith Origen,† "who eject devils from them that are possessed with them, and this they do without all curious arts, or any sorcery or magic, only by prayers, and simple adjuration of them, ὡς ἐπίπαν γὰρ ἰδιῶται τὸ τοιοῦτον πράττουσι, for mostly this is done even by the meanest Christians, the grace assistant to the word of Christ demonstrating by this the devil's weakness, that to expel them from the soul or body of a man, there is no need of men of wisdom, or powerful demonstration of the faith. Now," saith he,‡ "were not Christ of a divine composition, the devils would not thus quit the bodies they possess at the bare invocation of his name." Fidelis quisque dæmonibus imperat, "Every Christian hath command over devils," saith Clemens.§ "Yea, such is the efficacy of the name of Jesus," saith Origen,‖ ὡς ἔοικ' ὅτε καὶ ὑπὸ φαύλων ὀνομαζόμενον ἀνύειν, "that it sometimes profits when it is used by wicked men," according to our Lord's prediction, that at the dreadful audit many should be rejected who could make this plea, "In thy name we have cast out devils" (Matt. vii. 22). It was sometimes efficacious even when used by them who were no followers of the holy Jesus; as in the instance mentioned by John, "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and we forbade him, because he followed not us" (Mark ix. 38); and this gave courage to the Jewish exorcists, the sons of Sceva, to "adjure evil spirits by the name of Jesus" (Acts xix. 14). And not the Jews¶ only, but other enchanters also, saith Austin, "mixed the name of Jesus with their incantations."

Secondly, This name was efficacious against all evil spirits whatsoever, none of them being able to resist the power of it. "Even now," saith Justin Martyr,†† "we who believe in Jesus, τὰ δαιμόνια πάντα καὶ πνεύματα πονηρὰ ἐξορκίζοντες, ὑποτασσόμενα ἡμῖν ἔχομεν, adjuring the whole herd of devils and malignant spirits, have them all subject to our power." And again, "By the name of the Son of God, πᾶν δαιμόνιον ἐρειζόμενον νικᾶται, καὶ ὑποτάσσεται, all kinds of devils, being adjured, are overcome, and brought into subjection."—"It is evidently seen," saith Origen,‡‡ "that by the name of Jesus ten thousand devils have been expelled from the souls and bodies of those who were possessed by them." On this account they triumphed over the heathen exorcists, that by the name of Jesus they expelled those devils, "which none of their sorcerers, enchanters, or magicians," saith Justin Martyr,* "could expel;" and over all the heathen deities. "Bring one possessed, mad, and raging," saith Lactantius,† "to your Jupiter, or, because he is not skilful in those matters, bring him to Æsculapius, or Apollo; let both their priests adjure him in the name of their supposed deities, to quit his station; they in vain attempt it; but let the same devils be adjured in the name of the true God, and instantly they fly. Quæ ratio est ut timeant Christum, Jovem non timeant? Were this Jove any better than themselves, why do they fear our Christ, and not their Jupiter?" And on the same account they triumphed over those heretics, which then appeared to corrupt the truth: for "we by this," saith Irenæus,‡ "confound the heresies of Simon Magus, Carpocrates, and the whole tribe of these deceitful workers, that they cannot, omnes dæmones effugare, expel all kinds of devils, but only such as are confederate with them, if they indeed do that." Consider,

Thirdly, That they expelled them not only out of men, but also from their temples, oracles, and altars. "We are so far," saith Origen,§ "from worshipping of demons, that we expel them ἀπὸ τόπων ἐν οἷς αὐτοὺς ἱδρύκασιν, from the places where they are seated."—"Go no more," saith Clemens of Alexandria, in his exhortation to the Greeks,‖ "to your Castalian, or other fountains: all these prophetic streams are now dried up, and they are passed away with their own fables."—"Divination and oracles," saith Strabo,¶ "were by the ancients much regarded; but now they are as generally neglected and contemned, the oracle at Delphos and at Hammon being wholly silent."—"Not above one or two remains," saith Plutarch, "the rest are wholly silent, or entirely desolate."—"The spirit of the gods," saith the apostate Julian,†† "comes now σπανίως μὲν καὶ ἐν ὀλίγοις, but rarely, and to very few." Thus are the very heathens forced, with Porphyry,‡‡ to confess the triumphs of our Jesus over their supposed deities. Nor did they only silence their oracles, and stop the mouths both of their priests and of those demons that inspired them; but they did open them, at the same time, to force them to confess, even before their priests and votaries, that they were evil spirits. "This most men," saith Minutius,§§ "know, and some of you, that all your demons, when they are forced out of bodies by our words and prayers, do with grief confess what they are, not belying their own filthiness, even in your presence; ipsis testibus esse eos dæmones de se verum confitentibus credite, believe their testimony when truly they confess themselves to be but devils."—"All the dominion we have over them," saith Tertullian,‖‖ "proceedeth from the name of Christ, and the commemoration of those things they are to suffer from him as their judge; this causeth them, at our command, to come forth of the bodies they possess, with great reluctance, and grief, and shame, when you are present: you, who have credited their lies, believe them when they speak the truth of themselves, for none will lie to their disgrace, but for their honour; they are more to be believed who confess against themselves, than who deny for themselves."—"These devils," saith Cyprian,¶¶ "being adjured by the true God, do instantly confess, and are compelled to come out of the bodies they possess; you may see them by our voice, and by the power of the invisible Majesty, as it were whipped and scorched, and as their torment doth increase, you may hear them howling, groaning, deprecating, confessing, even in the audience of their votaries, whence they come, and when they will depart." In his epistles to Donatus,* this is made one property of a Christian, "to force impure spirits to confess what they are, and to urge them by their powerful strokes to depart." Consider,

Fourthly, This was done not in Rome and Carthage only and other cities of the chiefest note, but, as it is observed by Justin Martyr,† κατὰ πάντα τὸν κόσμον, "throughout all the world," not only for some weeks or months together, but, as these records testify, from the first rise of Christians to the days of Constantine; for even about that time Lactantius‡ speaks thus: "As Christ himself, whilst he conversed with men, did with a word expel all kinds of devils, ita nunc sectatores ejus, so now his followers expel these filthy spirits by their Master's name, and by the sign of his passion." Eusebius adds,§ that εἰσέτι καὶ νῦν, "even now he shows the virtue of his divine power, by expelling wicked and hurtful devils from the bodies and the souls of men, only by mention of his name, ὡς αὐτῇ πείρᾳ κατειλήφαμεν, as from experience we have found." This they did,

Lastly, Say these authors, without the use of medicines or magical incantations, only "by invocation of the name of Jesus," or "by reciting the sacred books," saith Origen;‖ "without deceit, or without gain," saith Irenæus;¶ sine præmio, sine mercede, "without advantage or reward," saith Tertullian; it being then conceived criminal to gain by such spiritual gifts, and contrary to that injunction of their Lord, Matt. x. 8, "Freely ye have received, freely give." And truly to conceive these things were done by any medicines, or magical enchantments, is the greatest folly; for how should multitudes of mean and simple Christians arrive at such a skill in any of those arts, which neither Jew nor gentile, who had long exercised them, could attain unto, and which none of these numerous apostates or heretics which fell off from them in the times of persecution could discover or instruct others to perform, or themselves exercise? And much less is it to be thought that Satan should assist them to build Christianity upon the ruins of his own kingdom, and to promote an interest as contrary both to his nature and designs, as is light to darkness. Moreover, that none might doubt the truth of these particulars;

First, They frequently appeal even to the senses of the very infidels. "If you are willing," saith Justin Martyr,†† καὶ νῦν ἐκ τῶν ὑπ' ὄψιν γινομένων ῥᾴδιον ὑμῖν πεισθῆναι, "it is easy for you even now to be assured of these things with your own eyes." Dictis non stetis, si oculi vestri et aures permiserint vobis, "Disbelieve these things," saith Tertullian,‡‡ "if your eyes and ears will suffer you to do so." Admirable are those words of Cyprian§§ to Demetrianus, a persecutor of the Christians, Veni et cognosce vera esse quæ dicimus. "Come and experiment the truth of what we say; and since thou sayest thou worshippest the gods, believe the gods thou worshippest; or if thou wilt, believe thyself: for he that now dwells in thy breast, and holds thy soul in ignorance, shall in thy audience speak of thee; thou shalt see them entreating us whom thou entreatest, them whom thou fearest fearing us; thou shalt see them bound, and trembling under our hand, whom thou adorest as gods; sure this must be sufficient to confound thee in thy errors, when thou seest and hearest thy gods, at our command, instantly confessing what they are, and not daring to conceal their cheats in thy presence."

Secondly, They also appeal to their consciences; "We expel devils out of men," saith Tertullian,* sicut plurimis notum est, "as very many know."—"Most men are very well acquainted with these things," saith Minutius,† pars vestrûm, "and so some of you heathens are." They appeal,

Thirdly, To the confessions of the very devils, as hath been proved already from the testimonies of Tertullian, Minutius, Cyprian; and by this very argument Theophilus‡ proves them to be evil spirits, that μέχρι τοῦ δεῦρο, "even at this day, being exorcised by the name of the true God, they confess themselves to be deceitful spirits." And,

Fourthly, They appeal to the effects produced upon the persons thus dispossessed, even their conversion by this means to the Christian faith. "Some Christians," saith Irenæus,§ "have the gift of casting out devils so firmly, and so certainly, ὥστε πολλάκις πιστεύειν αὐτοὺς ἐκείνους καθαιρεθέντας ἀπὸ τῶν πονηρῶν πνευμάτων, that many times they who are healed, and delivered from these evil spirits, believe, and do continue in the church." Hæc denique testimonia deorum vestrorum Christianos facere consueverunt, "These testimonies of your gods do oft make Christians," saith Tertullian;‖ "believing them, we believe in Christ, they advance the credit of our writings, and build up our hope; for you worship them even with the blood of Christians; they therefore would not lose such profitable votaries, lest turning Christians, you should, with us, expel them, si illis, sub Christiano volente vobis veritatem probate, mentiri liceret, if they durst lie to a Christian attempting to confirm you in the truth." Lactantius,¶ accounting for the multitude of Christians, saith, this is no small reason of it, "that the devils being cast out by Christians, omnes qui resanati fuerint, adhærent religioni cujus potentiam senserunt, they who are healed embrace that faith whose benefit and power they have felt."

Fifthly, They encourage others to embrace the Christian faith by promising to them this power of ejecting devils, when they should cordially embrace it. "Be ye baptized," saith Clemens, "in the name of the most holy Trinity; and then if you believe with an entire faith, and with true purity of mind, etiam ex aliis vos malignos spiritus effugetis, et dæmones, you shall expel impure spirits and devils out of others, and free men from diseases; for the devils know and own those who have given up themselves to God, and sometimes at their very presence are cast out; we exhort you therefore to be of our religion, and we assure you that when you do advance to the same faith and innocence of life with us, erit par vobis atque eadem etiam contra dæmones potestas, you shall obtain like power over the evil spirits."

Lastly, They offer upon pain of death, and all that could be dear to them, to make this experiment before the eyes of heathens, i. e. not only to eject those very demons they invoked, but even to force them to confess they were cheats, and own themselves to be but devils. "I come now," saith Tertullian,†† "to the demonstration" of the point, Edatur hic aliquis coram tribunalibus vestris, "Let any one be placed before your tribunals who manifestly is possessed by the devil, being commanded by any Christian to speak what he is, he shall as certainly truly confess himself to be a devil, as elsewhere he doth falsely profess to be a god; produce any of them who profess to be inspired by any of your gods, nisi se dæmones confessi fuerint, Christiano mentiri non audentes, ibidem illius Christiani procacissimi sanguinem fundite, if they do not confess themselves to be devils, not daring to lie to a Christian, let the blood of that malapert Christian be shed before you in that very place. What is more manifest than this experiment, more faithful than this proof? Here is plain evidence laid before you, whose virtue will assist itself; here can be no suspicion; even say, that magic, or some such fallacy, is imposed upon you, if your eyes and ears will permit you."

All this we have delivered upon certain knowledge, and confirmed to us with the highest attestations, by men of greatest wisdom, to distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, and so discern matters of real fact from vain impostures; by men of that sincerity and undisguised piety, as renders their veracity, in matters subject to their senses and their experience, incontestable; by men who suffered all that is terrible to human nature, for the profession of a faith whose truth depended on the certainty of these events, and which, in this world, called for continual acts of self-denial and austerity, and the renouncing all that tends to gratify the sensual appetite, only for the enjoyment of inward and spiritual pleasures here, and of celestial joys hereafter. Again, all that is said in their discourses directed to heathen emperors and judges, or to the heathen world, partly to mitigate their hatred of them, and their severities against them, and partly to engage them to embrace the Christian faith, which sure no person of sincerity would, no men of wisdom could, attempt by such untruths as might be easily detected by them: for could they boast of their continual triumphs over Satan's kingdom throughout all the world, and send the heathens to Rome and Carthage, and other famous cities, to be convinced of the truth of what they said: would they talk of the multitude of converts they had made to the Christian faith by dispossessing men of devils, or forcing evil spirits in their presence to confess they were but devils: would they encourage others to embrace the Christian faith, by promise of like power when they did cordially believe and practise suitably to it: would they appeal to the senses, to the ears and eyes, to the conscience and experience of their most spiteful adversaries: would they provoke them to make the experiment of the truth of what they said with the hazard of their lives, and even encourage them to shed their blood, if, upon trial, they should fail of the performance: or could they by such means as these prevail upon the world, and daily gain new proselytes, had not the evidence of truth confirmed their sayings? And if in these assertions they speak "the words of truth and soberness," they give the clearest evidence of the power of that Jesus whose name so mightily prevailed over the host of these infernal legions. For is it reasonable to conceive these devils, without constraint from a superior power, should not only quit the power they so long had exercised over the bodies and the souls of them who worshipped them as gods; but also should confess so oft, even in the presence of their votaries, at the command of them who sought the ruin of their kingdom, and used their confession to that purpose, that they were evil spirits? or could the name of Jesus, without the power to which he pretended, have been so great a terror and a torment to them, or be thus efficacious even in the mouths of wicked men, and those who followed not him, had not this also tended to the confirmation of his power? Did ever any of the heathen jugglers, with all their arts of magic, extort such plain confessions from them? Did they thus force them to desert the bodies and the temples they possessed, and to exert their power to the ruin of themselves, and the amendment of those souls they had ensnared! This therefore being only done by our Jesus, or others in his name, demonstrates his divine commission.

Obj. Against this signal demonstration of the truth of the Christian faith, the only cavil which the infidels and sceptics raise, is this, that we find no mention of persons thus possessed with the devil among Jews or gentiles before our Saviour's advent; nor have we now experience of any such thing, either among Christians or in the heathen world, and therefore cannot easily believe it was so then, but rather that the persons represented as demoniacs were only persons afflicted with some strange diseases, fits of the mother, convulsions, falling-sickness, madness, and the like.

Ans. 1. To this I answer, That were this granted, yet must this be a demonstration of the power of Christ, and of the truth of the Christian faith, that it enabled its professors every where, by virtue of the name and invocation of the holy Jesus, thus to heal all manner of distempers, which no physicians could cure by their art, much less by speaking of a word.

Secondly, Moreover, I have sufficiently confuted this cavil, by showing that the Christians of those times ejected devils, not only out of men, but also from their temples, oracles, and altars; and that so signally, that even the best historians of those ages, though by religion heathens, and some of the professed enemies of Christianity, are forced to confess their oracles were silent, and that Christianity had thus triumphed over their supposed deities; and also by showing, that they forced these evil spirits to confess they were but devils. Besides, we find, both in the sacred records, and in the writings of those fathers, a constant and a plain distinction betwixt these two things, "the curing diseases," and "the casting out of devils;" so Mark i. 34, "He healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils, and suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him;" Matt. x. 1, "He gave to the apostles power against unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and diseases." The Christians, saith Irenæus,* "truly cast out devils and heal the sick by imposition of hands." Ἐξπαδίουσι δαίμονας καὶ πολλὰς ἰάσεις ἐπιτελοῦσι, "They cast out devils and heal many diseases," saith Origen.† "How many honest men have by us been healed, or freed from devils?" is the inquiry of Tertullian.‡

Thirdly, The falsehood of the suggestion, that men possessed with evil spirits were not known among the Jews in former ages, appears from the plain testimonies of Josephus,§ who saith, that "God taught Solomon this wisdom for the benefit of men; and that he left behind him those ways of exorcising demons, which so effectually expelled them, that they never entered into them more; and from that time to this hath that way of curing those who were possessed been very powerful." He also talks of a strange herb, or shrub, which being artificially pulled up,‖ τὰ καλούμενα δαιμόνια ταχέως ἐξελαύνει, "presently expels devils." We also read in the Acts of seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, who were exorcists, Acts xix. 13, and of "their children casting out devils," Matt. xii. 27. And both Justin Martyr¶ and Irenæus, inform us, that they did this before the time of our Saviour, "by the invocation of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob."

That among the heathens there were persons thus possessed, appears sufficiently by this, that otherwise the Christians could not have pretended to cast them out; and from the exorcists and magicians in every nation, of whom Plutarch†† saith, that "they advised those who were possessed to repeat the Ephesian letters:" and Lucian‡‡ mentions it as a thing known to all, that they had those "who did dispossess demons." Justin Martyr§§ saith, the Jews exorcised them, τῇ τέχνῃ ὥσπερ καὶ τὰ ἔξνη χρώμενοι, "using that art as the heathens did." The names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, are used, saith Origen,‖‖ not only by the Jewish exorcists, ἀλλὰ γὰρ σχεδὸν καὶ πάντας τοὺς τὰ τῶν ἐπῳδῶν καὶ μαγειῶν πραγματευομένους, "but almost by all that practise the art of magic or enchantment." So that it is certain that the history of Christ and his apostles casting out devils in Judea, and of the Christians casting them out throughout the world, was therefore never questioned by Jew or gentile, because they had among themselves in every place pretenders to it.

And if after the triumphs of the gospel there now continue among Christians no footsteps of this power of Satan, this is a testimony of the truth of what our Lord foretold, "Now is the prince of this world cast out," John xii. 31.

§. XI. Of those internal gifts, which show the power of the Holy Ghost engaged to promote the Christian faith.

First, That of tongues is most illustrious. This was a gift exceeding requisite to the speedy propagation of the gospel, which in the space of forty years was by our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. 14, to spread itself throughout the world. And therefore it was daily exercised among the heathens to convert them, and by themselves, when they embraced the Christian faith; for the family, the friends, and kindred of Cornelius, "received the Holy Ghost;" and, to the amazement of the Jewish converts, "spake with tongues, and magnified God," Acts x. 46. Upon the twelve disciples of the Baptist, the apostle lays his hands, and they "receive the Holy Ghost, and speak with tongues," Acts xix. 6. St. Paul, in his Epistle to the church of Corinth, saith, "They were enriched with, and they abounded, ἐν παντὶ λόγῳ, in all tongues," 2 Cor. i. 5 (see the note there). Among the gifts imparted to them, he reckons "divers kinds of tongues, and the interpretation of them," 1 Cor. xii. 9, and puts the question to them thus, ver. 30, "Do all speak with tongues?" This he objecteth as their crime, that "when they came together every one had his tongue," 1 Cor. xiv. 26, and adds, that if they thus continued to use this gift, it would breed confusion in their churches, and cause their auditors to say, "That they were mad," ver. 23. Whence he adviseth them, who used these tongues, to "pray they might interpret," ver. 23, permitting only two or three to speak with tongues in one assembly, and that "by course, and with interpretation," ver. 26—28, imposing silence on them when no interpreter was present; and order, saith he, being thus observed, "Let no man forbid to speak with tongues," ver. 39. And if this gift was so abundantly conferred upon that church, in which the apostle found so great miscarriages, and of which only he saith, "They came behind the other churches in no gifts;" we reasonably may suppose others, and better churches, had an equal share in this gift. Accordingly, "we have heard," saith Irenæus, lib. v. cap. 6, "many brethren who have received the Spirit of God, και παντοδαπαῖς λαλοῦντων διὰ Πνεύματος γλώσσαις, and by that Spirit spake all languages."

And now, what can the unbeliever offer to invalidate the strength of this convincing demonstration? Will he ascribe this gift to the assistance of the devil? Let him produce one instance of like nature from any heathen writer, to show that ever this was done by any besides Christians: or tell us, why that subtle spirit should thus concern himself to propagate and to confirm that faith, which bears the clearest opposition both to his nature and designs? Will they ascribe it to some fit of melancholy, or some distemper of the brain? What can be more absurd, than to assert, that at the preaching of a sermon, the rushing of a mighty wind, the laying on of an apostle's hands, or the baptizing of a person in the name of Jesus, such unaccountable diseases should seize on many thousands, and should enable them to speak a language they had never learned? Or, is it reasonable to think this distemper should be so peculiar to Christian constitutions, as that no other persons should pretend to it? And that it should wholly cease from them, when once the Christian faith had spread itself over all nations, Christians themselves never pretending that it lasted beyond the second century?

§. XII. The second internal gift, of which the scripture maketh frequent mention, is that of prophecy; of which let it be noted,

That seeing the Jews, from the foundation of their church to the completion of the canon of the Old Testament, had a continual succession of prophets to instruct them in the mind of God, it seemeth highly requisite that the like gift should for some season be conferred upon the church of Christ, which was not only to succeed, but highly to excel the Jewish economy. Especially, if we consider, that their own prophet Joel had foretold, touching the times of the Messiah promised to the Jews, God would then "pour his Spirit upon all flesh, and their sons and daughters should prophesy" (Joel ii. 28); and also, that our Lord had promised to send the Spirit of truth to his disciples, to lead them into all truth, and to declare unto them things to come (John xvi. 13), and to send to the Jewish nation, "prophets and wise men" (Matt. xxiii. 34); and some of these must be supposed to speak, when he engageth, that "he that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward" (Matt. x. 41). So that you see the Christians had just reason to expect the spirit of prophecy should be again revived in their days, and plentifully conferred upon them; and that both Jew and gentile must have had sufficient cause to question the whole truth of Christian faith, had not this spirit of prophecy been found amongst them: and therefore of the completion of this promise we are assured,

First, From the catalogue of Christian prophets, mentioned in the New Testament and ancient writers of the church. For Acts xi. 27, 28, mention is made of Christian prophets coming from Jerusalem; and of Agabus, who foretold the famine that happened in the days of Claudius Cæsar, as Josephus,* Suetonius,† and Dion testify.‡ In the thirteenth chapter, we are told of five prophets in the church of Antioch, who, whilst they were employed in the public ministry, received a divine afflatus, commanding them to "separate Barnabas and Saul," to some special work, to which the Holy Spirit had designed them, ver. 3. And xv. 32, we read of Judas and Silas, who, "being prophets, exhorted the brethren with many words:" and xix. 6, of twelve disciples who, when Paul had laid his hands upon them, "spake with tongues and prophesied." In the Revelation of John, mention is made of Christ's "servants, the prophets," xvi. 6, and of "the blood of the prophets slain" by the beast, xviii. 20. 24, and of "the prophets his brethren," xix. 10. Eusebius§ cites an ancient author, who speaks of Quadratus and others, as πνευματοφορηθέντες προφηταὶ, "inspired prophets," and who declared that the prophetic gift continued still in the church. Moreover, as Joel had foretold, that "in those days their daughters and their handmaids should prophesy;" so we read, in the history of the Acts, of "four daughters of Philip the evangelist who did prophesy," Acts xxi. 9, in the Epistle to the Corinthians, of women prophesying, 1 Cor. xi. 5, and in the Ecclesiastical History, of Ammia‖ of Philadelphia, "a prophetess."

In a word, there was not any church in which this gift of prophecy was not frequent. We read of prophets at Jerusalem, the mother of all churches, Acts xi. 27, in the church of Antioch, Acts xiii. 1, of the gift of prophecy in the church of Rome, Rom. xii. 6, in that of Corinth and Thessalonica, 1 Thess. v. 20, and of "spiritual persons" in the church of Galatia, vi. 1. They are said to be placed in the church in general: "For God," saith the apostle, "hath set some in the church; first, apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, teachers:" as therefore the apostles and the teachers, so did the prophets exercise their functions in all churches. They were given to the church for ends which equally concerned all their assemblies, Christ having given "some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying the body of Christ," Eph. ix. 11, 12. Now these are ends in which all churches must be equally concerned, and therefore we have reason to believe, that as apostles, evangelists, and pastors, so prophets also were vouchsafed to them all.

Moreover, it seems evident, that at the first foundation of a Christian church among the gentiles, there were no settled pastors to perform the public offices in their assemblies; but they were generally performed by prophets, or by spiritual men, who had the gift of prophecy, or were in the assembly excited to that work by an afflatus of the Holy Spirit. To clear up this, let it be noted:

First, That as soon as any person then embraced the Christian faith, they received with it the gift of prophecy, or of the Holy Ghost; so when Peter and John laid hands on the Samaritan converts, "they received the Holy Ghost" (Acts viii. 15); when Peter preached to Cornelius and his friends, "the Holy Ghost fell on all them that heard the word, and they spake with tongues, and magnified God" (Acts x. 44. 46); so also the twelve disciples of the Baptist, when St. Paul laid his hands upon them, "spake with tongues and prophesied" (Acts xix. 6): so that this gift of prophecy was still contemporary with a Christian church, or family of Christian converts.

Note, Secondly, That the apostles did not presently, upon the conversion of any number of persons to the Christian faith, ordain them "elders in every church," but left them for a season to the conduct of those prophets and spiritual men the Holy Ghost had fitted for that work. The church of Antioch was converted, saith Dr. Lightfoot, in the fortieth year of our Lord, and "a great number of them turned to the Lord" (Acts xi. 21), and yet no elders were ordained among them till the fiftieth year (Acts xiv. 23): but in this interval, there were prophets among them who ministered in their assemblies to the Lord (xiii. 2). The inhabitants of the isle of Crete were converted for some considerable time before St. Paul sent Titus to them, "to set in order the things which were lacking, and ordain elders in every city" (i. 5). How were they then in the mean time supplied with teachers, and men that ministered in their assemblies, unless by men assisted by that Spirit "which was shed on them abundantly" at their conversion? (iii. 5, 6.) And if we may take an estimate of other churches, by what was certainly performed in the assemblies of the church of Corinth, we cannot reasonably doubt the truth of this assertion. For, whereas all the public offices performed in the church were prayer and psalmody, expounding or preaching of the word, and eucharistical oblations; all these are in the fourteenth chapter of the First Epistle ascribed to the prophets in that church, or to the men endowed with spiritual gifts among them: for when they came together, some of them prayed, others composed sacred hymns by their "spiritual gift," ver. 15. Their prophets did then teach for edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3. 31, they also did then εὐλογεῖν, "bless," which is the word used for consecration of the eucharist, x. 16, and εὐχαριστεῖν, "give thanks," which is the word used in our Lord's institution of this sacrament, 1 Cor. xi. 21, and at this thanksgiving the people answered, "Amen,"* as they were wont to do at the celebration of the sacrament, ver. 16, 17. That all, or any of those things were done by stated pastors, we never read in the epistles to that church. And this seems yet more probable, touching the church of Corinth, because there seems no order observed among them in their prophesying, and no subjecting of the prophets in their assemblies to any ruler in that church. When the incestuous person was to be delivered up to Satan, this was done by the authority of Paul, with the concurrence of the whole assembly; "When you are met together," saith he, "to deliver such a one to Satan" (1 Cor. v. 4), "put away from yourselves that wicked person" (ver. 13). And when he speaketh of this act of discipline, he calls it ἐπιτιμία ὑπὸ τῶν πλείονων, "the punishment inflicted by many," 2 Cor. ii. 6 (see the note there). And when the same person was to be absolved, there is no direction sent to any rulers of the church to give him absolution, but all seems immediately to be done by the authority of St. Paul, and by the whole assembly. And lastly, in the epistles sent from Corinth to the church of Rome, we find not any salutation sent to Rome from any bishop or elder of the church of Corinth, but only from the kindred of Paul, from "Gaius the host" of that church, "Erastus the chamberlain of the city," and "Quartus a brother" (xvi. 21—23). All which things put together, render it more than probable there were then no settled pastors in the church of Corinth, which makes it necessary that the affairs of their church assemblies should be wholly managed by their prophets and spiritual persons.

* Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2. † Cap. 18. ‡ Lib. lx.
§ Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. 17. ‖ Ibid.

It seemeth also highly probable, this was the case of other churches, since the apostle, directing his epistles to many of them, maketh no mention of any church governors amongst them, either in the beginning of them, as he doth in his epistle to the Philippians, or the salutations at the close of them, as he doth in that to the Hebrews, saying, "Salute all them who have the rule over you," xiii. 24. For instance, there is no direction of the epistle writ to the Galatians to any church governors among them, no salutation of them in the close of it, no charge against them for suffering those great disorders which had obtained in that church, no exhortation to them to take heed to their ministry, or to oppose themselves to the deceivers then crept in among them; but there are plain directions given to the spiritual men, or to the prophets then among them, in these words, "Brethren, if any man be overtaken with a fault, ye that are spiritual," i. e. who are endowed with those spiritual gifts which enable you for public ministrations in the church, "restore such an one in the spirit of meekness," vi. 1 (see the note there); which makes it highly probable, that church was managed, not by stated pastors, but by prophets and spiritual teachers of the word.

Thus also seems it to have been in the church of Thessalonica. For (1.) we find no notice taken of them in the front of the epistles to them, no salutation of them in the close; the words of salutation being only these, "Salute all the brethren with a holy kiss." (2.) We find no directions given to them in particular, but only to the brethren in general, touching such matters as must have related to their office only, or chiefly, had they been settled rulers in that church. The charge, 1 Thess. v. 14, runs thus: "We exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak:" and, 2 Thess. ii. 6, thus: "We command you, brethren, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walks disorderly, and not according to the tradition which ye have received from us:" and, ver. 13, 14, "And ye, brethren,—if any man obey not the word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed: yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother:" and, lastly, to these brethren the adjuration, mentioned v. 27, is directed, "charging them by the Lord, that this epistle be read to all the holy brethren."

The same may be observed of the epistle directed by the same apostle to the church of Rome; for it is directed in the general, "to all that are in Rome, beloved of God, and saints called;" and among the numerous salutations in the close, we find not one directed to any stated pastors of that church; but this we find, that having finished his great dispute concerning justification, and the rejection of the Jews, he exhorts them "to be wise to sobriety, as God had distributed to every one the measure of faith," xii. 4, and adds, "Having therefore gifts differing according to the grace given us, whether it be prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministry; or he that teacheth on teaching." Now evident it is, that both the prophets and teachers in those times are reckoned as men who exercised those offices by a spiritual afflatus, and were enabled to perform them by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit then vouchsafed to them; whence they are styled, in the words now cited, χαρίσματα, "spiritual gifts." Hence therefore it is highly probable, these were the men who then presided in their assemblies, and exercised those sacred offices in the church of Rome. Now if these things were so, all Christian churches, at their first conversion to Christianity, must have a sensible and constant demonstration of the exercise of these spiritual gifts in their assemblies, and so a certain evidence of the divine presence with them, and of the truth of the profession they embraced.

This will be farther evident, if we consider what is ascribed to these prophets, what demonstrations they afforded that they were truly acted by a divine afflatus.

In prosecution of this head, I do acknowledge that prophecy doth, 1 Cor. xiv., signify expounding the scriptures, "for exhortation, edification, and comfort;" but then it signifies the doing this by a divine afflatus; and when this gift was exercised by singing, or by praising God, this was still done, as holy scripture doth inform us, ᾠδαῖς πνευματικαῖς, in psalms and hymns, and odes, composed by the immediate impulse and assistance of the Holy Ghost; for upon that account alone could this be styled "praying" and "singing in the Holy Ghost," and mentioned as an instance of their spiritual gifts: and such a manifestation of the Spirit did attend them in this exercise, as made it easy for others to discern that they were prophets: for either with the gift of prophecy they had the gift of tongues, as in the first effusion of the Holy Ghost, when "they spake with other tongues the wonderful things of God" (Acts ii. 11), and thereby showed the spirit of prophecy, which God had promised by his servant Joel, was fulfilled upon them, and on Cornelius and his kinsmen, the first gentile converts; for by this were the Jews convinced that "God had shed on them also the gift of the Holy Ghost, that they heard them speak with tongues, and magnify God" (Acts x. 44, 45): or, secondly, they foretold things future and contingent, according to our

* Justin Mart. Apol. ii. p. 97. Constit. Ap. lib. viii. cap. 12.

Saviour's promise, that "the Spirit he would send should show them things to come" (John xvi. 13). Thus we find mention in the sacred story of the prophet Agabus, who foretold the year before that dearth which happened in the reign of Claudius (Acts xi. 27), that other Christians might be moved by this prediction to send their charity to their brethren where the famine pinched them most, as it did in Judea, saith Josephus; and of Timothy, chosen to be an evangelist "according to the foregoing prophecies concerning him;" whence by the ancients this gift was styled, ὁ τῆς προγνώσεως," the gift of foreknowledge."

Moreover, in the epistles of Paul we find not only mention of prophets settled in the church, and of prophecy reckoned among the gifts of the good Spirit, but we find him comparing it with other gifts; particularly (1.) with that of tongues, and preferring it before that gift, as being such a gift as tended more to the edification of the church: "for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues," saith the apostle; "for he that speaketh with tongues edifieth himself only, but he that prophesieth edifies the church" (1 Cor. xiv. 2. 5). Hence he declareth his desire that they should "rather prophesy" than speak with tongues. (2.) He compares it with that of charity, declaring, in that case, that charity excels it, because, "though we have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge, yet if we have no charity we are nothing" (1 Cor. xiii. 2); and because "prophecies shall cease," but "charity never ceaseth" (ver. 8). Moreover, he gives directions to prophets, to "prophesy according to the proportion of faith," (Rom. xii. 19), to prophesy successively, or one by one, and let the other prophets judge" (1 Cor. xiv. 22), and to "hold their peace when any thing is revealed to another prophet" (ver. 10). He also blames them for prophesying all together in a confused manner, and without observation of due order, and for suffering their women to prophesy in the church (ver. 39). And yet after all these directions, he exhorts them to "covet prophecy," and saith, "Quench not the Holy Spirit, despise not prophecies" (1 Thess. v. 19, 20). Now these things give us an unquestionable evidence, that this gift was then plentifully conferred upon the church of Christ; for could the apostle talk with so great confidence, in his epistles directed to Christian churches, of prophets, and of a "gift of prophecy" vouchsafed to them and settled in the church of God: could he speak so much of the edification which the church received by those who had the gift of prophecy, and of the revelations which they made by virtue of it, and of the effect it had on unbelievers, to force them to acknowledge that "God was present" with the church: could he compare it with other gifts then extant in the church, and give it the pre-eminence above them; and with the grace of charity, exalting that even above tongues and prophecy: could he give directions to the prophets then among them how to exercise this gift, and chide them for abusing it: could he say to them, "Covet and despise not prophecies;" and could he close those sayings with these words, "If any man be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I write to you are the commandments of God" (1 Cor. xiv. 37): I say, could he have written all these things in such epistles as were embraced as the word of God, had it not been beyond exception, that there was such a gift of prophecy vouchsafed to, and exercised in, the church of God?

Lastly, Of the continuance of this gift of prophecy, not only in the age of the apostles, but also in the age succeeding, we have sufficient evidence from the best writers of the Christian church. For,

First, Hermas, contemporary with Paul, speaks of this gift as still remaining, and usually practised in the church of Christ: for he professedly gives rules, by which all Christians might distinguish betwixt true and false prophets, those who were acted by an evil spirit, and those who were acted by the Holy Ghost; saying, "That he who had the earthly spirit, came not into the congregation of just men; or if he came thither" (lib. ii. cap. 11), obmutescit, nec quidquam potest loqui, "he was presently struck dumb, and had no power to speak before them. But when a man comes," saith he,* "who hath the Spirit of God, into the congregation of the just, and prays to God, he is then filled with a divine afflatus, and speaketh as God will." Whence two things are evident,

First, That he supposeth there were then men in the church inspired with the spirit of prophecy: Secondly, That this prophetical afflatus came upon them, and was exerted by them, in the assemblies of the church.

Of the continuance of this gift in the second century we have a signal testimony of the church of Smyrna, declaring, that Polycarp, their bishop, was διδάσκαλος ἀποστολικὸς, καὶ προφητικὸς "an apostolical and prophetical teacher;" for say they,* "every word he spake hath been already fulfilled, and will be fulfilled."

Eusebius makes mention of Quadratus† as "an apostolical man," and one of the first order of their successors, "who was," saith he, προφητικῷ χαρίσματι διαπρέψας, "celebrated for his prophetical gift."

Justin Martyr speaks of himself as a disciple of the apostles; and Methodius saith, "He was not far from the apostles:" now he expressly saith to Trypho,‡ παρ' ἡμῖν καὶ μέχρι νῦν προφητικὰ χαρίσματά ἐστιν, "We have still prophetical gifts among us.

Irenæus was also near to the apostles' time, saith Basil and Austin; and he not only declares that some Christians had then§ πρόγνωσιν τῶν μελλόντων, καὶ ὀπτασίας, καὶ ῥήσεις προφητικὰς, "the knowledge of things future, and visions, and prophetical predictions;" but confirms this from what he and others had then heard; "for," saith he, "Paul calls them perfect, who had received the Spirit, and by him spake with all tongues; καθὼς καὶ ἀκούομεν πολλῶν ἀδελφῶν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ προφητικὰ χαρίσματα ἐχόντων,‖ as also we have heard many brethren in the church, who had prophetical gifts, and by the Spirit spake with all tongues, and discovered the secrets of men, and expounded the mysteries of God." Moreover, three things are in this matter very remarkable.

First, That by this very argument the Christians of the second and third century endeavoured to convince the Jews, that their religion was to give place to Christianity; that God had left their synagogues, and was now efficaciously present with those churches who had embraced the Christian faith; because that gift of prophecy, which formerly had been peculiar to the Jewish church, had now entirely left them, and was translated to the assemblies of Christians, among whom it remained, μέχρι νῦν, "to that present time," as hath been proved already by the testimony of Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with Trypho.¶ Thus to Celsus, pleading in the person of a Jew for that religion against Christianity, Origen declares that the divinity of Christ had transferred his providence from the Jews to the converted gentiles, "for," saith he, "we may see them after the coming of our Lord entirely deserted, and having nothing venerable that remains among them, they having now no prophets and no miracles, ὧν κἂν ἔγγη ἐπὶ πόσον παρὰ Χριστιανοῖς εὑρίσκεται, καί τινα γε μείζονα, of which some considerable footsteps have so long remained among Christians."

Secondly, The case of Montanus and his followers, pretending to this gift of prophecy, hath in it many circumstances, which plainly show this gift did still continue in some measure in the church. For,

First, Eusebius informs us, that when Montanus, Alcibiades, and Theodotus in Phrygia, pretended to the gift of prophecy,†† "many believed they might be prophets, because many extraordinary operations of the divine gifts were still performed in divers churches."

Secondly, They confute the Montanists' pretence to this gift, by the falsehoods which they uttered; Maximilla, one of his prophetesses, having declared that "after her there should be no prophets, but the consummation of all things;" and because they left no prophets to succeed them; "whereas," say they,* "the prophetic gift is to continue in all churches;" which shows it did continue then, for otherwise this objection must have been as strong against the church of Christ, as against the sect of the Montanists. And, lastly, they confute them from their way of prophesying, they speaking still in ecstasies and strange emotions of their minds; "whereas," say they,† "the prophets under the old testament, and ours under the new, Agabus, Judas, Silas, Quadratus, and many others, were never subject to such ecstasies;" whence they concluded, μὴ δεῖν προφήτην ἐν ἐκστάσει λαλεῖν, "that prophets must not speak in ecstasies."

Lastly, It farther is observable, that some heretics denied the Gospel of John, because he had so fully spoken of the promise, which our Lord had made to his disciples, that he "would send the Comforter to teach them all things, and show them things to come." They rejected also the epistles of Paul; because in his Epistle to the Corinthians he had so fully spoken, de propheticis charismatibus, "of the prophetical gifts." Now, "these," saith Irenæus,‡ "are unhappy men, who choose themselves to be false prophets," i. e. to speak in God's name, when they confess they are not taught of God, "and who endeavour to repel the grace of prophecy from the church;" which words suppose it was extant in the church of God.

§. XIII. There is one other divine gift which beareth some affinity to that of prophecy, which therefore I shall briefly handle, viz. that of discerning spirits. Now this imports not only the skill of discerning betwixt true and false prophets, which he that had seems, by Clemens,§ to be styled, ὁ σοφὸς ἐν διακρίσει τῶν λόγων, "a wise man in discerning words," or in distinguishing betwixt the lying wonders and magical operations of evil spirits, and the powers of the Holy Ghost, which must be in some measure common to all Christians, they being all enjoined to "try the spirits whether they be of God" (1 Thess. v. 20, John iv. 1): but chiefly it signifies the power of discerning the inward operations of the soul, and of discovering the secrets of men's hearts. Thus of the prophets of the church of Corinth; "Every one," saith Paul, "hath his revelation." And again, "If ye all prophesy, and there come into your assembly one who is an unbeliever, or unlearned, he is convinced of all," ἀνακρίνεται ὑπὸ πάντων, his actions are discerned by all the prophets; "and thus are the secrets of his heart laid open, and so falling down upon his face, he will worship God, and declare that God is in you of a truth" (1 Cor. xiv. 14. 26. 30). So Peter discerned the heart of Ananias and Sapphira, saying to Ananias, "Why hath Satan filled thy heart to lie to the Holy Ghost?" And to Sapphira, "Why have you agreed to tempt the Holy Ghost?" (Acts iii. 5. 9;) i. e. having joined yourselves to the assembly of the Christians, where you have had so great experience of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, to declare the secrets of men, why, after such experience, have you dared to lie in the assemblies of those men in which the Holy Spirit thus resides, and thereby show you doubt his power to reveal what you have fraudulently concealed? He also knew the heart of Simon Magus, for to him he speaks thus (Acts viii. 22, 23), "I perceive thy heart is not right before God, but thou art in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity." It was by this gift that Paul at Lystra, looking upon a blind man, "saw that he had faith to be healed" (Acts xiv. 9). Ignatius‖ also speaks of the Spirit in him that did τὰ κρυπτὰ ἐλέγχειν, "reprove things secret;" and Irenæus,* that the brethren, which had the "spiritual gift," did τὰ κρύβια τῶν ἀνθρώπων εἰς φανερὰν ἄγειν, "discover the hidden things of men."

It was discovered in discerning men's fitness or qualifications for any office in the church; and accordingly in setting them apart for that office. Thus the Holy Ghost, in the prophets, said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them." Thus is the Holy Ghost said to have made the bishops and presbyters in Asia the overseers of the churches there, Acts xx. 28, because as Clemens Romanus† saith, "the apostles constituted bishops and deacons, δοκιμάζοντες τῷ Πνεύματι, approving of them by the Spirit." And Clemens of Alexandria,‡ that John "ordained to be of the clergy, τοὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος ἁγίου σημαινομένους, them who were signified to him by the Spirit." And Ignatius§ saith of the bishops of his time, that they were "constituted not by men, but Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ γνώμῃ, by the counsel of Christ Jesus."

§. XIV. I proceed, lastly to show the reason we have to believe that these extraordinary gifts were equally conferred upon the other churches, as upon those which the apostles mention in their epistles. This we may gather,

First, From these expressions of Paul to the church of Corinth, in which they were so plentifully exercised; for his inquiry to them runs thus; "What is it wherein you were inferior to other churches?" 2 Cor. xii. 13, and his assertion thus, "In every thing you are enriched by him in all utterance, and in all knowledge, so that ye came behind the other churches in no gift," 1 Cor. i. 5. 7, which words plainly insinuate, that all the other churches were plentifully endowed with these gifts.

Secondly, This also may be gathered from the reason of the thing: for the operations of the Holy Ghost are said to be designed for these ends; 1. The confirmation of the testimony and the faith of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 6, and their establishment in Christ, 2 Cor. i. 12. 22. 2. "The edification of the body of Christ," 1 Cor. xii. 7, Eph. iv. 11, 12. 3. To be a pledge and earnest of their adoption, and their future happiness, Rom. viii. 23, 2 Cor. i. 22, Gal. iv. 6, 7, Eph. i. 13. 4. To be their comfort under persecutions, Rom. v. 3. 5, 2 Cor. i. 7, 1 Pet. iv. 14. Now these are ends as necessary for all, as for any Christian churches, who must all equally need the confirmation of their faith, of the ministry, the perfecting the saints, and the edification of the body of Christ, the support and comfort of the Spirit under persecutions, the pledge and earnest of their future hopes.

Thirdly, This also may be gathered from that account which the apostle giveth of spiritual gifts and spiritual persons in the church. The gifts given for the edification of the church in general are these, "the word of wisdom, and of knowledge, the gifts of healing, the working of miracles, prophecy, discerning of spirits, kinds of tongues, and the interpretation of them" (1 Cor. xii. 8—10). The persons exercising them are mentioned thus; "God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then the gifts of healing," &c. (ver. 28). And in the Epistle to the Ephesians thus, "He gave some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying the body of Christ" (Eph. iv. 11, 12). Which places evidently show, that these were gifts designed for the benefit of all the churches of Christ in general, and exercised by these persons as they went about to plant or to confirm the churches; the power of miracles, and the gift of healing, being also exercised by them in confirmation of that faith they preached, according to our Saviour's promise. So that some gifts seem for some time constantly exercised by the members of each church in their assemblies, and others by those persons who preached the gospel first among them, or travelled to confirm the churches, and so all had experience, more or less, of these spiritual operations done among them.

Lastly, From the consideration of that baptism which they all generally received; for as the promise ran to the Jews in general, that "they should be baptized with the Holy Ghost" (Matt. iii. 11), to every one that would believe, and be baptized, that they "should receive the Holy Ghost" (Acts ii. 38), and that because "the promise was to them, and to their children, καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς εἰς μακρὰν, and to all that were afar off, even as many as the Lord should call;" so was this promise signally fulfilled to the believers of the Jewish nation, who being enlightened, φωτισθέντες, that is, baptized, they also "tasted of the spiritual gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and of the powers of the world to come" (Heb. vi. 4, 5, see the note there), and "great grace was upon them all" (Acts iv. 33): to the believers in Samaria, for when the apostles, Peter and John, "laid their hands upon them, they received the Holy Ghost" (Acts viii. 17): to the converts of the gentiles; "for by one Spirit they were all baptized into one body" (1 Cor. xii. 13), and "after they believed, they were all sealed with the Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13), they being saved "by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which was shed on them abundantly through Jesus Christ" (Tit. ii. 5, 6). All Christians therefore being made members of Christ's body by baptism, all Christian churches and bodies must have these powerful gifts conferred upon, and exercised by, some of the members of those churches, to the edification of the rest.

Accordingly it is declared by Justin Martyr of them who were converted to the Christian faith, that "being* baptized in the name of Christ, they received, some the Spirit of knowledge, some of counsel, some of fortitude, some of healing, some of foreknowledge, some of doctrine."

§. XV. To conclude, The primitive professors and martyrs for the Christian faith afford us a full testimony of the continuance of these gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost in the next ages of the church. Clemens Romanus,† in his epistle to the church of Corinth, saith, "There was πλήρης Πνεύματος ἁγίου ἔγχυσις ἐπὶ πάντας, a full effusion of the Holy Spirit upon them all." Ignatius‡ saith of the church of Smyrna, that "she was ἐλεημένη ἐν παντὶ χαρίσματι, favoured with all gifts, and was deficient in none." Justin§ saith, that "even their men and women had the gifts of the Holy Ghost." Eusebius having mentioned the first order of the successors of the apostles, he saith, that‖ "even then they performed many wondrous works by the Holy Ghost." It is needless, saith Irenæus,¶ to insist upon particulars, "for the miraculous gifts, which the church throughout the world enjoys, and the beneficial miracles she worketh for the good of heathens, are innumerable." This he saith after he had enumerated, among the gifts then given to believers, "the casting out of devils, prophecy, the knowledge of things future, the healing the sick, and the raising the dead." And when Montanus appeared, there was not only in the church the gift of prophecy, but in divers churches "many other strange works performed by the divine gifts."

Here then we find, by all these early testimonies, that in the first two centuries many gifts of the Holy Ghost were still continued in all churches, that every one at their baptism received some or other of them. These also are relations not of things past, or things done in a corner, but of things commonly performed in the face of the assemblies, and so confirmed by the joint testimonies of all Christian churches; they were miracles which their own eyes had seen; tongues and prophetic gifts which their own ears had heard; gifts which they used against the Jews and heretics for their conviction; and beneficial miracles so truly wrought upon the heathen, that they were efficacious to engage them to espouse and persevere to the end in the profession of the Christian faith. This therefore is, saith Origen,* οἰκεῖα ἀπόδειξις τοῦ Λόγου, "the proper demonstration of our Jesus," no other pretender to the power of doing signs or wonders having ever derived that power from himself to others, engaged that believers should so generally receive it; none ever pretending to enable their followers to speak with tongues, discover the secrets of men's hearts, or confer all or any of these gifts upon their proselytes. It also must be owned, as a most convincing demonstration of the truth and the divine original of that faith, which ministered these gifts so plentifully to its professors.

§. XVI. And, oh! that all who, by this demonstration of the Spirit, are convinced of the truth of the Christian faith, would seriously consider how much it does concern them, in point of interest and wisdom, to yield obedience to all the precepts of that faith! for if the gentiles were "given up to vile affections and a reprobate mind" (Rom. i. 24. 26), only for sins committed against the dim and imperfect light of nature; if the Jews "received a just recompense" for every transgression of the law delivered by Moses to them, "how shall we escape if we neglect this great salvation, which at the first was spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed by them that heard; God bearing witness to it by divers signs and wonders, and distributions of the Holy Ghost!" (Heb. ii. 3, 4.) And to this end consider,

First, That by our disobedience to the Christian precepts we contradict the great design of all these demonstrations of the Holy Spirit, they being all intended, saith Paul, "to make the gentiles obedient in word and deed" (Rom. xv 18).

Secondly, That all our certainty of the Christian faith doth highly aggravate the guilt of our transgression of the Christian precepts: for the stronger the motive is to believe, the greater is the guilt of disobedience; because such motives may be easily discerned, and so our ignorance of them must be less excusable; and we cannot resist their evidence, but we must offer violence to the convictions of our consciences; and so we have no cloak for our sin.

Thirdly, That though we own the Christian faith and our Lord Jesus, yet whilst we live in disobedience to his precepts, God looks upon us as mere infidels, such as "in words profess to know him, but in works deny him, being disobedient" (Titus i. 16). Our faith at least must be irrational and absurd, for "why call ye me Lord, Lord," saith Christ, "and do not the things that I say?" (Luke vi. 46.) And it will be as unprofitable as it is irrational; for though we "know these things," we only can be "happy if we do them" (John xiii. 17).

To conclude all, Our convictions of the truth of the Christian faith add strength to those engagements and encouragements which that religion offers towards a virtuous and holy life; for if all that is delivered in these sacred records be the revealed will of God, then all the promises and comfortable passages contained in them will be assuredly made good to all obedient Christians, and the assurance of such inestimable blessings as the gospel promiseth must lay upon us strong engagements "to be steadfast and unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, as knowing that our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord" (1 Cor. xv. 58).

THE

EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

It is the general note of the ancient commentators, that, though this epistle be in place the first of all St. Paul's epistles, yet was it not first written by him,* but was the last of all he wrote from Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia, before he went to Rome: the Epistles to the Thessalonians, to the Corinthians, and the Epistle to the Galatians, being writ before it. They therefore think that it was placed first, either as being written† to the imperial city, as some thought; or for the excellency of the doctrine contained in it, as others do conjecture. So saith Theodoret in his preface.

It was written from Corinth, as the same ancients note, for he calleth Erastus the chamberlain of the city from whence he writ it, xvi. 23; and he had his abode at Corinth, 2 Tim. ii. 4. He calleth Gaius his host, i. e. the man with whom he lodged, xvi. 23; now he was a Corinthian, 1 Cor. i. 14. He commendeth to them Phebe, a servant of the church at Cenchrea, xvi. 1; now Cenchrea was a port of Corinth. Moreover, it was written thence, not when St. Paul travelled through Greece, Acts xx. 2; for that then he came to Corinth is not said; nay, it is gainsaid by St. Paul himself, who, in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, writ the same year with this, excuses himself for not coming to them, ch. i., and declares that "the third time he was ready to come to them," xiii. 1. Add to this, that when he writ this Epistle to the Romans, he knew the contributions of the church of Corinth were actually made, and even deposited in his hands, he being then going up with them to Jerusalem, Rom. xv. 25. 28; whereas when he travelled Greece, and came to Macedonia, Acts xx. 1. 3, they either indeed were not so, or at the least he knew not that they were so, and therefore sent first Titus, and then his Second Epistle to them, that they might be so, viii. 9.

It was written to the Romans when he had not seen them, i. 11, and before he was gone up to Jerusalem, for he was but then going thither, xv. 25, and purposed from thence to go by Rome to Spain, ver. 28. And so it must be written, A. D. 57; for we find him at Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 6, and a prisoner under Felix, in the fourth year of Nero (see Dr. Pearson, Annal. Paulin. p. 15, 16).

That the church of Rome consisted partly of the Jews then dwelling there, we learn both from the fourteenth chapter, where the gentiles are exhorted to bear with their weakness; and from the fifteenth chapter, where he speaks thus, "I have written unto you more boldly, ἀπὸ μέρους as to (the gentile) part" (see the note there, ver. 15, 16); and from the salutations sent to them at Rome, they being chiefly sent to them of the Jewish nation.

The two great doctrines laid down in this epistle are, (1.) that of justification by faith alone, without the works of the law; of which see the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians: and, (2.) the mystery of the calling of the gentiles, the rejection at present of the Jews, and the recalling of them when the fullness of the gentiles was to come in.

Lastly, It is observable, that among all his salutations to those of Rome, he hath not one directed to St. Peter, nor doth he give us any hint that St. Peter then had ever been at Rome, or planted any church there; which, as it makes it highly probable he had not then been there at all, so doth it make it certain that St. Paul knew not of his being there when this epistle was indited.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἀφωρισμένος, Separated.] He in this word seems to allude to his former separation when he lived a pharisee, i. e. one separated from all ceremonial defilement, and from the people of the earth, i. e. the common people, who observed not the exact rules of legal purity; saying, that he was separated now, not to a nicer observation of the Jewish rites and customs, but to the preaching of the gospel of God: and the affinity betwixt this and the Epistle to the Galatians, both as to matter and style, inclines me not to interpret the apostle of the separation mentioned Acts xiii. 2, where the Holy Ghost saith, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work of the ministry to which I have appointed them;" but of God's separating him "from his mother's womb," and calling him to that work, Gal. i. 15.

[2] Ver. 4. Ὁρισθέντος, Declared to be the Son of God.] Christ, while he was on earth, declared that he was the Son of God, whom the Father had sanctified and set apart to his prophetic office: accordingly the Spirit of God descended on him at his baptism, and a voice from heaven said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." This he proved from the powerful works wrought by him, that he was "the Son of God," sanctified and consecrated to his office by the Spirit of God abiding in him, and so was "in the Father, and the Father in him," declaring that he did his miracles by the power of the Holy Ghost, and "by the Spirit of God" did "cast out devils" (Matt. xii. 28). And thus Peter represents this prophet to Cornelius, saying, "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who (therefore) went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with him" (Acts x. 38). And thus it seemeth necessary he should act in his prophetical office; a prophet being a person sent from God, and speaking in his name, and acted by his Spirit in the delivery and confirmation of his message. That our great prophet Jesus was, as in a more sublime, so in this sense, "the Son of God," endowed with power of working miracles by the Holy Ghost for confirmation of his doctrine, God hath demonstrated, saith the apostle here, by "raising him from the dead."

power, according to the spirit of holiness (residing in him without measure, John iii. 34, and) by the resurrection from the dead:

5 By whom (thus raised and invested with all power, and acting now not as a prophet, but as Lord of all, by the whole fulness of the Godhead,) we have received [3] grace and apostleship (i. e. the office of an apostle, and the grace belonging to it), for obedience to the faith among (Gr. in) all nations, for his name:

6 Among whom are ye also the called of Jesus Christ:

7 (I Paul write) To all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints: (Gr. saints called: see note on 1 Cor. i. 1, wishing) grace (may be given) to you and peace from God our Father, and (from) the Lord Jesus Christ.

8 (And) First, I thank my God through Jesus Christ (the fountain of all our blessings, Eph. i. 3) for (the conversion wrought in) you all (so visibly), that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world.

9 (This happy success of the gospel being very grateful to me,) For God is my witness, whom I serve with my spirit in the gospel of his Son, that without ceasing (Gr. how incessantly) I make mention of you always in my prayers;

10 Making request (Gr. requesting), if by any means now at length I might have a prosperous journey by the will of God to come unto you.

11 For I long to see you, [4] that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, to the end ye may be established;

12 That is, that I may be [5] comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you (through faith receiving) and me (by faith imparting these gifts).

13 Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, (but was let hitherto,) that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among other Gentiles (though through many hindrances I have not been able to accomplish my purpose, xv. 22).

14 (As) [6] I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; both to the wise, and to the unwise, (as having by God the dispensation of the gospel committed to me for their sakes, 1 Cor. ix. 6.)

15 So, as much as in me is, I am ready to [7] preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also.

16 For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is (attended with) the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, (to whom it was by God's appointment to be first preached, Acts iii. 26, xiii. 46) and also to the Greek.

17 For therein is [8] the righteousness of God re-

[3] Ver. 5. Χάριν καὶ ἀποστολήν, Grace and apostleship.] That is, saith Œcumenius, χάριν εἰς ἀποστολήν, "grace for the office of apostles;" the favour to be apostles, say some, because the apostle calls this office "grace," Rom. xv. 15, Gal. ii. 9, Eph. iii. 2. 7, but where he doth so there is always something added of the gifts and powers by which they were enabled to exercise it: v. g. "To me is this grace given, that I may be the minister of Christ to the gentiles," Rom. xv. 15, 16; "In the power of signs, and miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost," ver. 19; James, Cephas, and John "knew the grace given to me," Gal. ii. 9, because God had "wrought mightily with me towards the gentiles," ver. 8, and Eph. iii. 2, there is mention of "the grace of God" given to Paul; but then it is added, that he is made a minister "according to the gift of the grace of God given to him by the effectual working of his power," ver. 7. I therefore think fit to join both together, and give the sense of the words thus: "By whom we have received the office of apostles, and grace through his name to call all nations to the obedience of faith in him;" or to yield obedience to the faith preached in his name.

[4] Ver. 11. Ἵνα τι μεταδῶ χάρισμα ὑμῖν πνευματικόν, That I might impart to you some spiritual gift.] This is by most interpreted of the Spirit of wisdom and knowledge, by which Paul would instruct them: I rather choose to refer it to some spiritual gift he at his coming would bestow upon them, by the imposition of his hands upon some of them, as the apostles used to do (Acts viii. 17, xix. 6, 2 Tim. i. 6). For (1.) that is most agreeable to the phrase, μεταδοῦναι χάρισμα πνευματικόν, to "give the Spirit," or "a spiritual gift:" and (2.) to his words in the close of this epistle, that he shall "come to them in the fulness τῆς εὐλογίας, of the blessing of the gospel of Christ," that phrase being applied to the giving of the Spirit, and his gifts, Gal. iii. 14, Eph. i. 3, and (3.) to the end here assigned of the imparting this gift, viz. the establishment of the Romans in the faith: for the vouchsafement of the Spirit and his gifts unto the churches, is still called βεβαίωσις, "the confirmation" of them in the faith, 1 Cor. i. 5, 6, 2 Cor. i. 21, 22, v. 5, Gal. v. 5, 1 Thess. i. 5.

[5] Ver. 12. Συμπαρακληθῆναι, To be comforted together with you.] It being both a comfort and establishment of faith in them to receive these gifts of the Spirit, and in him to be able to impart them to them, and to find God so effectually working by him.

[6] Ver. 14, 15. I am a debtor, &c. οὕτω.] Here it is observable, that some translators begin the fourteenth verse with for, though there is nothing that answers to it in the Greek: yet it should be rendered thus, "I am a debtor to the Greek and the barbarian, to the wise and the unwise;" viz. οὕτω, or οὕτω καὶ, "and therefore as much as in me lies I am ready to preach the gospel to you also that are in Rome." For though οὕτω and οὕτως, when joined with ὡς, signify generally so; yet when they are put absolutely, and especially when they begin a sentence, they signify idcircò, itaque, and answer to al chen in the Hebrew: so Rev. iii. 16, οὕτως, ὅτι χλιαρὸς εἶ, "Wherefore, because thou art lukewarm;" upon which place the critics note, that οὕτως hic non est similitudinis, sed ratiocinativum, valetque al chen, igitur: so Rom. vi. 11, "Knowing that Jesus Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς λογίζεσθε, therefore also reckon ye yourselves dead unto sin;" 1 Cor. xv. 44, 45, οὕτω καὶ γέγραπται, "And therefore it is written;" so Luke xxiv. 26, "So it is written, καὶ οὕτως, and therefore Christ ought to suffer;" and John iv. 6, "Jesus then being weary with his journey, ἐκαθίζετο οὕτως, sat therefore upon the well."

[7] Ver. 15. Ὑμῖν τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελίσασθαι, To preach the gospel to you at Rome.] Paul here seems plainly to challenge Rome as part of his province, as being "the apostle of the gentiles:" so again, xi. 13, "I speak to you gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the gentiles, I magnify my office;" and xv. 15, "I have written the more boldly to you in part," i. e. as to the gentile part among you, "as putting you in remembrance of the grace given to me of God;" ver. 16, "that I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the gentiles;" and so on to ver. 30; and here, "I purposed to come to you gentiles, for I am a debtor," &c. When therefore the ancients tell us that Peter was bishop of Rome as well as Paul, this can be only true of Peter as to the Jewish converts there, whilst Paul was the apostle and bishop of the gentiles at Rome, according to the agreement made between them, that "Paul and Barnabas should go unto the gentiles, Peter and John to the circumcision" (Gal. ii. 9): and so the bishop of Rome, if he will be St. Peter's successor, must only preach to the Jews, or be the bishop of the circumcision. Moreover, it seems highly probable that Peter was not yet come to Rome, much less had settled his see there: for if so, why should Paul be so desirous, so often purposing to come to them, "that he might impart some spiritual gift to them, to the end they might be established," unless Peter was either insufficient for, or very negligent in that work (see the preface to this epistle).

[8] Ver. 17. Δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, The righteousness of God.] This phrase, in Paul's style, doth always signify "the righteousness of faith in Christ Jesus" dying, or shedding his blood for us: so iii. 20, 21, "The righteousness of God, without the law, is manifest, to wit, the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ." The same apostle having declared, that "the gentiles who followed not after righteousvealed [9] from faith to faith (Gr. the righteousness of God by faith is revealed to beget in men faith): as it is written, [10] The just shall live by faith.

18 (And this way of justification, or obtaining remission of sins, is necessary to exempt all men, whether Jew or gentile, from the wrath of God;) For (to begin first with the gentiles) [11] the wrath of God is revealed from heaven [12] against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of (those) men, who hold the truth (which they know by the light of nature) in unrighteousness;

19 Because that which may be known of God (by the light of nature) is manifest in (or, to) them; for God hath shewed it unto them.

20 For the invisible things of him [13] from the creation of the world are clearly seen (or, are clearly seen (even) from the creation of the world), being understood by the things that are made (i. e. by his works), even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse (viz. who do not worship him alone as God, who is the Creator of all things, but rather give the worship due unto him to the works of their hands):

21 Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God (by giving him the honour due to the Deity), neither were thankful (to him who giveth to all men life, breath, and all things, Acts xvii. 28, xiv. 17); but became vain in their imaginations (of him), and their foolish heart was darkened.

22 Professing themselves to be wise, (and usurping that name, ver. 14, 1 Cor. i. 20, 21) they became (in their actions) fools, 23 And changed [14] the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things.

24 Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves (as did the Sodomites and Canaanites of old, ἀπελθοῦσαι ὀπίσω σαρκὸς ἑτέρας, Jude 7):

ness, had attained to righteousness, even the righteousness of faith;" but Israel not believing "had not attained to the law of righteousness," Rom. ix. 30, 31, he proves the second assertion thus: "For they being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and seeking to establish their own righteousness (which is of the law), have not submitted τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ to the righteousness of God," i. e. to the righteousness of faith in Christ, to which the gentiles had submitted, x. 3, "for Christ is the end of the law for righteousness;" i. e. for justification through faith in Christ, ver. 10 (see the note on 2 Cor. v. 21). "The righteousness of God" is therefore manifestly taken for gospel righteousness, as Mr. Clerc notes on Rom. iii. p. 263. But when he adds, "That is, for sanctity of life consequent upon repentance," he is miserably out; for this righteousness consists not in our sanctification, but in our justification, or absolution from our sins past, through faith in the blood of Christ, shed for the remission of sins.

[9] Ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν, From, i. e. by faith to faith.] Ἐκ being here put for διὰ, as in this very verse, "The just shall live, ἐκ πίστεως, by his faith:" so iii. 20, "It is one God who will justify the circumcision, ἐκ πίστεως, through faith, and the uncircumcision, διὰ πίστεως, by (the same) faith," so ἡ ἐκ πίστεως δικαιοσύνη is "the righteousness that is by faith," ix. 30, and x. 6, δικαιοσύνη ἡ τῇ πίστει, and διὰ πίστεως τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "the righteousness by faith in Christ." Vain therefore is the descant of Mr. Le Clere upon these words, "That from the faith whereby the Jews believed the prophets and the gentiles their ancestors, they might proceed to another faith;" for if he means they should proceed from the one faith to the other, this is true of the Jews, who were to add to their faith in God, and in his prophets, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ (John xiv. 4): but it is false as to the gentiles, who were to renounce and turn from the faith of their ancestors, that they might believe in Christ. If he means, by "proceeding from faith to faith," renouncing the one to embrace the other, this is true of the gentiles, but false when applied to the Jews, who were not to renounce their faith in the prophets, but by virtue of it to embrace this righteousness of God, "testified by the law and the prophets." The sense of these words seems plainly to be this: The righteousness of God, which is by faith, is revealed in the gospel to beget faith in men.

[10] Ὁ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως ζήσεται, The just shall live by his faith.] In God's promises; whence it appears that faith doth not include obedience, but only a firm belief of God's promises obliging to obedience. Hence the apostle argues from this very place, Gal. iii. 10, 11, that "the law is not of faith," because it saith, "The man that doeth these things shall live in them," making obedience the condition of justification by the law.

[11] Ver. 18. Ὀργὴ Θεοῦ, The wrath of God.] This was before more expressly revealed against the unrighteousness of the Jews, God in the mean time so far "winking at" the unrighteousness of the gentiles, as to make no express denunciation of his wrath against them; but now "he calls all men every where to repent" of their unrighteousness, "because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness," Acts xvii. 30, 31.

[12] Ἐπὶ πᾶσαν ἀσέβειαν καὶ ἀδικίαν ἀνθρώπων, Against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.] The "ungodliness" of men signifies their impiety in robbing God of his honour, and giving it to graven images, or to them which "by nature were no gods," and so being ungrateful to him, who was the author of all their blessings, ver. 11—26; their "unrighteousness" is their injustice to one another; from ver. 26 to the 30th. And they are said to "retain the truth in unrighteousness," by acting contrary to the notions of it they had, or might have learned, from the law of nature, and by suppressing or corrupting the dictates of their natural conscience. So of the builders of the tower of Babel, Philo saith* that "it sufficed them not τὰ πρὸς τοὺς ὁμοφύλους συγχεῖν δίκαια, to confound the laws of justice among men, but also they invaded heaven, ἀδικίαν μὲν σπείροντες, ἀσέβειαν δὲ θερίζοντες, sowing unrighteousness, and reaping ungodliness."

[13] Ver. 20. Ἀπὸ κτίσεως κόσμου, From the creation of the world.] This phrase seems not to signify the means by which they came to the knowledge of God, for that is afterward expressed in these words, ποιήμασι νοούμενα, "being made known by his works;" but rather to import, that from the beginning of the world the heathens had this means of knowing the true God from the works of the creation; so ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κόσμου, is "from the beginning of the world," Matt. xxiv. 21, ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, "from the foundation of the world," Matt. xiii. 35, Luke xi. 50, Heb. iv. 3, ix. 26. Strange is the conceit of a learned person, who interprets these and all the following words of this chapter of the Gnostics; for who ever heard that the Gnostics "changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things?" Who of the ancients ever said, "Their women changed the natural use of the body for that which is against nature?" Or, how is it possible that the apostle should here accuse them of all this idolatry and image-worship, and yet in the next chapter say of the same Gnostics, according to the interpretation of the same person, "Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege?" ver. 22. Doubtless the apostle speaks here of that knowledge of God which by the light of nature was in the heart of the gentiles, and so was manifest in, and to them, even from the time of the creation of the world, by his works, because "the heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handy-work," Ps. xix. 1, and therefore doth not here say, that his mercy, and grace, and love to mankind, but that his "eternal power and Godhead" were shown by these works, which yet in reason he should have mentioned here, as he doth elsewhere, had he spoken of the discoveries God made of himself by the gospel revelation.

[14] Ver. 23. Τὴν δόξαν τοῦ ἀφθάρτου Θεοῦ, The glory of the incorruptible God.] The description of God in the New Testament is this, that "he dwelleth in light inaccessible,"

* De Confus. Ling. p. 267 F.

25 (As being also men) Who changed the truth of God into a lie, (worshipping as gods them who by nature were no gods, Gal. iv. 8, or only demons, 1 Cor. x. 20) and worshipped and served the [15] creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.

26 For this cause God gave them (farther) up unto vile affections: for even their women did change the natural use (of their bodies) into that which is against nature: (see Lucian. Διάλ. Ἑταιρ. Κλωνάριον καὶ Λεαίνα.)

27 And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly (Gr. filthiness), and receiving in themselves that recompence of their error which was meet (i. e. being given up thus to dishonour their own bodies, see Lucian's Ἔρωτες, for the dishonour they did to God by their idolatry).

28 And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, (so) [16] God gave them over [17] to a

1 Tim. i. 16, that he "is light," 1 John i. 5, 6. And thus he always exhibited himself to men in a mighty splendour of flame and light, as a visible token of his special and majestic presence. Thus he appeared to the antediluvians, to Adam, saith the learned Bishop of Ely on Gen. ii. 15, iii. 8, and to Cain and Abel, when they brought their offerings to the Lord, i. e. to the place where the Shechinah or glorious presence used to appear; for God "had respect to Abel and his offering," i. e. saith Theodotion's translation, ἐνεπύρησεν, "He set it on fire by a stream of light," or flame from the Shechinah, which then usually appeared at the place of worship: why else doth Cain complain thus, "From thy face shall I be hid?" Or why is he said to "go out from the presence of the Lord?" Gen. iv. 4. 14. So after the flood, we may presume he appeared to Noah offering burnt-offerings to him; for God accepting his oblation, as he did that of Abel's, it is reasonable to conceive that he gave the like token of that acceptance. So he appeared to Abraham, when he said unto him, "Get thee out of thine own country," in a lamp of fire consuming his sacrifices, Gen. xv. 17. Whence Stephen saith, ὁ Θεὸς δόξης, "The God of glory appeared to our father Abraham," Acts vii. 2. In this visible majesty God appeared to him again, xvii. 1. For in the conclusion of that chapter it is said, "God went up from Abraham," i. e. "The glory of the Lord ascended," saith the Chaldee paraphrase, and B. Uziel. So he appeared to Moses in the bush, Exod. iii. 2, so to the people on mount Sinai, Exod. xxiv. 16, 17, where τὸ εἶδος τῆς δόξης τοῦ Κυρίου ὡσεὶ πῦρ, "the sight of the glory of the Lord was like fire." This visible appearance of God in the light is about thirty times in the Old Testament styled "the glory of the Lord" (see note on Phil. ii. 8, and on Heb. i. 3). And this Shechinah was not only given to the Jews after the law, but to the gentiles before the law, as a preservative from idolatry, or to instruct them to make no other resemblance of him, or symbol of his presence, besides that which he from the beginning had chosen to appear in; but this, saith the apostle, "they changed into the similitude of men and birds," &c. And of the Jews making the golden calf, God says, "They changed δόξαν αὐτῶν, their glory into the similitude of a calf," Ps. cvi. 20, and of the same Jews departing from God to idols, it is said, "My people ἠλλάξατο τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, hath changed its glory for that which cannot profit them," Jer. ii. 11.

[15] Ver. 25. Ἐλάτρευσαν τῇ κτίσει, They served the creature.] In the twenty-third verse they are charged only with false representations of God; in this also with a false object of their worship, by giving the divine honour to a creature.

[16] Ver. 28. Εἰς ἀδόκιμον νοῦν, To a reprobate mind.] To a mind that could not be approved of by God or men, to do τὰ μὴ καθήκοντα, things not agreeable to nature, or to reason.

[17] Παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς ὁ Θεὸς, God gave them up to a reprobate mind. Ver. 24. God gave them up in the lustings of their hearts to uncleanness. Ver. 26. God gave them up to dishonourable affections.] Here the fathers carefully inform us, that these phrases cannot be so understood as to lay upon them, of whom Paul speaks, a necessity of being thus unclean and unnatural in their affections, or thus perverse in their minds. "For then," say they,* "this would not be their fault, nor would it be blameworthy in them to do all these things."

Secondly, They positively tell us, that the apostle here puts the phrase,* "He gave them up," for "He permitted them to be given up."

Thirdly, That this was done, (1.) "by leaving them naked and destitute of his former providence and care of them;"† not giving them any warning of his displeasure against them for these things by his prophets, as he did to the old world, and Nineveh, or by his judgments, in order to their reformation. (2.) By giving them up to Satan,‡ that unclean spirit, who will not fail, when he hath permission, to provoke them to such uncleanness, and who is that "god of the world, who blinds men's eyes, that they should not see the truth," 2 Cor. iv. 4. So the Lord moved David to say, "Go, number Israel and Judah," 2 Sam. xxiv. 1, i. e. Satan provoked him to do it, 1 Chron. xxi. 1. And thus, say they, "a physician gives up his patient to do what he will, when he finds he will not follow his prescriptions." Lastly, They observe, that they were thus deserted and given up by God, as the just punishment of their iniquities committed against the law of nature, which they had received, because they "held the truth" revealed "in unrighteousness" (ver. 18; because "when they knew God, they did not glorify him as God, nor were they thankful" (ver. 21); and because, "knowing that they who did these things were worthy of death, they not only did the same, but had pleasure in them that did them;" and so indeed§ they were delivered up to do these things by their own wickedness (ver. 24. 26). Whence the same apostle saith, ἑαυτοὺς παρέδωκαν, "They gave themselves up to all lasciviousness," Eph. iv. 19.

Thus on the contrary we say, "Such a man's money destroyed him," when it was not the money, but his intemperate and evil use of it that did so. And "Such a man's flatterers corrupted him," when it was his hearkening to them, and being persuaded by them, which did it; whereas he had it in his power not to hearken to them. And in this permissive sense the word παρέδωκεν, "he gave them up," is used almost a hundred times in the Old Testament; when God is said to give men up into the hands of their enemies, —to give them up to the sword. Thus the three children παρέδωκαν, "gave up their bodies to be burned," Dan. iii. 20; thus David prays he may "not be given up into the hand of his oppressors," i. e. that God would not leave him to their power, Ps. cxix. 121, and the son of Sirach, that God would "not give him up to a proud look," Ecclus. xxiii. 4, and so God "gave his people up to their own heart's lusts;" i. e. he let them follow their own inventions, Ps. lxxxi. 12. And this is farther evident from ver. 32, where they are said to have done all these things against their knowledge of the judgment of God upon such evil-doers.

He that would see a larger comment upon ver. 29—31, let him consult the learned Grotius; I only shall observe from the Greek commentators, (1.) That from these words "being filled with all unrighteousness," it seemeth reasonable to interpret almost all that follows as some species of unrighteousness or injustice. (2.) That πονηρία signifies that wickedness which causes men to do mischief against their neighbour by treachery; κακία, to do it out of malice; κακοήθεια, to accustom themselves to do so. (3.) That ψιθυρισταὶ are they that whisper things to the damage of others when they are present; καταλάλοι, they that openly defame them being absent. (4.) Ὑπερηφανία, is that pride which puffs us up on the account of the things we do enjoy; ἀλαζονεία, that boasting we make of things which we have not.

[18] Ver. 32. Ἄξιοι θανάτου, Worthy of death.] That murder, adultery, and unnatural lusts deserved death, they knew not only by the light of nature and of conscience, but by their own laws, condemning them who did them to death. That all these sins being species of injustice, condemned by the law of nature, rendered them obnoxious to the displeasure of that God who is the governor of the world and the avenger of all unrighteousness, and so obnoxious to death for violating the laws he had given them to govern themselves by, they might know by the light of nature.

Hence of their Tartarus, which they held to be carcer pœnarum infernarum,* Tertullian speaks thus; Illuc abstrudi solent impii quoque in parentes, et in sorores incesti, et maritarum adulteri, et virginum raptores, et puerorum contaminatores, et qui sæviunt, et qui furantur, et qui occidunt, et qui decipiunt; and to this agrees the description of their punishments in Virgil:*

> Hic, quibus invisi fratres, dum vita manebat
> Pulsatusve parens, et fraus innexa clienti;
> Aut qui divitiis soli incubuere repertis,
> Nec partem posuere suis: quæ maxima turba est;
> Quique ob adulterium cæsi; quique arma secuti
> Impia, nec veriti dominorum fallere dextras;
> Inclusi pœnam expectant, &c.
> Vendidit hic auro patriam, dominumque potentem
> Imposuit: fixit leges pretio, atque refixit.
> Hic thalamum invasit natæ, vetitosque hymenæos,
> Ausi omnes immane nefas.

Mr. L. here reads, οὐκ ἐνόησαν ὅτι, and renders the words thus, "Who knowing the judgment of God, knew not that they who did these things were worthy of death;" but this reading cannot stand: for what righteous judgment of God could they know to be due to them who did these things, who knew not that they were worthy of death, and "to whom sin," saith he, "could not be imputed without (a positive) law," which we know the gentiles had not? See the reading of the text largely confirmed, Examen Millii in locum.

[19] Συνευδοκοῦσι τοῖς πράσσουσι, Have pleasure in them that do them.] This, say the Greek commentators, is much worse than the bare doing of them; for a man may do them through the power of temptation, and by consideration may after become sensible of his folly, and repent of it; but when he is arrived at the height of wickedness, that he not only approves but delights in seeing the like things done by others, he demonstrates such a strong affection to them as is incurable.

CHAPTER II.

1 Therefore (since God hath shown his displeasure thus against the gentiles for sinning against the law of nature,) thou art inexcusable, O [1] (Jewish) man, whosoever thou art that judgest (so severely of them): for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for [2] thou that judgest doest the same things (offending as much against the law of Moses, as they have done against the law of nature).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] The apostle had in the former chapter laid down this as the foundation of his discourse, that "the gospel of Christ was the power of God to the salvation both of Jew and gentile," ver. 16, and that there only was revealed that righteousness of God through faith, by which alone life and salvation was to be obtained. He had also shown the necessity of this faith, because "the wrath of God was revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness of men, who held the truth in unrighteousness;" and that this the gentiles had done, by acting against the light of nature; and that God had been angry with, and punished them for it, he had shown from ver. 19 to the end of that chapter.

These gentiles were reputed by the Jews as unclean, great sinners, and so incapable of salvation; and their great quarrel against the gospel was this, that it admitted such men to the favour of God without circumcision, and obedience to the law of Moses. To those Jews the apostle in this chapter directeth his discourse, proving here, that they who lived under the law wanted this justification as much as others, being also great sinners: and in the following chapters, that neither they nor the gentiles could obtain this justification by the law (see ver. 13. 17).

[2] Ver. 1. Τὰ γὰρ αὐτὰ πράσσεις, For thou doest the same things.] If to any one it seem strange that the apostle should pronounce the Jews guilty of the same sins of which he had accused the gentiles, ch. i., let him consider what their own Josephus* hath recorded of them, and he will cease to wonder. For, first, he assures us, there "was not a nation under heaven more wicked than they were. What," saith he, "have you done of all the good things required by our lawgiver? What have ye not done of all those things which he pronounced accursed? So that† had the Romans delayed to come against these execrable persons, I believe," saith he, "either the earth would have swallowed up, or a deluge would have swept away, their city; or fire from heaven would have consumed it, as it did Sodom, for it brought forth a generation of men far more wicked than they who suffered such things." There is not a sin mentioned, ch. i., of which he doth not in that history accuse them, not excepting that of unnatural lusts: for of their zealots, he saith,‡ "It was sport to them to force women; they freely

2 But [3] we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth against them which commit such things (it being equitable that he should, and certain that he will, deal with men according to his word).

3 And (then) thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things (against the law of nature), and doest the same (against the law of Moses), that thou shalt escape the judgment of God (which they have so severely felt)?

4 Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness (to thee above them, in giving the law, covenant, and promises, to thee, ix. 4,) and (his) forbearance and long-suffering (exercised hitherto to thee, who hast long deserved his wrath, ix. 22); not knowing (or discerning) that the goodness of God (naturally) leadeth thee to repentance (and is a powerful motive to engage thee to it? 2 Pet. iii. 9. 15.)

5 But after thy hardness and impenitent heart (which will not suffer thee to repent and believe the gospel,) treasurest (yet) up unto thyself (more) wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God (Rom. ix. 22, 1 Thess. ii. 16, v. 9);

6 Who will render to every man (Jew and gentile) according to his deeds:

7 To them who [4] by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honour and immortality, eternal life:

8 But unto them that are contentious (against), and do not [5] obey the truth (of the gospel, as generally you Jews do not), [6] but obey unrighteousness (or falsehood), indignation and wrath,

9 Tribulation and anguish, (I say, shall be) upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, (as being under greater light, and as having the gospel first preached to them, Acts xiii. 46, and to whom Christ was first, and in person sent, Acts iii. 26,) and also of the Gentile; (for though God winked at the times of their former ignorance, Acts xvii. 30, yet now he hath revealed his wrath from heaven against all unrighteousness, i. 17, they must expect his just displeasure who turn not from it to the way of truth, as the gospel is called, 2 Pet. ii. 2;)

10 But glory, honour, and peace, to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, (as being the church of God, to whom the promises of the Messiah chiefly did belong, Rom. ix. 4,) and also to the (believing) Gentile: (they being by faith Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise, Gal. iii. 29:

11 I say to the gentile also,) For there is [7] no respect of persons with God.

12 (Tribulation, and anguish, I say, shall be on every soul that worketh evil, whether Jew or gentile,) For [8] as many as have sinned without (written) law (which is the case of the gentiles) shall also perish without (that) law (being condemned by the law written in their hearts): and as many as have sinned in (or under) the law (which is the case of the Jews) shall be judged (and condemned for their evil deeds) by the law; gave up themselves to the passions of women, exercising and requiring unnatural lusts, and filling the whole city with impurities." And again, "They committed all kinds of wickedness, omitting none which ever came to the memory of man, esteeming the worst of evils to be good, and finding that reward of their iniquity which was meet, and a judgment worthy of God."

[3] Ver. 2. But we are sure, οἴδαμεν δὲ, or, and we know.

[4] Ver. 7. Καθ' ὑπομονὴν ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ, By patient continuance in well-doing.] This good work being put in the singular number, seems to intimate some work eminently so. Now when the Jews asked our Saviour, "What shall we do that we may work the works of God?" his answer was, "This is the work of God, that ye believe in him whom ye hath sent," John vi. 28, 29. The preaching of this faith is styled emphatically, "the works," Acts v. 31, xiii. 2, xiv. 26, xv. 58, and sometimes "the work of Christ," Phil. ii. 30, "the work of the Lord," 1 Cor. xvi. 10. The faith wrought by it is ἔργον πίστεως, "the work of faith," 2 Thess. i. 2, and he that begets it in us, is said to begin in us ἔργον ἀγαθὸν, "the good work," Phil. i. 6. And in this sense it accords well with the scope of the apostle, whether it be joined with the word "patience," or with the following words; for the apostle had said in the former chapter, that "the gospel of Christ was the power of God through faith to salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the gentile," Rom. i. 16. This he here prosecutes, saying that "to them who by patience in the faith of Christ, seek the glory, honour, and immortality," promised in the gospel, God will give "eternal life."

Ἀφθαρσίαν, Incorruption.] This, saith Theophylact, refers to the body, and by using this word, τὰς περὶ ἀναστάσεως ἀνοίγει θύρας, "he openeth the gates of the resurrection."

[5] Ver. 8. Καὶ ἀπειθοῦσι μὲν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, And obey not the truth.] The gospel being styled "the truth of God," Rom. iii. 7, xv. 8, "the word of truth," Eph. i. 3, Col. i. 5, 2 Tim. ii. 15, James i. 18; the knowledge of it being ἐπίγνωσις ἀληθείας, "the knowledge of the truth," 1 Tim. ii. 4, iv. 3, 2 Tim. ii. 25, Tit. i. 1, Heb. x. 26; the belief of it being πίστις ἀληθείας, "the belief of the truth," 2 Thess. ii. 13; obedience to it being "obedience to the truth," Gal. i. 3, v. 7; walking according to it being "walking according to the truth," 1 John ii. 4, John iii. 3; the gospel itself being emphatically styled "the truth," Eph. iv. 21, 2 John 3, 4, 3 John 12; to know it, being "to know the truth," 1 John ii. 21; to profess it, "to be of the truth," 1 John iii. 19; to reject it, "not to believe the truth," 2 Thess. ii. 12; to err from it, "to err from the truth," Titus i. 14, James v. 19; I say, this being so, οἱ ἐξ ἐριθείας, "they that are contentious" here, and "obey not the truth," may be, first, the unbelieving Jews, or false apostles, coming from them, who "preached Christ, ἐξ ἐριθείας, out of contention" against Paul, Phil. i. 16, and, secondly, the gentiles which spake against the truth, and rejected it; and both these obeyed, and gave up themselves to falsehood: the gentiles, by "changing the truth of God into a lie," i. 25; the Jews, by adhering to their "vain traditions," which made void the commands of God, and owning them as derived from Moses, when they were only "the doctrines of men."

[6] Πειθομένοις δὲ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ, But obey unrighteousness.] Here Chrysostom notes, that the apostle doth not say, βιαζομένοις, τυραννουμένοις, "who are forced to," but "who obey unrighteousness," ἵνα μάθῃς ὅτι προαιρέσεως τὸ πτῶμα, οὐκ ἀνάγκης τὸ ἔγκλημα, ὅθεν καὶ ἀσύγνωστοι, "that thou mayest learn, that they offend of choice, and not of necessity, and therefore are unworthy of pardon."

[7] Ver. 11. Οὐ προσωποληψία, no respect of persons.] i. e. He is not one who will connive at men doing wickedly, because they are Jews, whilst he punisheth the like wickedness in the gentiles; or afford justification and salvation to the Jew believing, and working that which is good, and not to the believing and obedient gentile (Rom. iii. 29, 30).

[8] Ver. 12. Ἀνόμως ἀπολοῦνται—ἐν νόμῳ κριθήσονται, As many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law, and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law.] Here Mr. Dodwell* says, "That some advantage may be taken from the words ἀπολοῦνται and κριθήσονται, that which is called perishing in the case of the gentiles, and so may be understood as well of ceasing to be, as of any positive inflictions, being opposed to be judged in the latter clause relating to the Jews." But (1.) the word ἀπολλύειν, "to perish," is often used in the New Testament, and especially in the epistles, of those Christians who by his own hypothesis are to perish by being subject to eternal punishments, as in those words, μὴ ἀπόλλυε, "Destroy not with thy meat thy brother, for whom Christ died," Rom. xiv. 15, and in 1 Cor. viii. 11, καὶ ἀπολεῖται, "And so shall thy brother perish, for whom Christ died:" so also 2 Cor. xv. 4, 5, 2 Thess. ii. 10, 2 Pet. iii. 9, yea, this criticism would exempt not only Judas the traitor, that υἱὸς ἀπωλείας, "son of perdition," John xvii. 12, but even the very devils from this future punishment; for their question is, ἦλθες ἀπολέσαι ἡμᾶς; "Art thou come to destroy us before the time?" Luke iv. 34. It is used in the gospels of Christ's little ones, in those words, "It is not the will of my Father, ἵνα ἀπόληται, that one of these little ones should perish," Matt. v. 29, xviii. 14; of losing the soul by denying Christ, Matt. x. 33, xvi. 25. And, lastly, it is used of the destruction of soul and body, in hell, Matt. x. 28. (2.) Κριθήσονται, here applied to the Jews, signifies κατακριθήσονται, "they shall be condemned," as appears from the opposition it bears to δικαιωθήσονται, "they shall be justified," ver. 13. And this it still doth, and must do, when it relates to the judgment passed upon the wicked at that day: so John iii. 18, xii. 48, xvi. 11, 2 Thess. ii. 12, Heb. xiii. 4. And this being introduced as a proof, that in that day there should be "tribulation and anguish upon every soul that worketh evil," whether he be Jew or gentile, and that because "God is no respecter of persons," shows that both Jew and gentile working evil must fall under that tribulation and anguish. And the reason of the variation of the words may be probably this, that the gentile being condemned by the law written in his own heart, and so being as it were a confessed criminal, there needs nothing more than to sentence him to the perdition which his sin deserves; whereas the Jew being to be sentenced by a written law, which he may think he has not violated, so as to deserve condemnation, he must be judged and condemned by the sentence which the law hath pronounced against him.

[9] Ver. 13. Οὐ οἱ ἀκροαταὶ τοῦ νόμου, Not the hearers of the law.] The Jewish religion was very much corrupted at our Saviour's coming, so that they thought it sufficient to obtain God's favour, and to secure them from his judgments, (1.) that they were of the seed of Abraham. And hence the Baptist speaks thus to them, "Bring forth fruits meet for repentance, and think it not sufficient to say within yourselves, We have Abraham for our father," Matt. iii. 8, 9. The Chaldee paraphrasts do often mention their expectation of being preserved for the merits or good works of their forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and their writers add, that* "hell-fire hath no power over the sinners of Israel, because Abraham and Isaac descend thither to fetch them thence." (2.) They held that circumcision was of sufficient virtue to render them accepted of God, and to preserve them from eternal ruin; for they teach† that "no circumcised person goes to hell," God having promised to deliver them from it, "for the merit of circumcision;" and having told Abraham, that "when his children fell into transgression, and did wicked works, he would remember the odour of their foreskins, and would be satisfied with their piety." And (3.) they taught, that‡ "all Israelites had a portion in the world to come;" and that notwithstanding their sins, yea, though they were condemned here for their wickedness: this is the first sentence in the Capitula Patrum, whereas of all the gentiles, without exception, they pronounce that§ "they are fuel for hell-fire." (4.) They teach, that to be employed in hearing and studying the law, was a thing sufficient to make them acceptable with God. To this James seems to refer in these words, "And be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own souls," James i. 22. Now most of these vain opinions the apostle in this chapter, and throughout this epistle, labours to confute: the first here, ver. 9, the second, ver. 21, the third, from ver. 2 to the 9th, and the fourth, in this verse.

[10] Ver. 14. Ὅταν γὰρ ἔθνη, For when the gentiles.] Most interpreters understand this of the believing gentiles, "the righteousness of the law being fulfilled in them" only "who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," Rom. viii. 4, and he being "only the inward Jew, who hath the circumcision of the heart in the Spirit," ver. 29. But all the ancient commentators interpret these last six verses, not indeed of the idolatrous gentiles, but of such gentiles as lived before the law, as Melchisedec and Job; or were worshippers of the true God, as Cornelius; or repented, as the Ninevites. These examples, saith Chrysostom, he sets before the Jews, as being such as they could not contradict. And in his comment on the fifteenth verse, he makes this inference from the words,* "By these things he shows that God made man sufficient of himself to choose virtue and avoid vice;" adding, that this was necessary to be said, to stop the mouths of them who inquired, ποῦ τὸν ἔμπροσθεν χρόνον τὰ τῆς τοσαύτης προνοίας ἦν; "Where were the footsteps of such a providence in former times!" This the apostle seems plainly to insinuate, by arguing that God did and will accept the gentile, living according to "the law written in his heart," and therefore owning him as the true God, and honouring or "glorifying him as that God," who made the heaven and the earth; because he is "no respecter of persons." This seems the obvious meaning of those words of Peter, in the case of Cornelius and all his friends, "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons" (i. e. he affects them not barely because they are circumcised, or of such a nation), "but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to him," Acts xx. 34, 35, supposing that there might be such in every nation. And the argument of Origen seems here considerable; that† "if God condemned the gentiles because they held the truth in unrighteousness, and when they knew God did not glorify him as God, neither were thankful; it seems reasonable to conceive, that had they done what they culpably neglected, and might have done, i. e. had they glorified him as God, and been thankful, they would have done what had been acceptable to God, and fit to be rewarded by his goodness;" i. e. had they held the truth in righteousness, and abstained from those actions for which their conscience did accuse them, and for which "they knew they were worthy of death," as they who were inexcusable for not doing of them might have done, they would have escaped "the wrath of God revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness." But then these things may here be offered to consideration:

First, That this acceptance may not reach so far as to put them under the same privileges and favours with his church and people; but if they live in such times and places where an exacter knowledge of his will might be obtained, it may induce his providence to find out means of imparting that also to them, as in the case of Cornelius and his friends, who have told things "by which he and his house should be saved," Acts xi. 14.

Secondly, That though God may and will reward such honest heathens, because otherwise they could have no encouragement to own or serve him as their God, since "he that cometh to God," saith the apostle, "must believe that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him," Heb. xi. 6, yet is he not obliged to give them the glorious reward which he hath promised to the Christian: for this not being due to their works, they could not from the light of nature be assured of it; and it being so peculiarly assigned to faith in Christ, both affirmatively and negatively, when the apostle saith, "God hath given us eternal life, and that life is in his Son; he that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life; this is life eternal, that they know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent; this is the true God and eternal life" (1 John v. 11—13. 20, John xvii. 3, see John i. 4, xiii. 16. 36, v. 24, vi. 27); it cannot well be said to belong to any other; and therefore Origen* freely grants this, and yet thinks such persons may not be utterly deprived of a reward; especially it seems not equitable that they should be deprived of all reward, purely for want of an impossible condition; i. e. because they believed not in him of whom they had not, and very often could not, have heard. It may be added, Thirdly, That if any of them did arrive at such a state as made them indeed to "fear God, and work righteousness," they did this not merely by the strength of natural light; for though some of them seem to say, that† nature or philosophy "was a sufficient guide to virtue," yet that they meant not this exclusively of the divine assistance, which they saw necessary to preserve them against the infirmities of human nature, their own words‡ do fully testify. And if God owned any of them as truly righteous, it was by virtue of their faith in God; i. e. that faith by which they believed he was "a rewarder of them that diligently seek him;" which being, as to kind, the same with that which the apostle so highly commends, Heb. xi., even "the expectation of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," when it produced in them a sincere endeavour to serve and please him, according to the light of nature, and cleave to their duty, though they might suffer for it in this world, might be imputed unto them for righteousness. I conclude these conjectures with Origen on the same place: Sed tamen in arbitrio legentis est probare quæ dicta sunt, vel non.

[11] Ver. 17. Σὺ Ἰουδαῖος ἐπονομάζῃ, Thou art called a Jew.] The apostle doth not here begin to speak to the Jew, but to prove farther and illustrate what he said before, as is evident from the words ἴδε σὺ, "Behold thou (to whom I speak) art called a Jew;" he therefore may be supposed to speak this farther, to convince him that he, doing the same things, shall not escape the judgment of God; and that the hearing of the law he doth not practise will be so far from justifying him before God, that it will add to his condemnation.

Ἴδε, εἰ δὲ—τυφλῶν, as Dr. Mills reads: see Examen Millii here.

[12] Ver. 19. Τυφλῶν, Of the blind.] "The blind," and "them that sit in darkness," is a periphrasis of the gentiles (see Isa. ix. 1, xlii. 6. 7, xlix. 9, Luke i. 79, Eph. v. 8).

[13] Ver. 20. Ἀφρόνων, Of the foolish.] The "foolish" and the "babes" seem to be here the proselytes to the Jewish law, whom they accounted as "infants new-born."

[14] Ver. 21. Ὁ οὖν διδάσκων ἕτερον, Thou that teachest another.] This verse may be illustrated out of the Jewish writings; for they say, that* "he who teaches others what he doth not himself, is like a blind man who hath a candle in his hand to give light to others, whilst he himself doth walk in darkness." So apposite is the first question to convince those Jews, who pretended to be guides and lights to the blind gentiles, that they themselves were blind. And again, "How can a wise man say in the congregation, Thou shalt not steal, when he steals?" Whence it appears, that in their account this was sufficient to cut off their pretence to wisdom.

[15] Ver. 22. Ὁ λέγων μὴ μοιχεύειν, Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, &c.] Of all these things the Jewish doctors were notoriously guilty, and of most of them they were accused by our Lord. As, v. g. first, that "they said, and did not;" that "they laid heavy burdens upon others, which they would not touch with their own fingers" (Matt. xxiii. 3, 4); that they made his Father's house "a den of thieves" (Matt. xxi. 13, John ii. 16); that they were guilty of adultery, by unjust divorces (Matt. xix. 9); and their polygamy was so shameful, that they would proclaim in any place where they came, Quænam erit mihi uxor in diem,† "Who will be my wife for this day," or while I stay in this place? And surely such a wife was little better than a whore. Hence Justin Martyr‡ tells the Jews, that wherever they travelled, or came, they did, with the permission of their rabbins, ὀνόματι γάμου γυναῖκας ἄγεσθαι, "take women, and use them as their wives, under pretence of marriage." And the theft and merchandise of which they are accused, Matt. xxi., John ii., being about holy things, may be well also styled sacrilege; though of this they being accused in the times of the prophet Malachi, doubtless they were more guilty of it in these worst times. Accordingly adultery, dost thou commit adultery? [16] thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege (robbing God of his honour another way)?

23 Thou that makest thy boast of (thy skill in) the law, through breaking the law (in those instances which the conscience of the very heathen doth condemn,) dishonourest thou (the name of) God (among the gentiles)?

24 For [17] the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you (Jews, pretending to be so dear to God, and so great favourites of heaven, and yet living so licentiously as you do, and so it hath happened to you, according) as it is written (of you, Isa. lii. 5, Ezek. xxxvi. 23.

25 This violation of the law cuts off the benefit of your circumcision;) For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law (as circumcision obligeth thee to do, Gal. v. 2): but if thou be (still) a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made (of no more advantage to free thee from God's condemnation, than) uncircumcision. [18]

26 Therefore (on the other side) if the uncircumcision (i. e. the gentile, though uncircumcised) [19] keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision? (i. e. shall he not be as acceptable to God, as if he had been circumcised?)

27 And shall not (the) [20] uncircumcision which is by nature (i. e. the gentile, who continues uncircumcised as he was by nature), if it fulfil the law, judge (and condemn) thee, who by the letter (i. e. having the letter of the law) and circumcision dost transgress the law?

28 For he is not (in God's account) a Jew (i. e. one beloved of him), which is one (only) outwardly (by profession); neither is that (valued by him as true) circumcision, which is outward in the flesh (only):

29 But he is a Jew (in God's esteem), which is one inwardly (by the purification of his heart from inward filth, and evil dispositions and affections); and (the) circumcision (valued by him) is that of the heart, in the spirit (wrought in us by the Spirit), and not in (or by) the letter; whose praise is not of men (who are not able to discern it), but of God (who is the searcher of the heart).

Josephus* doth pronounce them guilty, not only of "theft, treachery, adultery, sacrilege," but of "rapines and murders, and new ways of wickedness invented by them, of all which the temple was made the receptacle." Add to this, that the same Josephus informs us, that not long after the writing of this epistle, the servants of the high-priests, τὰς τῶν ἱερέων δεκάτας ἐλάμβανον βιαζόμενοι, "took away by violence the tithes of the priests, so that many of them perished for want of food" (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8, p. 698, E).

Note also from these words, "Thou that abhorrest idols," the mistake of those who think the Gnostics are here referred to; they being so far from abhorring idols, that Irenæus† informs us, "they had their images, they worshipped idols without fear, and went first to the feasts celebrated in the idol-temple." Origen‡ also assures us, that he, viz. Simon Magus, taught his disciples to "count idolatry as a thing indifferent."

[16] Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege?] Robbing that God of his honour this way, who hath required thee to "honour him with thy substance and the first-fruits of thy increase" (Prov. iii. 9, Mal. iii. 8, 9, Ecclus. xxxv. 8), as the idolater doth by giving his honour to an idol. And of this sin they being accused by God himself, declaring by his prophet Malachi that they had "robbed him in tithes and offerings," doubtless they were more guilty of it in these worst times of the Jewish nation.

[17] Ver 24. Βλασφημεῖται ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι, Is blasphemed among the gentiles.] Of this Josephus§ doth frequently accuse them, saying, "What wickedness do you conceal or hide, which is not known to your enemies? You triumph in your wickedness, strive daily who shall be most vile, making a show of your wickedness as if it were virtue." And thinkest thou this, O man, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God, who punisheth the gentiles, when thou art as guilty as they, of acting against thy conscience, and doing that for which thine own mouth condemns thee, or which is as bad as that which thou condemnest in them, and which doth also cause them to "blaspheme that holy name by which thou art called?" surely, after these things so scandalously done, it will be of no advantage to thee that "thou art called a Jew," or hast received the sign of circumcision.

[18] Ver. 25.] Having thus proved that the sins of the Jews must render them obnoxious to the divine wrath, as well as those of the gentiles, he proceeds to prove what he said, ver. 7. 10, that the righteousness of the circumcised gentile must also render him acceptable to God, and rewardable by him, as well as the righteousness of the Jew.

[19] Ver. 26. Τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ νόμου, The righteousnesses or ordinances of the law.] The word δικαιώματα is used some times for the divine judgments, which being always done in equity, and according to the deserts of men, are fitly called δικαιώματα, or "righteous judgments," Rom. i. 32, Rev. xv. 4. And sometimes it relates to the ceremonial institutions which God thought fit for a season to prescribe to the Jews, and then it seems best to be rendered ordinances, as Heb. ix. 1. 10. And sometimes to the moral precepts of the law, as when the apostle saith, τὸ δικαίωμα τοῦ νόμου, "The righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," which seems to be the sense of the phrase here.

[20] Ver. 27. Ἡ ἐκ φύσεως ἀκροβυστία, The uncircumcision which is by nature.] Most interpreters think that the apostle speaks in these two verses of the believing gentile, and only doth design to prove against the Jew, that his want of circumcision, if he be a doer of righteousness, will not hinder his acceptance with God (1 Cor. vii. 19, Gal. v. 6, vi. 15), and that because this righteousness of the law is said to be fulfilled by them "who walk according to the Spirit" (viii. 4), i. e. by them "who are in Christ Jesus" (ver. 1). But Grotius and Œcumenius seem to interpret this of the heathens, such as the centurions in the gospel were, because the condemnation of the Jew seems to arise from this, that he who had the letter of the law did not that which they who were without it did.

CHAPTER III.

1 (But you will say, If the uncircumcised person, keeping the righteousness of the law, is to be reckoned as circumcised, ii. 26, and if the inward circumcision be that alone which is acceptable to God, ver. 28, 29,) What advantage then hath the Jew (above the gentile)? or what profit is there of (the) circumcision (above uncircumcision?

2 I answer,) Much every way: (ix. 4, but) chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God (in which the covenants and promises made to them, and chiefly that of the Messiah, and of justification by faith in him, were contained;

3 Which oracles must be made good notwithstanding their infidelity:) For what if some (to whom these oracles and the promise of the Messiah, or a seed in whom the nations of the earth shall be blessed, were committed,) did not believe (in the promised seed)? shall their unbelief make the faith (or fidelity) of God (in making this promise to Abraham) without effect?

4 God forbid (that such a thought should enter into our hearts): yea (Gr. but, on the contrary), let God be (acknowledged) true (and faithful to his word), but every man a liar (i. e. though all men should prove liars); as it is written (Ps. li. 4), [1] That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings (or mayest appear just and faithful in performing them), and mightest overcome when [2] thou art judged (i. e. when thou judgest and contendest with men).

5 But if our unrighteousness commend (illustrates and establishes) [3] the righteousness of God (that way of justification by faith which he alone approves of), [4] what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance (on the Jew and gentile, for these sins which thus commend his righteousness, and show the wisdom and grace of God in admitting this way of our justification)? [5] (I speak as a man) (i. e. as a heathen or unbeliever would be apt to conclude from our doctrine of justification by faith:

6 For) God forbid (that I should have a thought that God can be unrighteous): for then how shall God judge the world (for their unrighteousness?

7 Speak, I say their sense,) For (say they) if the truth of God hath more abounded [6] through my lie unto his glory (if the truth of his promise to justify the gentile through faith in Christ, hath appeared more illustriously to the glory of his grace, through my idolatry, and changing his truth into a lie); why yet am I also judged as a sinner (as well as the Jew)?

8 And (why will it) not rather (follow, ὅτι ποιήσωμεν), (as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that (in effect, by asserting the doctrine of justification by faith,) we say,) Let us do evil, that good may come (or that God may be glorified? which yet we are so far from saying, that we declare them who do so men) [7] whose damnation is just.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 4. Ὅπως ἂν δικαιωθῇς, That thou mayest be justified.] These words are a confession of king David, that how severely soever God should deal with him for his sin, he could not accuse him of too much rigour, but must justify him in his proceedings, and clear him from all imputations of injustice; and so they cannot be here brought to prove, as Esthius imagines, that notwithstanding our sins, God will be faithful to his promises, but to show, that though God should reject the Jews for their infidelity, they would have no reason to complain of his severity, or charge him with injustice or unfaithfulness on that account, they having forfeited their right to be the seed of Abraham, the father of the faithful, by their infidelity, and the gentiles, by imitating his faith, being now become his children. Note also, that the Hebrew זכך, which we render pure or clean, Ps. li. 4, is well rendered by the Septuagint νικήσῃς, "might overcome;" it bearing oft that sense in the Syriac, and among the rabbins, as Buxtorf proves in his Lexicon, p. 668.

[2] Ἐν τῷ κρίνεσθαί σε, Heb. בשפטך, When thou judgest,] Or contendest with any man, or enterest into judgment with him, or indictest or accusest him of sin; so the word is very often used in the Old and New Testament. So Job xiii. 19, τίς ἐστι ὁ κριθησόμενός μοι; "Who is he that will contend with me?" Eccles. vi. 10, οὐ δυνήσεται κριθῆναι, "He cannot contend with one who is stronger than himself;" Isa. xlii. 26, "Put me in remembrance," καὶ κριθώμεν, "and let us plead together;" Isa. lxvi. 16, ἐν τῷ πυρὶ κριθήσεται ὁ Κύριος, "By fire will the Lord plead with all flesh;" Matt. v. 40, Θέλοντί σοι κριθῆναι, "To him that will contend with thee;" 1 Cor. vi. 1, τολμᾷ τις κρίνεσθαι; "Dares any one contend before the unjust?" See note on 1 Pet. iv. 6.

[3] Ver. 5. Δικαιοσύνην Θεοῦ, The righteousness of God.] That this phrase in the epistles doth signify always the righteousness of faith, or our justification through faith in Christ, hath been shown, note on Rom. i. 17, and on 2 Cor. v. 21; and this seems to establish the exposition given in the paraphrase.

[4] Τί ἐροῦμεν; μὴ ἄδικος ὁ Θεὸς ἐπιφέρων τὴν ὀργήν, What shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance?] The apostle had laid down the proposition which is the foundation of this discourse, and of the whole epistle, in these words: "The gospel is the power of God to the salvation of every one that believes, Jew or gentile; for therein is revealed the righteousness of God by faith, to beget faith in both." The necessity of this faith he shows, (1.) with respect to the gentiles, because they, being unrighteous, could not otherwise be justified before God, or escape his wrath, "revealed against all unrighteousness," by any other way than that of faith; and this proof he concludes chapter the first. In the second chapter he shows the same, touching the Jews, by reason of their unrighteousness, and therefore saith here, ver. 9, "We have before proved both Jews and gentiles to be under sin." Now this most plainly serves to commend and establish this way of righteousness by faith in Christ, from the necessity of it to the justification both of Jew and gentile. This then must be the import of the objection; if the unrighteousness both of Jew and gentile tends so visibly to illustrate and recommend the wisdom of God, and the grace or favour of God, in appointing this way of justification by faith in Christ, is it righteous in God to punish both Jew and gentile, as you say he did (i. 24. 26. 32), and will do (i. 18, ii. 2. 4—6. 8, 9), for that unrighteousness that tends so highly to the glory of the gospel grace?

[5] Κατ' ἄνθρωπον λέγω, I speak as a man.] i. e. As a mere natural man, not acquainted with the revealed will of God, or not acted by his Spirit: so Chrysostom and Œcumenius, "I speak κατ' ἀνθρώπινον λογισμόν, according to human reason; οὐ γὰρ ἐγὼ ταῦτα λέγω, ἀλλὰ τῶν ἄλλων τέθεικα λογισμούς, for it is not I that say these things, but I propose the reasonings of others." That this is the constant import of the phrase see note on 1 Cor. ix. 8, 9. 15. 32.

[6] Ver. 7. Ἐν τῷ ἐμῷ ψεύσματι, By my lie.] The idols of the heathens are called "lying vanities," Ps. xxxi. 7, Jonah ii. 8, numina falsa; the makers of them are said to "frame שקר, a lie," Jer. x. 14, and to have and frame "a lie" with their right hand, Isa. xliv. 20. They who worship them are said, "to turn aside to lies," Ps. xl. 5, and to hearken to "a teacher of lies," Hab. ii. 18, and to "turn the truth of God into a lie," Rom. i. 25. Hence are the heathens introduced making this confession, "Surely our fathers did inherit lies," ὡς ψεῦδη ἐκτήσαντο οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν εἴδωλα, Jer. xvi. 19. Now this argument being that by which the apostle in the first chapter proves the gentiles to be sinners, worthy of condemnation, and so incapable of justification by any other way than that of faith, this may reasonably be supposed to be the thing referred to in this verse.

[7] Ver. 8. Ὧν τὸ κρίμα ἔνδικόν ἐστι, Whose damnation is

9 What then? (or wherefore) are we better than they? (Do we Jews excel the gentiles?) No, in no wise (οὐ πάντως, not altogether, as to the benefit mentioned, ver. 2, but not as to justification): for we have before proved (touching) both Jews (ch. ii.) and Gentiles (ch. i.), that they are all under sin (and so all stand in need of justification by faith;

10 The Jews, I say, as well as the gentiles,) As it is written (of them), There is none righteous, no, not one:

11 There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God.

12 They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

13 Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: (they are men)

14 Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness:

15 Their feet are swift to shed blood:

16 Destruction and misery are in their ways:

17 And the way of peace have they not known:

18 There is no fear of God before their eyes.

19 (Which words of the psalmist may justly be applied to them;) Now we know that what things soever the law saith (not applying the words to any others), it saith to them who are under the law: that (not only the mouths of the gentiles, but) every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may (see they are) become guilty before God.

20 Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the [10] knowledge of (that) sin (which rendereth us obnoxious to condemnation).

21 But now (in the dispensation of the gospel) the righteousness of God without (performing the works of) the law is manifested (to the world), being witnessed (i. e. attested to) by the law (giving us the knowledge of sin, ver. 20) and the prophets (declaring that the just man shall live by faith);

22 Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for (as to the way of justification) there is no difference (betwixt Jew and gentile):

23 For all have sinned, and (so) come short of (attaining) [11] the glory of God (without a free act of justification by grace);

24 Being justified (i. e. absolved from the guilt and condemnation due to us for our past sins) freely by his grace [12] through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus:

25 Whom God hath set forth (or proposed) to be [13] a propitiation (a propitiatory or mercy-seat) through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness (i. e. the way of justification by faith, which God alone admits of) [14] for the remission of sins that are past, through just.] They by thus objecting against that dispensation of divine grace and wisdom, which they should thankfully embrace and accept, and without which they cannot be justified, and so rejecting it as absurd in their imaginations, render it just that they should still lie under the guilt of sin, and under the wrath of God for it.

[8] Ver. 9. Οὐ πάντως, No, in no wise.] That these words may be rendered "not altogether," as well as οὐ πάντες is rendered "not all," 2 Thess. iii. 2, Heb. iii. 16, we learn from Œcumenius, who paraphrases them thus, οὐκ ἐκ παντὸς τρόπου, "not in every kind;"* so οὐ πάντως signifies, 1 Cor. v. 10, viz. "I do not altogether forbid you to accompany with fornicators, for then you must go out of the world;" and then the context will plainly force this rendering, as being that which answers to the following reason, the words bearing this sense: We do indeed excel them, in having the promise of a Messiah, and the salvation tendered by him, first made to us (ii. 10); in having the knowledge of the law (ver. 17), and the oracles of God committed to us (iii. 2): but we do not wholly or in all things excel them, because not in the matter of justification by faith, which Jew and gentile equally stand in need of.

[9] Ver. 10. Καθὼς γέγραπται, As it is written.] These words are cited from the fourteenth psalm, according to the edition of the Septuagint; but I do not conceive it necessary to make good the apostle's words, or argument, that they should be spoken of the Jews of that age in general, especially seeing they are there said to have "devoured God's people," and to have "shamed the counsel of the poor." It is enough (1.) that they should generally agree to the Jews of the age in which the apostle wrote, as both the scriptures of the New Testament and the writings of Josephus fully prove they do. And (2.) that the law condemning any for these crimes doth more especially condemn those under the law, who at any time are guilty of crimes thus noted, and condemned by the law. And with this conclusion of the apostle the Jews themselves accord, saying, "There is not a man who is not obnoxious to God (or might not justly be condemned by him), were it not for his mercy and clemency." Moreover, it is farther to be noted, that in the close of this psalm there seems to be a prayer for the redemption of the Jews by the Messiah, in those words, "O that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion," ver. 7, the Deliverer that was to come out of Zion, being the Messiah, as we learn from Isaiah, lix. 20, and from this apostle, xi. 26. Note, secondly, that, according to the doctrine of the Jews, their Messiah was to come in those times when the Jewish nation was most corrupt, and so most resembled the description here alleged (see the note on Phil. iii. 1).

[10] Ver. 20. Ἐπίγνωσις ἁμαρτίας, The knowledge of sin.] This knowledge of sin being chiefly by the moral law (vii. 7), shows that the apostle excludes as well that as the ceremonial from justification; and evident it is, that the antithesis runs all along, not between moral and ceremonial works, but between works in general and faith, ver. 20. 22, the law of works and faith, ver. 27, iv. 2. 6, ix. 32, x. 5, 6.

[11] Ver. 23. Τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ, The glory of God.] i. e. The fruition of God in glory; for "being justified by faith, we have peace with God; and rejoice in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 1, 2).

[12] Ver. 24. Διὰ τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως, Through the redemption.] Purchased by the death and blood of Christ shed for us; we having "redemption through his blood, the remission of sins" (Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14).

[13] Ver. 25. Τῶν προγεγονότων ἁμαρτημάτων, Of sins that are past.] For in this only consists our first justification, which is by faith alone: the remission of our future sins committed against the new covenant, established in the blood of Jesus, being to be obtained (if they be wilful sins, which only violate the covenant of grace) by a sincere and particular repentance for them; which brings us again under that covenant, and so under the promise of forgiveness through the blood of Jesus: the ἱλαστήριον, or "mercy-seat," was so called, because God there showed himself propitious, by reason of the blood of the sacrifice sprinkled before it. The apostle, therefore, in allusion to it, saith that God hath set forth Christ to be his "mercy-seat," i. e. the person through whom he will be propitious to us through faith in his blood, styled "the blood of sprinkling," Heb. xii. 24, and presented before him in the heavens.

[14] Ἱλαστήριον, To be a propitiation.] In the Old Testament we find the mercy-seat still styled ἱλαστήριον, because it was the place where God promised to be propitious to them, and where the high-priest made an atonement for himself, and all the congregation, by sprinkling the blood of the sin-offering before the mercy-seat: when therefore the apostle saith that God had set forth Jesus Christ to be a mercy-seat to us through faith in his blood, we have reason to believe the blood of Christ, as our sin-offering, doth make atonement for, and render God propitious to us. And as under the Old Testament, they who desired to have God propitious to them, were to come with the blood of their

the forbearance of God; (not imputing their trespasses to them who believe in him, 2 Cor. v. 19.

26 God hath now proposed him as our propitiatory,) [15] To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness (or the way of justification he allows of): that he (by justifying us only through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus) might (appear to) be [16] just (in requiring this satisfaction for our sins), and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus.

27 (And if this be the only way of justification, or being righteous before God,) Where is (there any ground of) boasting then? It is excluded? By what law? (that) of works? Nay: (for he that is justified by works hath whereof to boast, ἔχει καύχημα, iv. 2:) but by the law of faith (only).

28 Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by [17] faith (alone) without (respect to) the deeds of the law (given to the Jews. For)

29 Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles (which have not the law? hath he vouchsafed to them no means of justification or acceptance with him)? Yes, (doubtless he is the God) of the Gentiles also:

30 Seeing it is one God, which shall justify [18] the circumcision by faith, and (the) uncircumcision through (the same) faith.

31 Do we then make void the law through (this) faith? (Do we contradict it, or say it is a useless thing, or against the promises? Gal. iii. 19. 21.) God forbid (that this should be affirmed by us): yea, we establish the law (by declaring that it gives the knowledge of sin, ver. 20, gives witness to this way of justification, ver. 21, and so shows the necessity of faith, and so is our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, who is the end of the law, Rom. x. 4, Gal. iii. 24).

sin-offering to the mercy-seat; so under the gospel dispensation they must expect to find God propitious to them, through the blood of Christ their mercy-seat, by whom they coming to God, as the Jews did by appearing before his mercy-seat, should find him gracious in pardoning their iniquities "through the redemption that is in Jesus." Whence I argue against the Socinians, for our Lord's satisfaction, thus: What is it we do obtain by this redemption? It is, saith the apostle, "remission of sins." What is it that procures this remission? It is the blood of Christ, for "we have redemption through his blood, even the remission of sins" (Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14); it is the death of Christ (Heb. ix. 15). Since, then, by the confession of Schlictingius upon the place, our Lord is mentioned here as a piacular victim, and seeing it is certain those victims still suffered in the sinner's stead, and that whensoever in the Old Testament mention is made of the remission of sins, the blood of these sacrifices was the thing that made atonement for them, remission of sins was the thing purchased by that blood; have we not reason from what is here said of Christ, our piacular victim, to conceive he suffered in our stead, and that his blood, shed for us, procured the remission of our sins, as it atoned an offended God for our transgressions?

[15] Ver. 26. Τῆς δικαιοσύνης, To declare his righteousness.] This phrase, "the righteousness of God," as I have before observed, doth always in the epistles signify our justification by faith in Christ, as being the only righteousness that God approves of, and is here styled, ver. 22, "the righteousness of God through faith:" and therefore this righteousness cannot be demonstrated, as some conceive, by winking at the sins committed in former ages (Acts xvii. 30), but by proposing, by the gospel, the way of remitting men's past sins through faith in Christ, or his own non-imputation of them.

[16] Εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν δίκαιον, That he might be just.] The reverend Dr. Hammond saith, the word δίκαιος, is here to be rendered clement and merciful, and that it is commonly taken in that notion, and seldom in that of vindictive justice: but, in opposition to this I assert, that the word δίκαιος is used about eighty times in the New Testament, and not once in that sense of clemency and mercy in which he saith it is commonly taken: he himself produces but one place, viz. Matt. i. 19, "Joseph being a just man, and not willing to make Mary a public example, was minded to put her away privily:"—"Where," saith Dr. Lightfoot, "men torment the word δίκαιος, to make it signify clement and merciful, when it bears clearly the ordinary sense; thus, Joseph, being a just man, would not cohabit with an adulteress, and yet being not willing to make her a public example, and no necessity," as he there shows, "lying upon him so to do, he was minded to put her away privily." (2.) It is in the New Testament distinguished from the good and merciful man; as when Joseph of Arimathea is styled ἀγαθὸς καὶ δίκαιος, "a good man and just," Luke xxiii. 50; when the law is called δίκαια καὶ ἀγαθὴ, "just and good," Rom. vii. 12; and when it is said, v. 7, that scarcely ὑπὲρ δικαίου, "for a righteous man will one die, though ὑπὲρ ἀγαθοῦ, for a good man one would even dare to die." And (3.) when it relates to God, as here, it always signifies, either the equity and congruity of his dealings, as 2 Thess. i. 5, 6; or his faithfulness to his word, 1 John i. 9, Rev. xv. 3; or his vindictive justice, as Rev. xvi. 5—7, xix. 2, 2 Tim. iv. 8.

[17] Ver. 28. Πίστει, By faith.] Justification from our past sins is by faith alone, without respect to any of our works; we being "justified freely by his grace," ver. 23; "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but through his mercy he saved us," Titus iii. 5, i. e. he justified us by his grace, and so put us in the way of salvation.

[18] Ver. 30.] Note, that so the Jews say, "If a man believe not as he ought, circumcision will not make him a Jew; and if he believe as he ought, he is a Jew, though he be not circumcised." Nitzachon, sect. vii. sub. 21.

CHAPTER IV.

1 What shall we then say (Gr. what therefore do we say, as some of our nation,) that Abraham our father, [1] as pertaining to the flesh, hath found? (Gr. hath found justification and acceptance with God, by virtue of his circumcision in the flesh?

2 Surely, no;) For if Abraham were justified by (his

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. Κατὰ σάρκα, According to the flesh.] i. e. By virtue of his obedience to God's command, in circumcising the flesh of his foreskin. So Israel κατὰ σάρκα, "according to the flesh," 1 Cor. x. 18, is, Israel according to the circumcision of the flesh. To "know Christ according to the flesh," 2 Cor. v. 16, is to know him according to his circumcision, or being of the stock of Abraham. To glory κατὰ τὴν σάρκα, "according to the flesh," is to glory in being circumcised, 2 Cor. xi. 18. In this the Jews had the greatest confidence of being acceptable to God, and therefore are represented by St. Paul as πεποιθότες ἐν σαρκὶ, "having confidence in the flesh," Phil. iii. 3, 4, declaring, that "no circumcised Jews go to hell," God having promised to deliver them "for the merit of circumcision" (see the note on ii. 13). Moreover, that vain opinion had obtained among the Jews, that Abraham was not pure, or accepted with God, till after his circumcision. This is hinted in the Targum of B. Uziel, who renders Gen. xvii. 1, thus, "Walk before me, and be thou perfect בבשרך, in thy flesh:" but is in express words asserted, Pirk. Eliezer, cap. 29, p. 64. This opinion the apostle here confutes, and then, ver. 11, shows what his circumcision signified. Mr. Clerc interprets this phrase thus, "According to the flesh;" i. e. "in the judgment of man, or according to carnal judgment." But there own) works (i. e. his obedience to God's command to circumcise himself and his whole family), he hath whereof to glory (Gr. ground of boasting in those works by which he was thus justified); but (manifest it is he had) not (whereof to boast, or glory) before God.

3 For what saith the scripture? (even this,) [2] Abraham believed God, and it (viz. that faith) was counted unto him for righteousness.

4 Now (or whereas) to him that worketh (and by that obtaineth righteousness) is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt (he having performed all that was required, in order to his being righteous before God).

5 But to him that worketh not (i. e. who hath not any thing on account of which he can be deemed rightcous by virtue of his works), but believeth [3] on him that justifieth the ungodly (on the account of his faith), his faith is counted for righteousness.

6 (And this account of justification is) [4] Even (such) as David also (the other great person to whom God had promised a blessing to all nations through his seed, Isa. xi. 10, Acts ii. 30, xiii. 23) describeth (speaking of) the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works,

7 Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered.

8 Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute (the) sin (he hath committed).

9 Cometh this blessedness then (of righteousness, by not imputing sin) upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? (This question may be decided by the example of our father Abraham.) for we say that [5] faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness.

10 How was it then reckoned (to him for righteousness? was it) when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not (when he was) in circumcision, but in uncircumcision; (he believing unto righteousness before he was circumcised, Gen. xv. 6.)

can be nothing more alien from the mind of Paul than this interpretation: for the apostle had been before asserting, that circumcision, acceptable to God, was not that made in the flesh (ii. 28). In the beginning of the next chapter he answers the inquiry of the Jews; If it doth not render us more acceptable to God, what then is the benefit of circumcision? It hath many other advantages, saith he, but not that of justification before God, that being the result of faith; "for it is one (and the same) God who will justify the circumcision through faith, and the uncircumcision by faith." What then, saith he, do we say in this affair? Do we say, as the Jews, that Abraham, "the father of the faithful," found justification (the thing I now discourse of) κατὰ σάρκα, by that laborious work of circumcision, performed upon himself, when he was ninety-nine years old, and upon all his family? On which account, say the Jews,* "God smelt the sweet odour of their foreskins, and said, when they transgressed, he would remember this odour, and they should be replenished with his mercies." Here is a rational account of the connexion and pertinence of the apostle's argument. But how comes in the judgment of men with a τί οὖν; "What then do we say?" when nothing at all had been said of their judgment, nor was the apostle discoursing of justification according to man's carnal judgment. He goes on and says, "If Abraham was accounted just for his works in the judgment of men, he hath whereof to glory; he hath καύχημα, boasting," saith he, "before men:" but is that the καύχημα, or boasting, which the apostle said was excluded, "not by the law of works, but by the law of faith?" (iii. 27); no sure; but boasting before God: this therefore must be here repeated: If Abraham were justified by works, i. e. the works of circumcision performed upon himself and his whole family, he hath whereof to boast before God; but he cannot have whereof to boast before God of any justification of this kind, for "what saith the scripture," &c. In fine, κατὰ σάρκα never signifies in scripture, "the judgment of man," but the fleshly lustings, desires, and motions of men; John xviii. 5, to "judge according to the flesh," is to judge ex carnali affectū, "from carnal affection;" and 2 Cor. i. 17, "to purpose according to the flesh," is to do it according to carnal principles and advantages; as to "walk after the flesh," is to be governed and acted by carnal principles, Rom. viii. 1. 4, 5. 12, 13, 2 Cor. x. 2.

[2] Ver. 3. Ἐπίστευσε δὲ Ἀβραὰμ τῷ Θεῷ, Abraham believed God.] We learn from the author to the Hebrews, that Abraham had faith before this was said unto him, for "by faith Abraham being called, obeyed and went forth," &c. and that by a yet stronger faith he "offered up his son Isaac, believing that God was able to raise him up from the dead" (Heb. xi. 8. 17). But neither of these instances is pitched upon by the apostle, as fit for his purpose, because, in both, obedience was joined with faith; whereas here was a pure act of faith without works, and of this act of faith is said, what is not said of either of the other, "it was imputed to him for righteousness" (see ver. 22). (2.) God for this act of faith, and not upon the former, dealt with him as a righteous person, by entering into covenant with him, which was a sign that he accepted him, and pardoned all his sins past; for it is said, "In that very day God entered into covenant with Abraham" (Gen. xv. 18), which he had not done before. Moreover this was spoken to Abraham before his circumcision, and so is very proper to convince the Jews of the no necessity of circumcision to justification: but Abraham offered Isaac after his circumcision, and so the apostle could not allege that instance of his faith here (ver. 10, 11); he therefore was accounted righteous by virtue of that faith which excludes boasting (ii. 27), and only justifies by grace.

[3] Ver. 5. Ἐπὶ τὸν δικαιοῦντα τὸν ἀσεβῆ, On him that justifies the ungodly.] Justification being only the nonimputation or the pardon of their past sins on the account of that faith, which laid the highest obligations upon all believers to die unto sin for the future, there is no absurdity in saying, that God thus "justifies the ungodly," repenting of, and engaging to cease from, their ungodliness (ver. 6).

[4] Ver. 6. Even as David λέγει τὸν μακαρισμόν.] Speaks of the blessedness of those, to whom God imputeth δικαιοσύνην, justification, i. e. exemption from the guilt and punishment of sin, without such works as can justly plead for that exemption and freedom from punishment, by saying, "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth no sin." In which citation there is not one word of any work to make him righteous in the sight of God, and therefore blessed, but only of an act of free grace in the forgiveness or the nonimputation of his sin, in which the evangelical justification formally consists (see the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians, section the 4th).

[5] Ver. 9. Ἐλογίσθη τῷ Ἀβραὰμ ἡ πίστις, Faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness.] The gloss of R. Salmon on Gen. xv. 6 is this: "The blessed God reputed this to Abraham for righteousness and merit, for the faith by which he believed in him." And the book Ikkarim* saith thus: "Our father Abraham was praised for his faith, as saith the scripture, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness."

[6] Ver. 11. Σφραγῖδα τῆς δικαιοσύνης τῆς πίστεως τῆς ἐν τῇ ἀκροβυστίᾳ, The seal of the righteousness of faith, &c.] The apostle in this epistle insists much upon the justification of the uncircumcised gentiles, called therefore by the Jews ἡ ἀκροβυστία, "the uncircumcision" (Eph. ii. 11, Rom. ii. 25—27), declaring that God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the gentiles, seeing he will justify both the circumcision, and the uncircumcision through faith (iii. 29, 30); that the blessing of justification came not only on the circumcision but on the uncircumcision also (ver. 9), faith being accounted to Abraham for righteousness, when he was which he had yet being uncircumcised (and so of his acceptance with that God, who thus entered into covenant with him, and owned himself his God, Gen. xvii. 1): that he might be the [7] father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also (which it could not be, were circumcision the condition of justification and acceptance with God):

12 And (that he might be) the father of (the) circumcision (i. e. a father) to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised.

13 (I say, that he might be the father of the uncircumcised through faith, and of the circumcision through the like faith, iii. 30,) For the promise (made to Abraham, Gen. xii. 3, or to his seed, Gen. xxii. 18), that [8] he should be the heir of the world (i. e. of those blessings which should be derived from him to all the families and nations of the earth), was not (made) to Abraham, or to his seed, through (or by virtue of their obedience to) the law, but through (and by virtue of) the righteousness of faith.

14 For if they which are of the law be heirs (according to the promise made upon that account), [9] faith is made void (as being insufficient to justify without the law), and the promise made of none effect (for then the nations which are not under the law cannot be blessed in the seed of Abraham):

15 Because [10] the law worketh wrath (by condemning the transgressor to that death to which without the law he would not be subject): for where no law is, there is no transgression (and so no condemnation for it.

16 And (Therefore it (the inheritance, Gal. iii. 18) is of faith, that it might be by grace; (which both Jew and gentile wanted as to justification, iii. 23, 24,) to the end the promise (of it) might be sure to all the seed (of Abraham); not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; who is the father of us all (i. e. that it might be made good to the gentile also, believing as their father Abraham did.

17 I say the father of us all),(As it is written (Gen. xvii. 5), I have made thee a [11] father of many nations,) (which words, though spoken then when Abraham had no seed, yet were they certain,) before (or in respect of) him whom he believed, even (that) God, [12] who quickeneth the dead (and so was able to quicken his body, now dead, and the deadness of Sarah's womb), in uncircumcision (ver. 10). So that these words may be rendered thus, "And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of that faith which is in the uncircumcision;" i. e. of God's acceptance of the uncircumcised gentiles through faith in Christ.

[7] Πατέρα, The father.] i. e. That he might be the father of all nations, whether Jew or gentile, and they might all be blessed in him, according to the promise, "In thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," Gen. xii. 3, or as it is Gen. xxii. 18, "In thy seed."

[8] Ver. 13. Τὸν κληρονόμον αὐτὸν εἶναι τοῦ κόσμου, That he should be the heir of the world.] The whole difficulty of this verse rests upon the true interpretation of this phrase, "That he should be the heir of the world." Some think that to be "the heir of the world" here, is to be "heir of the land of Canaan," and the parts adjacent to it, Idumea, &c. But this is not only impertinent to the purpose of the apostle, who is here proving, not that temporal possessions, but that justification is not by the law, but by faith; but seemeth flatly contrary to the apostle; for the promise of the land of Canaan was made to Abraham on his circumcision, and to his seed (Gen. xvii. 7, 8), and the possession of, and their continuance in it, was still promised to the Jews, upon condition of their obedience to the law of Moses. Others think, that to be "heir of the world," is to be heir of the spiritual and heavenly Canaan: but then, as it is hard to find where any such promise is made to Abraham and his seed; so it is as difficult to show how this accords with the main scope of the apostle, which is to establish our justification by faith. The ancient Greek scholiasts interpret the words thus: That he should be heir of the world, τοῦτέστιν, ἐν αὐτῷ εὐλογεῖσθαι πάντα τὰ τοῦ κόσμου ἔθνη, i. e. "that all the nations of the world should be blessed in him." So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, Quod enim dicit, Benedicentur in te omnes tribus terræ, hoc est hæredem factum esse totius mundi: so Origen. And this is confirmed from the parallel place, Gal. iii. 8, for the promise mentioned here must be the same with the promise mentioned there, because the argument is the same. Now, (1.) the promise there is, "In thy seed," that is Christ, "shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (ver. 12). And (2.) he there speaks of a promise made four hundred and thirty years before the law, which term only agrees to the promise made Gen. xii. 3. (3.) This is the blessing of Abraham that was to come upon the gentiles, Gal. iii. 14; for, saith the apostle, "the scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the gentiles through faith (in the promised seed), preached the gospel before to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed: so then they that are of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." He first, as being the father of the faithful, and so the heir of the believing world; and they after him, as being his sons and seed, by walking in the steps of his faith, and so becoming heirs with him of the same promise; for "if you be Christ's," if by faith you be interested in him, saith the apostle, "then are you Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise," Gal. iii. 29; so Heb. xi. 7. Noah is said by his faith to condemn the unbelieving world, and to be τῆς κατὰ πίστιν δικαιοσύνης κληρονόμος, "the heir of righteousness which is by faith," i. e. the father of all that believed unto justification, or righteousness, after him.

[9] Ver. 14. If they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void.] It is made void to them who are not of the law, because then they cannot by it be made heirs; and it is also made void to them that are of the law, because they were heirs before, and may still be without it, ver. 15.

[10] Ver. 15. For the law worketh wrath.] To wit, to the transgressors of it: "for where there is no law, there is no transgression." It is a very great mistake to think, as some do, that the apostle lays down this as a general rule, that where there is no positive law to which threats and punishments are annexed, there is no transgression; for the plain consequence of this would be, that the heathens, having no positive law, could be guilty of no transgression, whereas the scripture represents them as dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. ii. 1, Col. ii. 13), as persons who shall be judged hereafter "according to their works" (Rom. ii. 6), and shall receive "tribulation and wrath" for working evil (ver. 9), who sin "without (a positive) law," and shall therefore perish without law (ver. 12), and as men, who are "condemned in their own consciences by the law written in their hearts" (ver. 15). The apostle therefore must be only conceived to prove from this general rule, that where there is no law at all, there is no transgression; and that if the law of Moses worketh wrath, there must be a transgression of it rendering men obnoxious to the death it threateneth (ver. 19, 20, vide Examen Millii).

[11] Ver. 17. A father of many nations.] The Jews hence prove that a proselyte, converted to the Jewish faith, might be legatus synagogæ, quia scriptum extat, Constitui te patrem universitatis gentium, "because it is written (Gen. xvii. 5), I have made thee a father of all nations:" before this time, say they, he was only a father of the Syrians; but from this time, he was the father of all nations (see Campegius Vitringa de Synag. Vet. lib. iii. par. ii. cap. 6, p. 943).

[12] Τοῦ ζωοποιοῦντος τοὺς νεκροὺς, Who quickeneth the dead.] This being an instance of the faith of Abraham, it seems most reasonable to refer to the object of this faith, viz. that he should have a numerous seed; yea, that he should have the promised seed from Sarah, though her womb was dead; "and it ceased to be with her after the manner of women;" and so Hilary the deacon doth interpret this phrase and [13] calleth those things which be not (i. e. the gentiles, which were not then a people) as though they were.

18 Who [14] against (all natural grounds of) hope believed in hope, that he might (Gr. should) become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken (to him, Gen. xv. 5, As the stars of heaven) so shall thy seed be.

19 And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body [15] now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, (or grown already dead, he being about one hundred years old,) neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: (with whom it had ceased to be after the manner of women, Gen. xviii. 11:)

20 He [16] staggered not at (Gr. he doubted not of) the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God (by acknowledging his power to make it good);

21 And being fully persuaded that, what he had promised, he was able also to perform.

22 And therefore it (viz. this strong faith) was imputed to him for righteousness.

23 [17] Now it was not written (thus of him) for his sake alone, that it (viz. his faith) was imputed to him (for righteousness);

24 But for (the benefit of) us also, to whom it (viz.

[13] Καλοῦντος τὰ μὴ ὄντα, ὡς ὄντα, And calleth things that be not as if they were.] "He that is far from God," saith Origen, "as we gentiles were before we came to the knowledge of the truth, is said not to be;" and therefore God, designing to render them the seed of Abraham by faith, is said to "call those things that be not, as if they were:" for τὰ μὴ ὄντα, "things which are not," both in the language of the Old Testament, and of the Jews, and of the primitive Christians, signifies the gentiles, by converting whom, saith Clemens R.,* ἐκάλεσεν ἡμᾶς οὐκ ὄντας, καὶ ἐθέλησεν ἐκ τοῦ μὴ ὄντος εἶναι ἡμᾶς, "God called us that were not, and would that of nothing we should have a being;" as I have shown, note on 1 Cor. i. 8.

[14] Ver. 18.] Note, that this verse confirms the exposition of the former verse, showing that the faith there mentioned hath reference to this promise.

[15] Ver. 19. Νενεκρωμένον, Now dead.] It is here objected, that Abraham's body could not be thus dead, since after the death of Sarah, even forty years after, he had six sons by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 1). But they who here tell us, that Abraham's body was not simply dead, but only as to Sarah's womb, and that by a young woman he was able to have seed then, speak expressly against the text, which saith, "his body was grown dead," and against the opinion of Abraham himself, Gen. xvii. 17, and of Sarah concerning him, Gen. xviii. 12. They who add that this need not seem strange, that Abraham should have children by Keturah, considering the age to which he had lived, since in our time men have had children after they have been seventy or eighty years old; they will not suffer that to be strange to us which seems strange to Abraham himself; witness his answer to the promise of Almighty God, "Shall a child be born to him that is a hundred years old?" Gen. xvii. 17, "O that Ishmael might live before thee!" and to Sarah, Gen. xviii. 12. They deny the miracle effected by the great power of God, which therefore the angel doth encourage Sarah to believe, because "nothing can be too hard for God" (Gen. xviii. 13). They lessen the faith of Abraham which is so highly magnified here, as being "hope against hope" (ver. 18), "believing in him that quickeneth the dead" (ver. 17), not "staggering at the promise, but being strong in faith" (ver. 20). That therefore must be here acknowledged, which the Jewish doctors and all the Christian fathers say, that God gave a new blessing to their bodies, and by that rendered them capable of getting and bearing children, when by nature they were not so. This of Sarah, the Targum of B. Uziel hints, by paraphrasing the words thus, Gen. xvii. 16, "As for Sarah, I will bless her, בגופה, in her body." And the apostle more plainly in these words, "Through faith also Sarah herself receiveth strength to conceive seed" (Heb. xi. 11).

[16] Ver. 20. Οὐ διεκρίθη τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ, He doubted not through unbelief.] It seems, his faith was not without some doubting, from that answer he returns to God, "Shall a child be born to Abraham, that is a hundred years old? And shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear?" In which words he seems to consider both "his own dead body, and Sarah's dead womb," which the apostle here denies, ver. 18, and ver. 19, he says to God, "O that Ishmael might live before thee!" as if he expected no other offspring. To the first objection it is answered that those words, "Shall a child be born to Abraham?" are to be considered as words of admiration, not of doubting; for he rejoiced at it, saith the Chaldee, and the Hebrew word, which we render "laughed," hath this import, xxi. 6. Nor is Abraham reprehended for it, as Sarah is, xviii. 13, John viii. 56. To the second it is answered, That he only desires God to bless him also, as well as the seed promised, which appears probable from God's answer, Gen. xvii. 20, "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee: behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful."

[17] Ver. 23—25.] Note, That from these last three verses many things may be observed, which tend to the illustration of the doctrine of faith, and of justification by faith. And,

First, From ver. 3. 22, 23, 24, it is extremely evident, that it is the very act of faith, and not the object of it, viz. Christ's righteousness, which was imputed to Abraham, and is imputed to us for righteousness. As then the faith of Abraham, which is here said to be imputed to him for righteousness, was not the obeying God in his commands of "walking before him, and being perfect," but, as is here expressly said, his believing God's power, and his reliance on it without any doubting, was the thing that was imputed to him for righteousness, as well as that other act of faith, that "in his seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed:" so the faith that shall be imputed to us for justification, is not, saith the apostle, that which includeth the performance of sincere obedience, not only faith in the blood of Christ shed for the remission of our sins; but faith in him that raised up Jesus from the dead, that he will raise us also from the dead, and glorify us with him (see the note on Rom. x. 9). So also is the faith of Abraham and Sarah represented, Heb. xi. 11.

Secondly, Hence also we learn that our justification depends not only on the death of Christ, but on his resurrection: so the apostle doth again teach us, saying, "Who is he that condemneth us? it is Christ that died (as a piacular victim for our sins), yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God (presenting the blood of this victim in his presence for us) who (by it) also maketh intercession for us." For the clearing up of this matter, let it be noted,

First, That as the victim offered under the Old Testament was brought to the altar, and there slain; so Christ, offering himself for us, was also brought to the altar of the cross on which he suffered, as a piacular victim for us, "bearing our sins in his own body on the tree."

Secondly, As the blood of the beast thus slain was to be brought before the mercy-seat, or into the holy of holies, and there presented before God to make atonement with; so was the blood of Christ, thus slain also, to be carried into the heavenly sanctuary, and there presented before God to make atonement for our sins.

Thirdly, As the beast, when dead, could not offer up its own blood; so Christ, being dead, could not, before his resurrection, make an offering of his own blood, in the heavens for this end; whence the apostle tells us that "such a high-priest became us, who is higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 26). And were the opinion of some true, that Christ appeared not with his blood in the heavens, he must be only a metaphorical high-priest, the offering or presenting of the blood before God being only the proper office of the priesthood, and the parallel the apostle makes betwixt him and the Aaronical priests must be wholly overthrown: for with what congruity could the apostle insist so much on the comparison betwixt the blood of Christ brought into the heavenly tabernacle, and the blood of the legal sacrifices brought into the earthly tabernacle, if indeed the blood of Christ was not carried into the true tabernacle, and there the like faith) shall be imputed (for righteousness), if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead (that he can and will raise us also by Jesus from the dead, and crown us with him);

25 Who was delivered (to the death) for our offences (to offer up himself a piacular victim for them), and was raised again for our justification (i. e. to appear before God with the blood of this victim, to make atonement before God for us, and thereby to procure our justification, or our absolution from the guilt of sin).

presented to God? When the apostle saith so oft, the Jewish "high-priest entered into the holy place with the blood of bulls and goats," doth he not mean that he carried their blood in thither? When then the same apostle saith, "Christ, not by the blood of bulls and goats, but διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου αἵματος, by his own proper blood, entered into the holy place," must he not also mean that Christ carried his own blood into the heavenly sanctuary?

CHAPTER V.

1 Therefore being justified by faith (and so absolved from those sins which rendered us obnoxious to the displeasure of God), we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ:

2 By whom also we have access by faith into this (state of) grace (or favour of God) wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of (the fruition of) the glory of God.

3 And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience;

4 And patience, (gives) experience (of God's power with us, enabling us to bear these tribulations, and of our sincere affection to him, for whose sake we suffer them); and experience (of these things, worketh in us) hope (of a reward):

5 And hope maketh (us) not ashamed (of our faith in Christ, Rom. i. 16); because (a sense of) [1] the love of God is [2] shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us (believers, as the earnest of our future inheritance, Eph. i. 14, iv. 30, and the fruit of our faith, Eph. i. 13, Gal. iii. 14.

6 Of which love to us, even before we believed, the gospel gives us the highest demonstrations;) For when we [3] were yet without strength, in due time (Gr. we being fallen at the appointed time) Christ died for the ungodly, (for us, who since our fall had no righteousness of our own.

7 Which surely is a high degree of love, beyond all human example;) For scarcely for a righteous man will one die (I say, for a righteous man only): yet peradventure for a [4] good (i. e. a highly kind and charitable) man some would even dare to die.

8 But [5] God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

9 (And if God through Christ Jesus showed such kindness to us, being sinners,) Much more then, being now justified by his blood (and so made righteous in his sight, and having peace with God, ver. 1,) we shall be saved from (the) wrath (of God) through him.

10 For if, when we were enemies (to him), we were [6] reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved [7] by his life.

[2] Ἐκκέχυται, Is shed abroad.] This is the word still used in the New Testament, when speaking of the effusion of the Holy Ghost, Acts ii. 17, x. 45, Titus iii. 6, and it is taken from Joel ii. 28, 29, and so this may refer to the χαρίσματα of the Holy Ghost, so liberally imparted to them.

[3] Ver. 6. Ὄντων ἡμῶν ἀσθενῶν, When we were weak.] It may here be noted, that the words ἀσθενὴς, ἀσθενέω, ἀσθένεια, in the LXX. answer to the Hebrew כשל, and signify to fall, and stumble to our ruin. So Ps. ix. 3, "They shall fall and perish, ἀσθενήσουσι καὶ ἀπολοῦνται, at thy presence;" Ps. xxvi. 4, "They stumbled and fell," ἠσθένησαν καὶ ἔπεσον. Ps. cvi. 12, ἠσθένησαν, "They fell down, and there was none to help them;" Prov. xxiv. 16, "The wicked shall fall into mischief," ἀσθενήσουσι ἐν κακοῖς. Jer. vi. 21, "I will lay stumblingblocks before this people, and the fathers and sons shall fall together," ἀσθενήσουσι ἐν αὐτῇ· xviii. 15, xlvi. 6. 12, and ver. 16, "He made many to fall," τὸ πλῆθός σου ἠσθένησε, l. 32, Lam. v. 15; Dan. xi. 14, "Many shall stand up against the king of the south, but they shall fall," ἀσθενήσουσι. So ver. 19. 33—35; so Hosea iv. 5, v. 5, xiv. 2. 10. And this import of the word suits well with the text, and so is proper to represent our fall by sin; and the words following, ver. 8, ἁμαρτωλῶν ὄντων ἡμῶν, "Even whilst we were sinners Christ died for us," do render it so probable, that I thought fit to mention it in the paraphrase.

[4] Ver. 7.] Ἀγαθοῦ is not only a virtuous, but an obliging, charitable man, Matt. xx. 15, "Is thy eye evil because I am good?" "Overcome evil ἐν τῷ ἀγαθῷ with kindness," Rom. xii. 21. Τὸ ἀγαθόν σου, is "thy kindness," Philem. 14. So ἀγαθὸς ὀφθαλμὸς is "the liberal eye," Ecclus. xxxv. 8. See Buxtorf. in voce טוב, p. 1601.

[5] Ver. 8. Συνίστησι δὲ ὁ Θεὸς, But God commends his love to us.] The death of Christ is usually in scripture represented as an instance of the great love of God the Father to us, because his wisdom did contrive this way of redemption for us (Eph. i. 4, 5); "he sent his Son into the world to be the propitiation for our sins, that we might live through him" (1 John iv. 9, 10); he graciously accepted of his suffering in our stead, and justifies us "freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. iii. 24); "He spared not his own Son, but gave him up freely for us all" (Rom. viii. 32): though it be also true, that "Christ loved us, and gave himself for us" (Gal. ii. 20, Eph. v. 2); and that this "love of Christ" ought to "constrain us" to obedience (2 Cor. v. 14).

[6] Ver. 10. Ἐν τῇ ζωῇ αὐτοῦ, By his life.] He being able to "save us to the uttermost," because "he ever lives to make intercession for us" (Heb. vii. 25); and having all power committed to him, "that he might give eternal life to them whom God hath given him" (John xvii. 2).

[7] Κατηλλάγημεν τῷ Θεῷ, We were reconciled to God.] Here are many arguments to establish the doctrine of our Lord's satisfaction by suffering in our stead, to reconcile an offended God to us. For,

First, When it is here said that "Christ died for the ungodly," 1 Pet. iii. 18, that "when we were yet sinners Christ died for us," 1 Cor. v. 15, and elsewhere, that "he suffered for our sins, the just for the unjust," Heb. i. 9, 1 Pet. iv. 1, in these and such-like places, one of these two things is intimated, that our Lord suffered in our stead, or that he bore the punishment of our sin: this being the plain import of the like expressions when they are used in the Old or New Testament. For when we read in the Old Testament, "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin," Deut. xxiv. 17; of Amaziah, that he "slew those servants that had murdered the king his father, but the children of those murderers he slew not," according to those words of Moses, "The fathers shall not be put to death," οὐκ ἀποθανοῦνται, "they shall not die for the children," &c., 2 Kings xiv. 6, 2 Chron. xxv. 4, and in the prophet Ezekiel, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die; the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, nor shall the father bear the iniquity of the son," Ezek. xviii.; in all these places it is plain no substitution is intended, because no exemption of the 11 And not only so (i. e. we are not only reconciled to), but we also joy (Gr. we are rejoicing) in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom [8] we have now received the atonement (or reconciliation).

12 Wherefore (διὰ τοῦτο, by reason of this reconciliation, life is procured to us by the second Adam, as death came by the first, for) as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin (or for sin); and so death passed upon all men (through him), [9] for that all have (so far) sinned (as to become equally obnoxious to death with him: so the second Adam came to deliver all men from the death procured by him:

13 Through him, I say,) (For (it must indeed be confessed, that) until the law sin was in the world: but father, because the son, or of the son, because the father suffers: but then it is plainly intimated that the one in this case would bear the punishment of the other's sin. But when David saith concerning Absalom, "Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom," τίς ἐδῴ τὸν θάνατόν μου ἀντί σου; 2 Sam. xviii. 33, "O that my death might have gone instead of thine!" when here the apostle saith that "scarcely for a righteous person one would die, but for a good man some would even dare to die;" there evidently a substitution is intended of the one to free the other from death by the death he suffers. When therefore the apostle before and after these words saith, "Christ died for the ungodly" and the sinner, must he not also signify that our Lord died in their stead, to deliver them from death? It is evident, beyond exception, that in all piacular sacrifices, both Jew and gentile always took this for granted, that the victim suffered in their stead, and for their sins. Since then the Socinians own that our Lord suffered as victima piacularis, or "an expiatory sacrifice," surely both Jew and gentile must conceive that all these phrases did import that our Lord suffered in our stead, and for our sins.

Secondly, A second argument is taken from the "reconciliation," mentioned as the effect of our Lord's suffering for us; for seeing it is alone the guilt of sin, or sin unpardoned, that maketh God displeased with us, the death which is here said to "procure our peace and reconciliation" to God, must make atonement for the guilt of our iniquities.

Crellius replies, that by "reconciliation" here the apostle intends not God's reconciliation to us, but ours to God, by that conversion to him, which maketh us at friendship with him. But this may be refuted,

First, From the import of the words καταλλάττειν and καταλλαγὴ, for they do naturally import the reconciliation of one that is angry or displeased with us, both in profane and Jewish writers; thus, ἐν τίνι διαλλαγήσεται; "In what shall David reconcile himself to his lord?" 1 Sam. xxix. 4. When Apame, the famous concubine, was angry with king Darius, he flattered her ὅπως διαλλαγῇ αὐτῷ, that "she might be reconciled to him," 1 Esd. iv. 21. After the reviling or falling out of friends, ἐστὶ διαλλαγὴ "there is, or may be, reconciliation," saith the son of Sirach, Ecclus. xxii. 22. The Jews in Egypt pray for those in Judea, that the Lord would hear their prayer, καὶ καταλλαγείη, "and be reconciled to them," 2 Macc. i. 5, adding, that as Jerusalem was forsaken through the wrath of the Almighty, so ἐν τῇ τοῦ μεγάλου Δεσπότου καταλλαγῇ, "when the great God was reconciled, it was set up with glory," v. 20. And again, though the Lord, say they, be angry with us a little while for our chastisement and correction, πάλιν καταλλαγήσεται, "he will again be reconciled to his servants," vii. 33. And they beseech the Lord εἰς τέλος καταλλαγῆναι, "to be reconciled to his servants for ever," viii. 29. Whence we learn, that reconciliation always respecteth some preceding anger or displeasure; and that the reconciling of God was the appeasing of his anger: when therefore we here read in the same words of "enemies reconciled to God," and so "saved from his wrath," what can we imagine, but that a God once angry and offended with them is now appeased? And when we farther read, that this reconciliation was effected by the death and blood of Christ, is it not obvious to conceive his wrath and anger was averted by the shedding this blood for us?

Secondly, It is evident that "when we were sinners Christ died for us," ver. 8, and "when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son," ver. 10, are words of the same import; for seeing these words "Christ died for us," and "Christ shed his blood for us," signify the same thing, and by his blood shed we are reconciled; it is evident that "Christ dying for us," and "Christ reconciling us by his death," or blood shed for us, must be the same; now we are "justified by his blood," as it procures our "peace with God," ver. 1, as it "saves us from his wrath," ver. 9. Therefore we are reconciled to God by it on the same account.

Thirdly, We being here considered as "sinners," "ungodly," "enemies to God," as persons who have, upon that account, "fallen short of the glory," that is, saith Crellius, "of the approbation of God" (Rom. iii. 23), is there no need of reconciling God unto such persons? And when under these circumstances we are said to be "justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. iii. 25, 26), and "being justified, to have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," can we conceive that nothing was done by this Jesus to procure God's reconciliation to the sinner, or to purchase his peace with an offended God? Especially if we consider that the death of Christ here mentioned, as that by which we are reconciled to God, is the death of him who suffered as a sin-offering for us; the blood, by which we are justified, is the blood of atonement, or propitiation, or the "blood shed to make reconciliation for the sins of the people" (Heb. ii. 17).

[8] Ver. 11. Τὴν καταλλαγὴν ἐλάβομεν, We have received the atonement.] Crellius excepts against this interpretation, alleging that to "receive or obtain reconciliation" is a phrase unknown to Jew and gentile; and would have the words rendered thus, "By whom we have obtained this conversion to God:" but to obtain reconciliation, when it is the effect of blood shed for the remission of sins, is very proper; for it was the constant practice under the law to procure reconciliation by shedding the blood of the sin-offering; and all nations by this means endeavoured to reconcile God to them, and what reconciliation the priest, by offering this blood, procured, the sinner received and obtained; and therefore to "receive atonement" or "obtain reconciliation" by an expiatory sacrifice, must be a thing very well known to Jew and gentile: but to receive conversion by it, is indeed a phrase unknown to them, and the whole church of Christ. Moreover, this note of Crellius shows his little skill in the Greek, for as θάρσος λαμβάνειν is "to be courageous," Acts xxviii. 15, ἀρχὴν λαμβάνειν is "to begin," λῆθην λαμβάνειν is "to forget," Heb. ii. 3, ὑπόμνησιν λαμβάνειν "to remember," 2 Tim. i. 5, πεῖραν λαμβάνειν "to experiment," Heb. ix. 36, οἰκοδομὴν λαμβάνειν "to be edified," 1 Cor. xiv. 15, so καταλλαγὴν λαμβάνειν is "to be reconciled," as noxam capere is "to be hurt."

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐφ' ᾧ, In whom.] The critics have been very industrious to find some other sense of these words than that which our translation gives, some rendering this last clause, "for that," some, "because all have sinned." But our exposition is confirmed beyond all contradiction from the following words, which declare, that "by the sin of one man, many die;" and that "by the sin of one, death reigned by one;" and that "by one offence the sentence of death came upon all," ver. 15—18. All which are parallel to the expression here, that death came upon all men through Adam, "in whom," saith the same apostle, "all men die" (1 Cor. xv. 22). And the words following, that "by the disobedience of one many were made sinners," are plainly parallel to these, "in whom all have sinned."

2. None of the other senses are true, or suitable to the scope and argument of the apostles; v. g. It is not true that death came upon all men, "for that," or "because" all have sinned. For the apostle directly here asserts the contrary; viz. that the death, and condemnation to it, which befell all men, was for the sin of Adam only: for here it is expressly said that "by the sin of one man many died;" that "the sentence was for one," and "by one man sinning to condemnation;" and that "by the sin of one death reigned by one;" therefore the apostle doth expressly teach us that this death, this condemnation to it, came not upon us for the sin of all, but only for the sin of one, i. e. of that one Adam, "in whom all men die" (1 Cor. xv. 22).

(it must also be acknowledged that) sin is not [10] (generally then) [11] imputed (to death) when there is no law (condemning men to death for it).

14 Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses (the giver of a new law, threatening death to the transgressors of it), even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression (i. e. men were all the while subject to death, though they sinned not as Adam did against an express law, threatening death to them for it, and therefore death must reign over them for the sin of Adam), who (in this) is the figure (or resemblance) of him (i. e. of the second Adam, Christ) that was to come.

15 But (in this resemblance there are two advantageous dissimilitudes; for) not as the offence, so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one [12] many be dead (Gr. died), much more the grace of God, and the gift (of justification procured) by (or through) grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.

He also farther teacheth, that this death and condemnation came upon all for one sin of that one man, for it came, δι' ἑνὸς παραπτώματος, "by one offence" upon all men; it came not therefore upon all men for the sin of all: and this the comparison plainly requires, which saith, the opposite justification and free gift came upon all men "by one man, Jesus Christ;" "by the obedience of one," and δι' ἑνὸς δικαιώματος, "by one righteousness," ver. 16—19, i. e. by the obedience to the death of that one man. Yea, the apostle doth,

3. Not only thus plainly and frequently assert that death came upon all men for the sin of Adam, but he proves it by this argument; that "death reigned from Adam to Moses, over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression;" i. e. against a law threatening death to them for sin; they therefore, saith he, could not die for their own sins: for though indeed they were then sinners, yet being under no such law as Adam was, their sin was not imputed to death, and so they could not die on that account; death therefore came upon them, as I asserted, through the sin of Adam.

[10] Ver. 13.] I add, generally: because though all men died after Adam, all were not punished with death for their own personal sin, but only the antediluvians and the Sodomites.

Here also note, that the apostle cannot be rationally conceived to assert, as Mr. L. suggests, that "no man can incur a penalty without the sanction of a positive law declaring and establishing that penalty." For this assertion entirely destroys the obligation of the heathens to perform any duty, since no man can be obliged to do that, which he may omit without fear of punishment, and renders the heathens, who had no positive law given them, incapable of incurring any penalty by any sins they had committed. The meaning therefore of the apostle seems to be only this, that the law threatening death to Adam, being not made to all mankind, but to him alone, all men, good and bad, could not then generally die for their own sins; but this mortality fell on them all without distinction in that interval on the account of that one sin of Adam, which rendered all his posterity subject to that mortality he had incurred by his sin; wherefore to say that all men were not subject to mortality by reason of the sin of Adam, would be to contradict Paul: but to say that they, who were swept away by the flood with an untimely death, did not die for their own, but for Adam's sin, is to contradict God himself, saying, "I will destroy man from the earth, for the iniquity of man is very great," &c. (Gen. v.)

[11] Ἁμαρτία δὲ οὐκ ἐλλογεῖται, Sin was not imputed.] The apostle doth not mean that God did not account them sinners who transgressed against the law of nature, or that he was not displeased with them for their offences, but only that he did not so impute them as to condemn them to death for them. To make this out, and to give you the true import of the word "imputation," let it be observed,

First, That wherever this phrase occurs affirmatively, that such a thing was "imputed" to any one, it is some personal thing or action of our own, and not any thing of another's which is thus said to be imputed. As when it is said, Rom. ii. 26, that "if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, his uncircumcision" on that account εἰς περιτομὴν λογισθήσεται, "shall be accounted for circumcision," i. e. he shall be accepted as well as if he were circumcised. So Rom. iv. 3, "Abraham believed God, and it (that is, his faith) was imputed to him for righteousness:" for so it is explained, ver. 5, "To him that worketh not, but believeth, his faith is imputed to him for righteousness:" and ver. 9, "We say that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness" (see Gal. iii. 6, James ii. 23). And of our faith in him that raised Christ from the dead, it is said, Rom. iv. 24, that "it shall be imputed to us for righteousness."

Secondly, When the phrase is used with a negative, or when sin is said to be imputed, or not to be imputed, it is not only a man's own personal sin that is intended; but the nonimputation of it is the not inflicting some condign punishment upon him for it. So Rom. iv. 8, "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth no sin;" which being spoken on the account of God's heavy hand on David for his sin, Ps. xxxii. 2—4, shows that the import of it must be this; Blessed is the man whom God doth not punish for his iniquity. So 2 Tim. iv. 16, "In my first answer no man stood by me, μὴ αὐτοῖς λογισθείη, may it not be imputed to them," i. e. let them not suffer for it. So 2 Sam. xvi. 19, Shimei speaks to David thus, μὴ λογισάσθω ὁ κύριός μου ἀνομίαν, "Let not my lord impute to me mine iniquity;" i. e. let him not remember it to punish it. When therefore it is said, 2 Cor. v. 19, that "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, μὴ λογιζόμενος, not imputing to them their iniquities;" the meaning is, that for Christ's sake he was pleased to exempt them from the punishment of their transgressions: so in like manner here, sin is said not to be imputed, whilst there is no law; not that God did not look upon men then as sinners, but that he did not punish them with death for it, but that they died a mere death, as being the offspring of Adam made mortal.

Hence note, that in the scripture there is no mention of the imputation, either of one man's sin, or of his righteousness, unto another, but only of the imputation of his good deeds for righteousness, or of his evil deeds for punishment. Secondly, that the punishment of Adam's sin devolved upon his whole posterity, is fully proved from this chapter: but it is not here said that they were truly and formally made sinners by his sin. So likewise, that for the obedience of one unto the death many were made righteous, and were delivered from that death to which they were obnoxious, we are assured from this and other scriptures; but that they were made formally righteous by our Saviour's righteousness imputed to them, the scripture doth nowhere assert.

[12] Ver. 15. Οἱ πολλοὶ ἐπέθανον, Many were dead.] When God said to Adam, "In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die," he did not mean that he should then give up the ghost, but that he should be subject to mortality, and at the last return to the dust from whence he came; as experience showed, and as the fathers interpret it. Now in this sense, that of the apostle is most true, that in Adam all die, i. e. became obnoxious to mortality; but it is not true that all men die only on the account of Adam's sin. The old world was drowned on the account of their own sins, and the Jews suffered both by the hand of God and man, for sins committed against the law; and this perhaps might be the reason why the apostle saith, not by the offence of one "all," but "many," died. The advantage therefore here mentioned, may consist in this, that all that die, die not purely for the sin of Adam, but many times bring death upon themselves for their own sin; but all that are justified, and so freed from death, are thus exempted from it only by virtue of the death of Christ. This is the doctrine both of the Jews and of the church of Christ: not that all formally sinned in Adam, but that all men became obnoxious to death for Adam's sin. "God," saith the author of the book of Wisdom, "created man to be immortal; but through the envy of the devil death entered into the world," Wisd. ii. 23, 24; "By the woman was the beginning of sin, and by her we all die," saith the son of Sirach, Ecclus. xxv. 24; "By the counsel which the serpent gave to Eve, all the in-

16 And (again) not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment (Gr. the sentence) was by one (sin) to condemnation (we being all sentenced to death on the account of Adam's sin), but the free gift is of [13] many offences unto (that) justification (of which cometh life).

17 For if by one man's offence death reigned by (that) one (man over all his posterity); much more they which receive (or are made partakers of) abundance of grace and (by it) of the [14] gift of righteousness (or justification) shall reign in life by (the reconciliation purchased for them by the death of) one, Jesus Christ.)

18 Therefore as by the offence of one (Gr. by one offence) judgment (Gr. sentence) came upon all men to (the) condemnation (of death); even so by the righteousness of one (by one righteous act, the obedience of Christ to the death for us) the free gift came upon all men (believing in him) unto justification of life.

19 For as by one man's disobedience many were [15] made sinners (being made subject to the death, which was inflicted upon Adam for sin, as much as if they themselves had violated the law which rendered him obnoxious to it), so by the obedience of one (suffering death, the punishment of sin, for them) shall many be made righteous (i. e. be as truly justified, and exempted from habitants of the earth became obnoxious to death," saith the Targum on Ruth iv. ver. ult. And the same Chaldee paraphrase upon Eccles. vii. the last verse, saith, "God made man pure and upright, but the serpent and Eve seduced him to eat of the fruit of the tree, and so they made death to rush upon him, and upon all the inhabitants of the earth."

[13] Ver. 16. Ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων, From many offences.] This is the second advantageous difference, viz. that whereas we became obnoxious to death for the sin of Adam, we by faith in Christ are justified, and thereby freed not only from the condemnation which came upon us for that sin, but also from the condemnation due unto us for all our offences against God.

Note also, that the word κρίμα, especially when it is joined with death, doth usually signify a sentence condemning any person; κρίμα θανάτου is "the sentence of death," Deut. xxi. 22. So Luke xxiv. 20, "The high-priests and rulers delivered up Jesus, εἰς κρίμα θανάτου, to the sentence of death," see xxiii. 40: Ecclus. xli. 2, "O death, how acceptable is τὸ κρίμά σου, thy sentence to the needy!" and, ver. 3, "Fear not κρίμα θανάτου, the sentence of death. Remember them that have been before thee, and that come after thee, τοῦτο τὸ κρίμα παρὰ Κυρίου πάσῃ σαρκὶ, for this is the sentence of the Lord over all flesh."

[14] Ver. 15. Ἡ δωρεὰ ἐν χάριτι. Ver. 17. Ἡ δωρεὰ δικαιοσύνης. The gift of righteousness.] I have interpreted these phrases of the gift of justification, as others do; but it is very probable that they may import the Holy Spirit given in baptism, and upon faith, to the believers of those times, who being made sons by faith in Christ, received the Spirit of adoption, Rom. viii. 14—16, Gal. iv. 6, and believing, "were sealed with the Spirit of promise," Eph. i. 13; for he is styled emphatically, ἡ δωρεὰ ἐπουράνιος, "the heavenly gift," Heb. vi. 4; ἡ δωρεὰ, "the gift," Acts xi. 17; ἡ δωρεὰ Θεοῦ, "the gift of God," Acts viii. 20; "the gift of the grace of God," Eph. iii. 7; ἡ δωρεὰ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "the gift of Christ," Eph. iv. 7; "the gift of the Holy Ghost," Acts ii. 38, x. 45. So the Holy Ghost, given to the prophets and holy men of old, is by the primitive Christians usually styled ἡ ἄνωθεν ἐπὶ τοὺς ἁγίους ἄνδρας ἐπελθοῦσα δωρεὰ, "the gift coming from above upon holy men," Just. Mart. adv. Gr. p. 9, B. p. 11, D. p. 30, D. p. 31, C.

[15] Ver. 19. Ἁμαρτωλοὶ κατεστάθησαν οἱ πολλοί, Many were made sinners.] In the exposition of this, and of the phrase in the twelfth verse, "in whom all have sinned," I follow the Greek expositors, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, upon the place: and to make good the interpretation, I shall show first the inconsistency of any other sense ascribed to them, with the text, with scripture, and with reason. And,

First, It cannot be truly affirmed that we all actually and formally sinned in Adam, and upon that account were made sinners; for then it was not by the "disobedience of one," but of many, that many were made sinners; (2.) then death, the punishment of sin, came upon all, not "for the sin of one," or for one sin of that one man, but for the sin of all; both which things I have plainly proved to be contrary to the express words of the apostle. Then (3.) all men must have sinned "after the similitude of Adam's transgression;" for if we all sinned in or with him, we must sin by the same act, the same will, and in the same person, against the same law; and surely they that thus sin, must sin "after the similitude of Adam's transgression:" for what dissimilitude can there be in sins committed by the same act, and the same will, of one and the same person, against the same law? But of the posterity of Adam, the apostle here expressly saith, "They sinned not after the similitude of Adam's transgression;" therefore they were not sinners by the same act and will, of the same person, against the same law. Moreover, if all the posterity of Adam sinned in Adam, they sinned against some law given to them, "for sin is the transgression of a law, and where there is no law there is no transgression:" now they could sin in Adam, so as to deserve death for their sin, only by sinning against the law requiring Adam not to eat of the forbidden fruit: for Adam himself became guilty of death only by transgressing that law, but all the posterity of Adam cannot be said to have sinned against that law, for when did they sin against it? If when Adam did so, then all his posterity must be actually sinners from the beginning of the world, i. e. some thousands of years before the greatest part of them had a being: now seeing action must be the action of some being, does it not seem absurd at first sight to say, that so many myriads were actually sinners, when they were not in being? and when they came into the world, they could not sin in Adam, or in his action, for he did not then eat of the forbidden fruit in the midst of paradise. Again, we cannot sin against a law which is not in being; since therefore there is now no paradise, and no forbidden fruit in being, we cannot be obliged by any law of God now not to eat of the fruit in the midst of paradise, and so cannot be sinners by transgressing against such a law.

Secondly, It cannot truly be affirmed that we all sinned in Adam, and by his disobedience were made sinners, because his sin and disobedience were imputed to us: for I have shown already, that the scripture nowhere maketh the least mention of any thing of another's imputed to a man for reward or guilt, but only of some personal thing or action of our own: see note on ver. 14. Moreover, this imputation either makes the sin of Adam truly ours, or it doth not: if it doth not, how can we be made sinners by it? if it doth, then death came upon us for our sin; and so not for the sin of one, but for the sin of all, which is the thing disproved already, note on ver. 12. (3.) I ask whether this imputation made the posterity of Adam sinners, or whether it found them so before? If it found them so before, it was plainly needless, for they might have been condemned to death without it: if it made them so, then, since this imputation is the act of God, and not of man, it plainly follows that God must be the author of that sin, because the imputation flows immediately from him, without the intervention of any action on the part of those men to whom it is imputed. Moreover, then the imputation must be false, as charging them with sin whom he did not find sinners, but only by his arbitrary imputation made them so. Now far be it from any Christian to affirm that God should falsely impute sin to any man. In a word, λογίζεσθαι and imputare is to reckon, to account a thing to any man, to charge him with it, to lay the charge of it to him. This action therefore on God's part must suppose, in the very nature of it, some action done by the posterity of Adam which is blameworthy, and may be justly charged upon them, before there can be any ground for imputation of it; and this shows that it is impossible that the imputation should be the very thing that renders them blameworthy, or persons worthy to be charged with guilt. And yet if the sin of Adam becomes ours only by imputation, it must be ours only because it is that death, which is the punishment of sin, as if they had personally suffered; and also accepted and treated by God, as if indeed they had been righteous persons.

20 I say, before the law we became obnoxious to death by one man's disobedience,) [16] Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound (unto death, and men might be found obnoxious to it also, on the account of their transgressions against the law). But where sin (thus) abounded (unto death), grace did much more abound (unto life):

21 That as sin hath reigned unto death (seizing on all men for it), even so might grace reign through righteousness (Gr. justification) unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

by God imputed to us, and not imputed because it is ours; that is, God by this imputation must make us sinners, and not find us such; for this imputation is the action of the Judge, not of the supposed criminal; remove or take away this action, and no crime can be charged upon him. In fine, if the sin of Adam becomes ours only by imputation, it deserves condemnation only by the same imputation, i. e. by the action of God; that therefore we deserve condemnation for it is to be ascribed directly to the action of God, and only by accident to that of Adam. Whence therefore is our destruction, according to this opinion, but of God, who makes us worthy of condemnation, by imputing to us that sin which by his imputation only we stand guilty of?

These interpretations being so inconsistent with the apostle's words, and with the plainest evidence of reason, I am forced to prefer before them that of the Greek fathers, viz. that we all sinned in Adam, i. e. by becoming obnoxious to that death which was the punishment of his sin, and that "by one man's disobedience many were made sinners," by being subject to the death, and temporal calamities and miseries, which came upon all mankind for Adam's sin; so that we become sinners in him, or by his disobedience, by a metonymy of the effect, by suffering the punishment which God had threatened to him for it, as the experience of all men and women shows we do in all the parts of the threat; and this is a common sense of the word חטא, which signifies both sin and the punishment of it. So Gen. iv. 7, "If thou doest evil, חטאת, sin lieth at the door;" that is, the punishment of sin, ver. 13. So Gen. xix. 15, "Make haste," saith the angel to Lot, "and escape, lest thou be consumed בעון, in the sin of the city," i. e. in the punishment of the city; in plagâ descendente propter culpam incolarum urbis, Arab. And Gen xxxi. 39, Jacob speaks to Laban thus, That which was torn of beasts, אנכי אחטנה, ἐγὼ ἀπεττίνυον, pœnas dabam, "I suffered for it;"—"the sin was upon me," saith Aben Ezra. Gen. xliii. 9, Judah speaks thus to Jacob concerning Benjamin, "If I bring him not again," וחטאתי לך ἡμαρτηκὼς ἔσομαι εἰς σε, i. e. "I will suffer punishment;" see xlii. 37, i. e. let me bear the blame; so also xliv. 32. So Bathsheba said to David, "I and my son Solomon shall be חטאים, ἁμαρτωλοί, sinners," 1 Kings i. 21, that is, We shall be punished as sinners, and be in danger of our life. So לא ירשיענו, impium non faciet, "He will not condemn him," Ps. xxxvii. 33; ודם נקי ירשיעו, Et sanguinem innocentem condemnabunt, Ps. xciv. 21; so also Job ix. 20. So the lepers say one to another, "We do not well if we tarry till the morning-light, then we shall be found sinners," 2 Kings vii. 9, i. e. we shall be punished by the king. And Zech. xiv. 19, "This shall be חטאת מצרים, ἁμαρτία Αἰγύπτου, the punishment of Egypt, and the punishment of all nations that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles." This phrase of bearing sin is constantly used in this sense; as when it is said חטאם ישאו, "They shall bear their iniquity, they shall die," Lev. xx. 20, and ἁμαρτίαν κομιοῦνται, ἀποίσονται, Lev. xx. 17. 19; Num. xiv. 34, λήψεσθε ἁμαρτίας ὑμῶν, Lam. v. 7, ὑπέχομεν τὰ ἀνομήματα αὐτῶν, "We have borne their iniquity." If therefore ἁμαρτία in the Old Testament so often signifies the punishment of sin, which in this case was death, what exception can be made against these words of Chrysostom,* "What is the meaning of these words, In whom all have sinned? It is this, he falling, even they who did not eat of the tree were by him made mortal;"—"Even as if they themselves had fallen," saith Theophylact,† "when he did." "For," saith Theodoret, "he being obnoxious to the decree of death, in that state he begat Cain and Abel, and others, ἅπαντες οὖν ὡς ἐκ τοιούτου φύντες ζυγὴν εἶχον τὴν φύσιν, all therefore became mortal, as being begotten of one that was mortal." And seeing it is said ἁμαρτωλοί, or ἡμαρτηκότες ἔσονται, "They shall be sinners," who are to suffer punishment; why may not these words, "By the disobedience of one many were made sinners," admit the sense which Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact give them?—τουτέστιν ὑπεύθυνοι κολάσει, καὶ κατάδικοι θανάτου, "They shall for his disobedience be subject unto death and punishment," the effects of sin: "for," saith St. Chrysostom, "it is no absurdity to say, that he sinning, and so being mortal, they who proceed from him should be mortal also; but how can it justly follow that by his disobedience another should be made a sinner, for such a one will be found to deserve no punishment, as not being personally a sinner?" Τὸ δὲ ἐκ τῆς παρακοῆς ἐκείνου ἕτερον ἁμαρτωλὸν γενέσθαι ποῖαν ἀκολουθίαν σχοίη; εὑρεθήσεται γὰρ οὗτος μηδὲ δίκην ὀφείλων ὁ τοιοῦτος, εἴγε μὴ οἰκοθεν γέγονεν ἁμαρτωλός. It is true, we meet not with the words ἥμαρτον and ἁμαρτωλοὶ κατεστάθησαν, in this sense elsewhere in the New Testament; but then this may be, because the comparison is not elsewhere made, betwixt the first Adam, and the effects of his disobedience, and the second Adam, and the effects of his obedience to the death; and because the opposite phrase, δίκαιοι κατεστάθησαν, required that the words opposed should be used in the metonymical sense: for when the apostle saith, "By the obedience of one man many were made righteous," it is evident he spoke not of Christ's active obedience, but of his passive obedience, or suffering death for us. For (1.) the whole chapter is employed in setting forth the benefits accruing to us by his death, ver. 6. 8—11. (2.) The effect of this obedience is our justification; now that, through the whole scripture, and in this very chapter, is constantly ascribed to the death of Christ, and his blood shed for us, ver. 9, 10. 16—18. (3.) The disobedience by which many were made sinners, is plainly declared by the apostle to be one single act of disobedience in Adam, and therefore the obedience opposed to it cannot in reason be the active obedience of Christ's whole life, but that obedience to the death which the apostle mentions, Phil. ii. 6. 8. Now by this passive obedience, we cannot be made formally righteous, but only metonymically, by being made partakers of that freedom from the condemnation and guilt of sin, and that reconciliation which Christ purchased by his meritorious death and passion. Dissolvens enim eam, quæ ab initio in ligno facta fuerat, inobedientiam, obediens factus est usque ad mortem, mortem autem crucis, eam quæ in ligno fuerat, inobedientiam, per eam quæ in ligno fuerat obedientiam sanans. Iren. lib. v. cap. 56.

Moreover, we in the New Testament find frequently expressions equivalent to these; as (1.) when Christ is said to "bear our sin," only because he bore the punishment due to them. (2.) When he is said to be "made sin for us," 2 Cor. v. 21, he being made so not by contracting the guilt of our sins, but only by suffering punishment for our iniquities; and when he is said to "appear a second time, χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας, without sin," Heb. ix. 28, i. e. without another sacrifice, in which he was to suffer for our sin; and when it is said that "by sin," Rom. viii. 2, i. e. by his sacrifice for it, "he condemned sin for the flesh." And (3.) when he is said to be "made a curse for us," Gal. iii. 13, he being only so by suffering the death which the law styled accursed, and not as being so in the sight of God.

[16] Ver. 20. Ἵνα πλεονάσῃ τὸ παράπτωμα, The law entered that sin might abound unto death.] Hence it is styled, "the letter that killeth," the "ministry of death" and "of condemnation," 2 Cor. iii. 6—9, and said to subject all that are under it to a curse, Gal. iii. 10.

CHAPTER VI.

1 WHAT shall we say then? [1] Shall we continue in sin (Gr. what do we say then? do we say this? Let us who have received this grace, continue still in sin), that grace may abound (towards us? that is, do we by declaring that we are justified freely by grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, iii. 24, and that as sin abounded, grace did more abound, v. 20, give occasion to this inference)?

2 God forbid (we should make any such inference from, or any use of, this doctrine, so contrary to that very baptism by which we enter into the Christian covenant and put on Christ, for) how shall we, that are dead (Gr. have died) to sin (by our baptism, or entrance into the Christian covenant), live any longer therein?

3 (For) Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into (and by that baptism professed ourselves disciples of) Jesus Christ were baptized into (the likeness of) his death? (and so engaged to die unto sin, as he did for sin, 1 Pet. iv. 1, 2, and to live to him that died for us, and rose again? 2 Cor. v. 15.

4 For) Therefore we are [2] buried with him by baptism (plunging us under the water) into (a conformity to his) death (which put his body under the earth): that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory (glorious power) of the Father, even so we also (thus dead in baptism) should (rise with him, and) walk in newness of life.

5 For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death (by dying unto sin), we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: (by being so risen from our death unto sin, as never to let sin have any more dominion over us, but dying unto sin once for all, and henceforth living unto God, ver. 9, 10, or we shall rise to a life immortal, ver. 8, as he hath done:

6 And thus we stand engaged to die to sin,) Knowing this, that our old man is (was) crucified with him, that the body of sin (i. e. the appetites of the body which subject us to sin) might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin, (for he bore our sins in his own body on the cross, that we, being dead to sin, might live unto righteousness, 1 Pet. ii. 24.

7 Which we shall not do if we be truly dead unto it;) For he that is dead is freed from sin (1 Pet. iv. 4, he sins no more).

8 Now if we be (thus) dead with Christ, we believe that [3] we shall also live with him (not a spiritual only, but a happy and immortal life:

9 And thus conformed to his death we should be, and therefore) Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead (now) dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him.

10 For in that he died, he died [4] unto sin once (or, for sin, i. e. that he died to the putting away of sin, Heb. ix. 26. 28, he died thus once for all): but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God (i. e. the life he liveth is an eternal life, wholly dedicated to the glory of God, Phil. ii. 9—11).

11 [5] Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

12 Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, [6] that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof.

13 Neither yield ye your members (any longer) as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield (up) yourselves (entirely) unto (the service of) God, as those that are (with Christ) alive from the dead, and (yield) your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.

14 (And say not this is beyond your strength, seeing the law in your members leads you captive to sin;) [7] For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the (pedagogy of) the law (which gives the

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1.] Note here, that if the faith, to which St. Paul in this epistle doth ascribe justification, did not only oblige us to, but even comprehend, evangelical and constant obedience, there could be no colour for this objection; that therefore must be a mistake.

[2] Ver. 4. Συνετάφημεν οὖν αὐτῷ διὰ τοῦ βαπτίσματος, We are buried with him in baptism.] It being so expressly declared here, and Col. ii. 12, that "we are buried with Christ in baptism," by being buried under water; and the argument to oblige us to a conformity to his death, by dying to sin, being taken hence, and this immersion being religiously observed by all Christians for thirteen centuries, and approved by our church, and the change of it into sprinkling, even without any allowance from the Author of this institution, or any license from any council of the church, being that which the Romanist still urgeth to justify his refusal of the cup to the laity, it were to be wished that this custom might be again of general use, and aspersion only permitted, as of old, in case of the clinici, or in present danger of death.

[3] Ver. 8. Συζήσομεν αὐτῷ, We shall live with him.] As being delivered, by his death, from that death which is the punishment of sin, and having that Spirit which is the giver of life, and the pledge and earnest of it, imparted to us: it is this life which is the object of our faith, and of this the apostle speaks, 2 Tim. ii. 11, saying, "If we have been dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign together with him."

[4] Ver. 10. Ἀπέθανεν ἐφάπαξ, He died once for all.] That is, Christ so died for our sins once, as never to undergo death again, and therefore his living to God seems to import his resurrection to eternal life; and so the phrase is used by Luke, where of "the children of the resurrection," which can die no more, he saith, "They live unto God," Luke xx. 26. 28, and in Josephus,* who saith, that they who die for God ζῶσι τοῦ Θεοῦ, "live to God, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the patriarchs do;† they love that piety which brings them to eternal life."

[5] Ver. 11. Οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς, So also reckon ye yourselves dead unto sin.] Once for all, so as never to have any need of dying to it again, but as still engaged to live to God's glory; for, say the ancients, we can have but one baptism, and this supposes we should so die to sin once, as never to have occasion to perform that work again. Hence therefore it appears, how far they are from conformity to the death of Christ, who still suffer sin to revive in them, after that, by pious resolutions and repentance, they have begun to mortify it, and so are still beginning again to die to it. And oh that Christians would more carefully attend to this conformity to the death of Christ!

[6] Ver. 12. Εἰς τὸ ὑπακούειν, To obey it.] For this obedience to it in the lustings of it, is a certain sign of the dominion of sin in us, and of our being none of Christ's servants; "for they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts" (Gal. v. 24, see Examen Millii).

[7] Ver. 14. Ἁμαρτία γὰρ οὐ κυριεύσει, For sin shall not have dominion.] This is a pious sense, but seems to some to give no place for the following objection. Others therefore paraphrase the words thus: "For then sin shall not have dominion over you, so as to condemn you for each transgression; knowledge of sin, but not sufficient strength to mortify it), but under (that economy of) grace (which affords that Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which frees us from the law of sin and death).

* De Maccab. p. 1100.

15 What then? shall we (go on in) sin, because we are not under the law (which condemns us for every transgression), but under (that covenant of) grace (which allows the pardon, and promises the forgiveness of it? Heb. viii. 12.) God forbid (that we should continue in the sins forbidden by the law, because we are not under the law).

16 Know ye not (this), that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey (and from him you must expect your wages); whether (you be the servants) of sin unto (receive the wages of sin, which is) death, or (the servants of God) of obedience unto (the obtaining the fruits of) righteousness?

17 But[8] God be thanked, that (and, God be thanked, that though formerly, ver. 19) ye were the servants of sin, but (yet since your conversion) ye have obeyed from the heart that form of (Christian) doctrine which was delivered you.

18 Being then (for being) made free from (the law of) sin, (by the grace and assistance of that Spirit of life the gospel ministers, ch. viii. 2,) ye became the servants of righteousness.

19 I speak[9] after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto (commit) iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness.

20 (Now, I say, for before you could not do it,)For when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness, (doing then no service at all to it.

21 And that you may not be still enamoured with your former service unto sin, I ask,)What fruit had ye then in (from) those things whereof ye are now ashamed? (surely none worthy to be compared with the fruits of righteousness,) for the end of those things is death.

22 But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have (at present) your fruit unto holiness, and the end (will be) everlasting life.

23 For the[10] wages of sin (to its servants) is death; but the gift of God (to his servants) is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

for you are not under the law (which pronounceth a curse on them that do not obey it), but under (that covenant of) grace which affords pardon and forgiveness of it," 1 John i. 7 (see Examen Millii).

[8] Ver. 17. Χάρις δὲ τῷ Θεῷ, But God be thanked.] He doth not here thank God that they had been the servants of sin, but that they, who had been servants to it, were become obedient to the precepts of Christianity; as our Lord thanks his heavenly Father, that he had "hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them to babes," Matt. xi. 25, i. e. that having hid from the one, he notwithstanding had revealed them to the other.

The particle δὲ is sometimes rendered and, as Luke ix. 6, xi. 18, Acts iii. 5, iv. 36, viii. 30, ix. 17, xi. 12, xiii. 15, xv. 6, xxi. 14, xxiii. 9. 13.

Sometimes, then, Acts vi. 2. 7, ix. 13. 16, xii. 3, Matt. i. 19, Luke viii. 29. 35.

Sometimes, so, Acts vii. 15, Rom. viii. 8.

Sometimes, yea, 1 Cor. ix. 16, xiii. 21, Rom. xi. 30, xvi. 9, 1 Cor. ii. 9.

Sometimes, but, in the sense of yet, Acts xxviii. 22, 1 Cor. xiv. 1.

And, yet, Matt. vi. 9.

Sometimes, for, Luke xii. 2. 48, xxiii. 14, Acts vii. 25, 1 Thess. ii. 16.

Also, Luke xii. 8, xiii. 6.

Moreover, 2 Pet. i. 15.

Howbeit, 1 Cor. ii. 9.

And so accordingly the words may be here rendered, "And God be thanked," or "God be thanked then, that though ye were the servants of sin, yet," and in the verse following, ἐλευθερωθέντες δὲ, "for being delivered."

[9] Ver 19. Ἀνθρώπινον λέγω, I speak after the manner of men.] The apostle doth not here speak, as some unhappily imagine, by way of excuse for not using the best argument he could use in this affair, but such as was best fitted to the capacities and notions of those he writes to; for what inducements to yield their members instruments of righteousness to that holiness which will conclude in life eternal, could he use more rational and proper than this, that they had formerly yielded them servants to commit that sin, whose wages is death? But he speaks this by way of illustration of his argument, or exhortation. The sense which the ancients put upon these words is this, τῇ φύσει μετρῶ τὴν παραίνεσιν, "I frame my exhortation with a due consideration of the infirmity of our flesh," requiring that only which even to human reason seems highly equitable, viz. that you should do that service now to God, which you have formerly done to sin. I rather think the apostle discourseth to this effect: In this discourse of your being servants formerly to sin, and your obligation now to be servants of righteousness, I speak that which all natural men must have had experience of, by reason of the infirmity of the flesh, and of which they may thence take a just idea; requiring only, that as they have yielded their members instruments of sin, so they would yield them instruments of righteousness.

And that this is the genuine import of the words ἀνθρώπινον λέγω, "I speak after the manner of men," may appear from the like use of it, 1 Cor. x. 10, "No temptation hath happened to you, but that which is ἀνθρώπινος, common to human nature," and supportable by men of reason; and from the constant use of the phrase κατ' ἄνθρωπον λέγω, "I speak after the manner of men," of which see note on 4 Cor. ix. 8.

[10] Ver. 23. Τὰ γὰρ ὀψώνια τῆς ἁμαρτίας θάνατος, For the wages of sin is death.] Hence divines usually conclude that even infants must have sinned, because they are subject to death. Now though this be so far true, that death came upon all men, and so upon infants, by that sin of Adam which rendered him, and by him all his offspring, subject to mortality; yet this will no more follow from these words, than it will follow, that because the wages of rebellion is death, all that die must be guilty of rebellion. Moreover the intention of the apostle is not here to teach us that death is the punishment due to every sin, but that that death which is in scripture styled "the second death," and stands opposed to "eternal life," will be the certain issue of a life spent in the service of sin. For the apostle throughout this chapter speaks of that sin in which we continue, ver. 1, and which we serve, ver. 6. 20, and which so "reigneth in our mortal bodies, that we obey it in the lusts thereof," ver. 12, by which we "yield our members instruments of unrighteousness to sin," ver. 13. 19, in which we so serve sin as to obey its commands, ver. 16, 17, and live "free from righteousness," or in neglect of it, ver. 20. "The wages," saith he, "of sin" thus reigning in, and served by, us, "is (eternal) death." It is therefore manifest the apostle speaks not here of sin imputed, but only of personal sin, nor of each single act, but of an habitual practice of a course of sin (see Examen Millii).

CHAPTER VII.

1 (And of the truth of what I told you, vi. 14, that sin οὐ κυριεύσει, shall not have dominion over you, because you are not under the law, but under grace, ye cannot well be ignorant, for) Know ye not, brethren, (for I speak to them that know the law,) (i. e. to the Jews or proselytes,) how that the law (to which you were espoused by Moses) hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth (only?

2 The case of a man thus under the law, i. e. in his legal state, being like that of a woman married to a husband:) For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to (be subject to) her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is (then) loosed from the law of (subjection to) her husband.

3 So then (Gr. therefore) if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, [1] she shall be (truly) called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law (which bound her to be in subjection to, and yield conjugal affection to, her husband only); so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man.

4 Wherefore, my brethren, (as the woman is become free from the law of her husband by his death, even so) [2] ye also are become dead (Gr. ἐθανατώθητε, ye have been dead) to the law (and so free from it) by (the crucifixion of) the body of Christ (which hath dissolved your obligation to the law, as the death of the husband doth the obligation of the wife to him); that ye should (or may) be married to another (husband), even to him who is raised from the dead, that (being made free from sin, ver. 21, 22, by virtue of your union to him) we should bring forth fruit unto God.

5 (We are, I say, become thus dead to the law, this being necessary, that we might bring forth fruit unto God:) [3] For when we were in the flesh (i. e. when we lived under the carnal ordinances of the law, without the assistance of the Spirit), [4] the motions of sins, which were (forbidden and restrained) by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death (rendering us obnoxious to death, the punishment threatened by the law to the transgressor of it).

6 But now we are delivered from the law (and

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VII.

[1] Ver. 3. Μοιχαλὶς χρηματίσει, She shall be called an adulteress.] The apostle, saith Theodoret, considers not here the permission given to the woman divorced by the law of Moses to be married to another, as being taught by Christ not to approve of such divorces; but the apostle seems only to intimate that she hath no power to dissolve this bond by putting away her husband, or that this divorce rendered her husband dead in law to her, she being not to return to him again (Deut. xxiv. 4). Now this, saith the apostle, is the case of those who are under the law; their entering into that legal covenant was "the day of their espousals" (Jer. ii. 2), and they were married to it, or to him that put them in subjection under it, and were his spouse (Jer. iii. 14), and so obliged to serve God in the oldness of the letter; but now this law being dead, and you being espoused to another husband, even Christ (2 Cor. xi. 2), are henceforth bound to serve God according to that new spiritual law which he hath given you, and not according to the letter of the old law.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἐθανατώθητε τῷ νόμῳ.] This phrase, "Ye are dead to the law," or, "Ye have been made dead to the law," is, say interpreters, "The law is put to death for you;" for to that, say they, the drift of the discourse directs: but (1.) this interpretation puts a plain force upon the words, without any instance that they are elsewhere used in this sense. (2.) The parallel words, Gal. ii. 19, 20, run thus; "I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live to God: I am crucified together with Christ." Now those words seem to fix the proper sense of these, showing it to be also this; Ye are dead to the law, that is, you are free from subjection to the precepts of the law, which as a husband had dominion over you, and from the motions of sin which are by the law, as if you were dead. To strengthen this interpretation, let the Hebrew phrase be noted;* "When a man dies he is made free from the commands, the law οὐ κυριεύει, hath no dominion over him," no power to subject him to the motions of sin which are by the law, for "he that is dead is free from sin" (vi. 6, 7), so that he doth no longer δουλεύειν, "serve the motions of it:" and hence the apostle makes this inference, that "if we be dead with Christ," and buried with him, or crucified together with him, sin οὐ κυριεύει, "shall not have dominion over us," as it had whilst we were under the Jewish dispensation; for "we are not under the law, but under grace." And again, "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh," Gal.

* Nidda, f. 76.

v. 16, and ver. 18, for "if ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law." Wherefore the sense of these four last verses seems to be this; The law hath dominion over a man as long as he lives (under it), for the case of a man's subjection to the law in this is like to the woman's subjection to her husband, it continues whilst he lives, but when he is once dead she is free from any farther subjection to him, seeing he being dead can have no farther power over her, and so she must be free to be married to another: in like manner you being made dead to the law, to which you were espoused, by the death of Christ, as being "buried" and "crucified together with him," the law can have no farther power over you, to retain you in subjection to it, and so you must be free to be married, or put into subjection to another husband, even Christ, to whom "I have espoused you" (2 Cor. xi. 2); and the law itself being also dead to you, through the death of Christ abolishing it, and freeing Christians from the power and obligation of it, you are free to marry another husband, even Christ (ver. 5).

[3] Ver. 5. Ὅτε γὰρ ἦμεν ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ, For when we were in the flesh.] When I consider that οἱ ὄντες ἐν σαρκὶ and οἱ κατὰ σάρκα ὄντες, viii. 5. 8, signifies those that are acted and governed by the fleshly principle, in opposition to the guidance and motions of the Holy Spirit, and that εἶναι ἐν σαρκὶ, ver. 9, ζῆν, περιπατεῖν κατὰ σάρκα, ver. 12, 13, bear the same sense, I judge that "When we were in the flesh," here, doth not only signify to be under the carnal ordinances of the law, for so were all the pious Jews who lived from Moses to the gospel times; but more especially relates to them, who, living under these ordinances, were themselves carnal, and without any assistance of the Holy Spirit: and so had "the law of the flesh still warring against the law of their minds, and bringing them into captivity to the law of sin," which could not be the state of Zacharias and Elisabeth, or any other of those persons who were "righteous before God," and "walked in all the commandments of the Lord blameless." And if of such only we understand the apostle's following discourse in this chapter, the sense will be clear.

[4] Τὰ διὰ τοῦ νόμου, The motions of sin which were by the law.] Here Mr. L. saith, "Interpreters cast a strange imputation on the law of God, by saying it excited men to sin by forbidding it," whereas they only say that the carnal minds of men excited them to transgress the law when they were under it, as the apostle saith, ver. 8, and Mr. L. in his gloss on the eighth verse says, "Sin took the opportunity of my being under the law to stir up concupiscence in me; for without the law, which annexes death to the trangression of it, sin is not able to have its will upon me:" now is this any from the motions of sin caused by it), [5] that being dead wherein we were held (in subjection, as the wife was to her living husband); [6] that we should serve in newness of (that) spirit (of life in Christ Jesus, which makes us free from the law of sin and death), and not (as before) in the oldness of the letter (which killeth, or subjecteth us to death, 2 Cor. iii. 6. 9).

7 What shall we say then? Is the law (from which we must be delivered, that we may not obey the lusts of the flesh) sin? (Is it the cause of that sin which worketh in our members whilst we are under the law?) God forbid (that we should say so). Nay, (so far otherwise is it, that) I had not known sin (to be so), but by the law (instructing me what is to be avoided as sin, and under what penalty): for I had not known lust (i. e. the lustings, or covetous desires of the heart to be things worthy of death), except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet; (and so made him that coveteth obnoxious to death, as being a transgressor of the law.)

8 But (nevertheless) sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence (or vehement desires after that which was forbidden by the law, which became mortal to me by virtue of the prohibition of the law.) For (whilst I was) without the law sin was dead (i. e. unable to have this effect upon me; for where there is no law there is no transgression imputed to death, v. 13).

9 For [7] I (the seed of Abraham) was alive (or indeed lived) without the law once (before the law was given, I being not obnoxious to death for that to which the law had not threatened death): but when the commandment came (forbidding it under that penalty), sin revived, and I died (i. e. it got strength to draw me to sin, and so condemned me to death).

10 And the commandment, which was [8] ordained to (or given for) life, (as teaching those things, which if a man do he shall live in them, Lev. xviii. 5,) I found to (me transgressing it to) be unto death.

11 For [9] sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me (or enticed me to the commission of it), and by it (condemning me to death for that transgression) slew me.

more an imputation upon the law of God, than it is an imputation on his providence, that it provides that corn and wine which carnal men abuse to drunkenness and excess?

[5] Ver. 6. Ἀποθανόντος.] The Syriac and Arabic versions, Origen, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, read ἀποθανόντες, "We being dead to that in which we were held," which, saith Origen, is undoubtedly the best reading: and this reading confirms the sense of the fourth verse, as to these words, "Ye are dead to the law," which I have offered in the paraphrase; i. e. we being freed from the obligation and commands of it, and so from the lustings and motions it wrought in us.

[6] Ὥστε δουλεύειν ἡμᾶς ἐν καινότητι Πνεύματος, That we might serve God in the newness of the Spirit.] The law and the gospel are, by the apostle, in this distinguished; that the first is only "the ministration of the letter," the other "of the Spirit" (2 Cor. iii. 6—9). The "ministration of the Spirit" is also declared to be the fruit, "not of the law," but "of the hearing of faith," Gal. iii. 3. Hence the apostle here infers, that we must be dead unto, or free from subjection to the law, that we may be enabled to serve God in newness of spirit. Whence it is evident, that to "serve God in the Spirit," is not "to enjoy the spiritual sense of the law," as Mr. Le Clerc thinks; but, First, As the opposition shows, to serve him with a freedom from the prevalency of the flesh, by virtue of the Spirit, which enables us to mortify the deeds of the flesh (viii. 13). Secondly, To serve God, not chiefly with bodily service and carnal ordinances, but in the spirit of our minds (xii. 2, Phil. iii. 2), having our minds renewed and transformed after the image of God in holiness, and righteousness, and truth, which are the fruits of the Spirit (Eph. iv. 22, 24). Thirdly, To serve him by the assistance of the Spirit, so as to live and walk in the Spirit (Rom. viii. 5, Gal. v. 25), so that we are strengthened with might by the Spirit in the inward man (Eph. iii. 16).

[7] Ver. 9. Ἐγὼ δὲ ἔζων χωρὶς νόμου, I was alive without the law.] Πρὸ τοῦ Μωϋσέος, "Before the law of Moses came." So Chrysostom, Œcumenius, Theophylact.

[8] Ver. 10. Ordained.] This word is not in the original; you may therefore paraphrase the words thus, The commandment which was given for life, i. e. with this promise, Do this, and live, was found to me unto death.

[9] Ver. 8—11.] For the explication of these four last verses, let it be noted;

First, That it is the opinion of judicious commentators, that when the apostle saith, "Sin taking occasion by the commandment wrought in him all manner of concupiscence," ver. 8, and "deceived" him, ver. 11, he means that it did by this saying, only, "Thou shalt not covet," but assigning no punishment to him that coveted. But this interpretation cannot stand, for these two reasons: for, First, It plainly contradicts the words of the law, which pronounce a curse upon "every one who continues not in all things written in the law to do them;" and much more doth it contradict the drift of the apostle's discourse in this, and the Epistle to the Galatians, viz. that the law required perfect obedience to its precepts; condemning him to death, or rendering him obnoxious to condemnation, who in any thing transgressed it, and so could be no means of justification; "as many as were under the law being under the curse," because transgressors of it.

Secondly, This agrees not with the following reason, or the nature of the thing: for if the law given encouraged them to covet, because it had no present penalty annexed to it, they must be more free to covet, or follow their natural or carnal inclinations, when there was no law at all forbidding them to covet; and therefore sin could take no more occasion by a law without penalty, than by none at all, to "work in us all manner of concupiscence," nor could concupiscence be dead without the law, more than with it.

The old and common interpretation is this, That the prohibition of what we desire makes us to think the enjoyment of it more sweet and valuable; or at least provokes the carnal mind, which is not subject to the law of God, to a more fervent lusting after it, Dum prohibita non tam refugit quàm ardentiùs expetit; and this agrees very well with this expression. Or,

Thirdly, Sin is in scripture represented as an enemy, that seeks our ruin and destruction, and takes all occasions to effect it: it is here said to "war against the mind," ver. 23; elsewhere, to "war against the soul," 1 Pet. ii. 11; to "surround" and "beset us," Heb. xii. 1; to "bring us into bondage" and subjection, and get the dominion of us, Rom. vi. 12; to "entice" us, and so to work our death, James i. 15, 16; and to do all that Satan, the grand enemy of mankind, doth, by tempting and soliciting us to the commission of it: whence Chrysostom, upon those words, Heb. xii. 4, "You have not yet resisted unto blood, πρὸς τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ἀνταγωνιζόμενοι, striving against sin," represents sin as an armed and flagrant adversary: when therefore it finds a law which threateneth death to the violation of it, it takes occasion thence more earnestly to attempt and allure as to the violation of it, that so it may more effectually subject us to death and condemnation upon that account; for "the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law," condemning us to death upon the violation of it; thus when God had forbidden, under the pain of death, the eating of the forbidden fruit, Satan thence took occasion to tempt our first parents to the breach of it, and so slew them, or made them subject to death: ἠπάτησε, "He deceived them," Gen. iii. 13, 1 Tim. ii. 14, which is the word here used, ver. 11.

Secondly, Observe the import of the phrase, "Without the law sin was (or is) dead;" which seems not to be this, that the inclinations of men to sin were in their nature less when they were unrestrained by a law; but rather this, that sin was then comparatively dead, as to its power of condemning us to death: and this, first, the antithesis doth plainly hint, for thus it runs, "Without the law, ἁμαρτία νεκρὰ, ἐγὼ δὲ ἔζων, sin was dead, but I was living; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died." How were men 12 Wherefore the law (forbidding sin) is holy, and the commandment (to abstain from it) holy, and just, and good (as requiring only what is equitable in itself, and good for me to do).

13 Was then that which is good made death unto me (Gr. hath that therefore which is good become death to me? i. e. is that the sole and proper cause of bringing death to me)? God forbid (we should so say). But (this charge is to be laid upon) sin, (which) that it might appear sin (i. e. pernicious and destructive), working death in (or to) me by that which is good (i. e. the law, made me obnoxious to death); that sin by the commandment (forbidding it) [10] might become exceeding sinful (i. e. abounding to death, by making me abound in new transgressions of the law, v. 21.

14 And that sin should thus prevail over us in this state of lapsed nature to transgress the law, and to become obnoxious to death by it, will not seem strange, if every natural man considers the contrariety there is betwixt him and the law;) For we know that the law is spiritual (and requires spiritual things): but (every natural man hath cause to say of himself,) I am carnal, [11] sold under sin (i. e. enslaved by my corrupt affections:

15 As may be easily discerned from the workings of our conscience against the evil that we do;) For that which I do [12] I allow not (in my own mind): for what I would (in compliance with the law), that (through the prevalence of my corrupt nature) do I not; but what (through the conviction of my conscience) [13] I hate (to do), that do I.

16 If then (it be so with me, that) I do that which I would not, (by his unwillingness to act in contradiction to it) I consent unto the law that it is good (and commands what is good for me to do).

17 Now then (this being done by those corrupt affections, which overpower me against the approbation of my mind) it is no more I (according to the better part from which I am denominated) that do it, but [14] sin that dwelleth in me (i. e. in my flesh, ver. 23, and captivates me to the obedience of it.

18 And upon this I have just ground to charge it;) For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: for to will (that which is good) is present with me (or to me); but how to perform that which is good I find not (strength by nature).

19 For (in event, I find that) the good that I would (do) I do not: but the evil which (the law prohibits, and) I would not (do), that (being overpowered by the flesh) I do.

20 Now if I (thus) do that I would not, it is no more I (choosing and approving the action in my mind) that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me (i. e. in my flesh, that hurries me to the commission of it against the law and conviction of my mind.

21 For so it is that) I find then (Gr. ἄρα, indeed,) a law (in my members so thwarting the convictions of my mind), that, when I would do (the) good (to which living before the law, but because then no law condemned them? Sin therefore must be then dead as to its power of condemning. How did they die when the law came, but by the law condemning them to death? Sin therefore then revived as to its condemning power, which it received first from the sin of Adam, which brought death into the world; and next from the law of Moses, which "entered that the offence might abound, and reign more unto death" (Rom. v. 20, 21). For though sin was in the world from Adam unto Moses, or until the law given, yet was it not imputed unto death, when there was no law given that did threaten death unto it; so that death reigned, in that interval, by virtue of Adam's sin alone, even over them who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, i. e. against a positive law forbidding it under the penalty of death; which law being delivered by Moses, sin revived, i. e. it had again its force to condemn men as before to death, by virtue of a law which threatened death to them. And in this sense doth the apostle seem to say that "the law was added because of transgressions" (Gal. iii. 19), to convince us of the wrath and punishment due to them; and that the law therefore "worketh wrath," because "where no law is, there is no transgression" (Rom. iv. 15), subjecting us to wrath, or no such sense of the divine wrath as where a plain divine law threatening death and condemnation is violated. Upon the sense thus given of these two phrases doth our exposition stand.

[10] Ver. 13. Καθ' ὑπερβολὴν ἁμάρτωλος, Exceeding sinful.] That it might appear εἰς θάνατον ὑπερβάλλουσα (v. 20, 21), "abounding unto death," and so exceeding vile and hateful to us, the end and "wages" of it being "death" and condemnation (vi. 21. 23).

[11] Ver. 14. Πεπραμένος ὑπὸ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, Sold under sin.] i. e. In peccati potestatem libidinis, et concupiscentiæ pretio redactus, Origen. So enslaved to it, saith Theophylact, ὥστε μὴ ἀναβλέψαι δύνασθαι, "that he could not look up;" "A willing slave, who had sold himself to it," saith Theodoret. And this is continually the import of the phrase in the Old Testament; as when it is said of Ahab, 1 Kings xxi. 20, πέπρασαι ποιῆσαι τὸ πονηρόν, "Thou hast sold thyself to do wickedly;" and, ver. 25, ἐπράθη ποιῆσαι τὸ πονηρόν, "He sold himself to do wickedly." Of the Jews, Isa. l. 1, ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις ὑμῶν ἐπράθητε, "You have sold yourselves to your iniquities." And of the Jews who, under Antiochus Epiphanes, revolted from their religion to heathenism, it is said, that ἐπράθησαν τὸ πονηρόν, "They sold themselves to do evil," 1 Macc. i. 15.

[12] Ver. 15. Οὐ γινώσκω, I allow not.] This interpretation, saith Mr. L., "makes the following words a tautology," whereas I judge it very reasonable to say, "I allow not, because I would not; yea, I hate to do, what I do."

[13] Ὃ μισῶ, That which I hate.] Ὑπὸ τῆς ἡδονῆς καταθελγόμενοι ποιοῦμεν ἅπερ ὡς παράνομα βέλεμνα πτόμεθα, "Being allured with pleasure, we," say Theodoret and Œcumenius, "oft do those things which are abominable, as being opposite to the law;" for whilst the law represents sin as pernicious, and destructive both to soul and body, it is as natural for all men to hate it, as to love themselves: but then, as Photius saith, when τὸ ἡδὺ τοῦ πράγματος προβάλλεται, "the sweetness or pleasure of the action is proposed to the mind, the hatred goes off," and the soul is wrought up to an affection to it; and thus it is with every enlightened man, that sins against his conscience, and doth the evil which he would not do. "These words," saith Origen, "show that the carnal man, of whom he speaks, resistere aliquantulùm vitiis conatur, endeavours a little to resist his vices, legis sc. naturalis instinctû, by the instinct of the law of nature, but that at last he is overcome by them, and oppressed with them."

[14] Ver. 17. Νῦν οἰκοῦσα ἐν ἐμοὶ ἁμαρτία, Sin that dwelleth in me.] This he speaks, saith Theodoret, calling τοῦ νοῦ τὴν δουλείαν, καὶ τῶν παθῶν τὴν δεσποτείαν, "the slavery of the mind and the dominion," or, as Theophylact, "the tyranny of the passions, sin."—"It is," saith Origen, lex et voluntas carnis quæ captivos nos ducit in lege peccati, "the law and the will of the flesh, which lead us captive to the law of sin." Hence this sin dwelling in us is so often styled, "the law of sin in our members," ver. 20—22. 25, viii. 2. Here the apostle seems to speak according to the philosophy of the heathens, with which the Jews began to be acquainted, that man was not to be denominated from his body, or his sensual and carnal part, but from his mind, his νοῦς or λογικὴ διάνοια, which in Philo's* phrase is, ὁ ἐν ἑκαστῳ ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος, "the man within us;" ὁ πρὸς ἀλήθειαν ἄνθρωπος, "the true man,"† the man properly so called; who saith, moreover, λέγει δὲ ταῦτα ὁ ἀληθινὸς ἄνθρωπος ὁ ἐπὶ ψυχῆς ἔλεγχος, "This saith the true man, the reprover in the soul." And of himself he speaks thus; "Men have power over my body, but that is nothing to me, ἐγὼ γὰρ ἀπὸ τοῦ κρείττονος τῆς ἐν the law directs me), evil is present with me (to oppose and hinder me from doing it:

22 I say, when I would do good:) For I delight in the law of God [15] after the inward man (my mind approving for some time, and being pleased with its good and holy precepts):

23 But I see (or perceive) another law (of the flesh) in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members, (for of what a man is overcome, of that he is brought into bondage, 2 Pet. ii. 19, John viii. 34, Rom. vi. 16.

24 And being thus enslaved to that sin which renders me obnoxious to death, the wages of it, I am even forced to cry out,) O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of (sin which worketh) this death?

25 (And so) I (have great reason to) [16] thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord (whom he hath sent to redeem me from this death to which I am obnoxious by sin). So then (to shut up this discourse, thus it is with me, whilst under the law only and carnally minded,) with the mind [17] I myself (or I the same man) serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin.

ἐμαυτῷ διανοίας χρηματίζω, for I am denominated from my mind, the better part, according to which I design to live."

[15] Ver. 22. Κατὰ τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον, According to the inward man.] It is plain "the inward man" here cannot signify "the new man, which is created after God in righteousness and holiness," Eph. iv. 24, and which is not put on, till all "old things are passed away," 2 Cor. v. 17, and "all things are become new," and till we have "put off the old man with his deeds" (Col. iii. 9, 10), for sure this cannot be said of him, who is still "carnal, sold under sin," and "captivated to the law of sin which is in his members;" but only the mind of man, the νοῦς, as the apostle doth interpret himself, ver. 25. So Origen informs us, that the soul, using the body as its instrument, is called ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρωπος, "the inward man," contra Cels. lib. vii. p. 357;—ἔσω ἄνθρωπον τὸν νοῦν λέγει. So Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact. So the very next verse shows, the words running thus; "I delight in the law of God in the inward man, but I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind," i. e. of my inward man. And so the apostle useth the phrase when he saith, 2 Cor. iv. 16, that though ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρωπος, "the outward man (i. e. the body) was corrupted, yet ὁ ἔσωθεν, the inward man was renewed day by day." And that this delight is no evidence of a regenerate man, is evident from the example of the stony ground, which "heard the word μετὰ χαρᾶς, with joy," Matt. xiii. 20, of Herod, who "heard John the Baptist, ἡδέως, with delight," Mark vi. 20, of the Jews, who "rejoiced in his light," John v. 35, and heard our Saviour "gladly," Mark xii. 37.

[16] Ver. 25. Εὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ, I thank God.] The Latin version and one Greek copy read, χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ, "The grace of God;" but the Syriac, Arabic, and all the Greek commentators agree with our translation, which therefore is to be preferred before that lection (see Examen Millii in locum).

[17] Αὐτὸς ἐγὼ, The same man.] Of whom he had before spoken, not I Paul now writing this epistle. It hath been a controversy since Austin's time, whether Paul here speaketh in his own person, or in the person of a regenerate man, or only in the person of a Jew conflicting with the motions of his lusts, only by the assistance of the letter of the law, without the aids and powerful assistance of the Holy Spirit; which is as great an instance of the force of prejudice, and the heat of opposition, to pervert the plainest truths, as can be happily produced: for, I think, nothing can be more evident, and unquestionably true, than this, that the apostle doth not here speak of himself in his own person, or in the state he was then in; but, as the ancient commentators do interpret him, δι' ἑαυτοῦ ὁ ἀπόστολος τὸν κοινὸν ἄνθρωπον δηλοῖ, "by himself he represents man in common," and saith not, as he might have done, You that are under the law are carnal, but τὰ ἐκείνων ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦ σχηματίζων, καὶ τὸ τραχὺ σφοδρὸν ἐκλύων, καὶ λεαίνων τῇ περὶ ἑαυτὸν σχηματολογίᾳ, "representing what belonged to them in his own person, and so taking off the harshness, and mollifying the invidiousness of the sentence," by speaking of it in his own person, he saith, "I am carnal, sold under sin." So Photius and Œcumenius. Theodoret also doth inform us, that the apostle here introduceth, ver. 14, τὸν πρὸ τῆς χάριτος ἄνθρωπον πολιορκούμενον ὑπὸ τῶν παθῶν, "a man before grace overcome by his passions; for he calls him carnal who had not yet obtained the assistance of the Holy Spirit." And again, ver. 23, he adds, that the apostle having discoursed all these things, ὥστε δεῖξαί τινες μὲν πρὸ τῆς χάριτος ἦμεν, "to show what we were before grace, and what we were made after grace, and as it were taking upon himself the person of those who before grace were vanquished by sin, he groans and laments, as a man set in the midst of his enemies, enslaved and constrained to serve, and seeing no help; and thus he shows the law unable to help us." And so Origen also frequently in his commentary on the place; and Austin saith expressly and frequently, Describitur homo sub lege positus ante gratiam, Liber Expos. Quat. Propos. ex Epist. ad Rom. Quo loco videtur mihi apostolus, transfigurâsse in se hominem sub lege positum, Ad Simplic. Mediol. lib. i. Et in hæc verba, Non ego operor illud, &c. loquitur adhuc ex personâ hominis sub lege constituti, nondum sub gratiâ: though he was pleased afterward to change his opinion, and so gave occasion to the perverting the plain sense of the apostle. For confutation of this dangerous opinion, I need not say much after the labours of Arminius, the reverend Dr. Hammond, Mr. Bull, and Mr. Kettlewell, who have made it manifest,

First, That it is usual with the apostle to make this metaschematism, or to speak especially of things that might be otherwise offensive and ungrateful, in his own name, when indeed they belong not to him, but to other men; as in these words, Rom. iii. 7, "If the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie, why am I also judged as a sinner?" i. e. not I Paul, but I who make this objection. So Gal. ii. 16, 17, 1 Cor. iv. 6, "These things μετεσχημάτισα, I have in a figure transferred to myself and Apollos for you sakes" (1 Cor. vi. 12, xiii. 2, x. 22. 30, Eph. ii. 3, 1 Thess. iv. 17).

Secondly, That such things are in this chapter said of the person spoken of, as can by no means agree to Paul, or to any regenerate person: to which may be added,

First, That had Paul spoken here of himself, considered in the state in which he was at the inditing of this epistle, he must have contradicted what he had said of himself in the Epistle to the Thessalonians, and to the Corinthians, which were writ before this epistle. For (1.) in his Epistle to the Thessalonians he saith, "You are witnesses, and God also, how holily, and righteously, and unblameably we have behaved ourselves among you that believed," 1 Thess. ii. 10. In his Second Epistle to the Corinthians he speaks thus: "This is our rejoicing, even the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity, and godly sincerity, not in fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have conversed in this world," 2 Cor. i. 12; that he knew nothing by himself, for which to condemn himself, 1 Cor. iv. 4; that he "kept under his body, and brought it into subjection," 1 Cor. ix. 27. Now, can the man who is "carnal," and "sold under sin," who hath no power in him to do any good, who "finds a law in his members warring against the law of his mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin, which is in his members," call God and the church to witness to his holy and unblameable life? Can he boast of keeping under his fleshly body, and bringing that into subjection, which by his own confession bringeth him into captivity? Can he, who does not what he would in his mind and conscience do, but what he hates; not "the good which he would," but "the evil which he would not," do; can he, I say, rejoice in the testimony of his conscience? Can he honestly declare "he knows nothing by himself, for which his conscience can condemn him?"

Secondly, How oft doth the apostle propose himself for a pattern to the churches unto whom he writes, requiring them to be "followers of him as he was also of Christ?" 1 Cor. xi. 1. And again, "What things you have learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, these do, and the God of love and peace shall be with you," Phil. iv. 8, i. e.

be you "carnal, sold under sin;" living in the commission of the things you hate, and your mind condemns, and doing what you judge to be evil, and yielding yourselves "captive to the law of sin which is in your members," and then "the God of love and peace shall be with you." This sure is an absurd, if not blasphemous, exhortation, and yet, according to this exposition, it must be suitable to the mind of the apostle.

Thirdly, With what indignation doth he reject the accusations of them, who looked upon him as "walking after the flesh," and how severely doth he threaten them, how peremptorily doth he reject their scandalous imputation; declaring that "though he walked in the flesh, yet did he not walk according to the flesh," 2 Cor. x. 2, 3, and yet, if he were "carnal, sold under sin;" if "with the flesh he served the law of sin;" if the law of the fleshly members "warred against the law of his mind, and brought him into captivity to the law of sin," he doth here in effect confess what there he peremptorily denies, and with such indignation doth reject.

Fourthly, This exposition of the seventh chapter makes it entirely to confute the chapter which immediately goes before, and that which follows after; and it gives an invincible strength to the objections he endeavours to answer in the sixth chapter. The first objection there begins by way of inquiry, "What do we say then? Shall we still continue in sin, that grace may abound?" his second by way of like inquiry, "Shall we sin because we are not under the law, but under grace?" ver. 15; "God forbid," saith he, that it should be thus with any Christian: and yet, according to this exposition, it was thus with himself, one of the best of Christians: for sure he must continue in sin, who was still "sold under sin," still "serving the law of sin with his flesh;" still doing that evil he allowed not, the evil which he hated, and he would not do; and who was still "brought into captivity to the law of sin which was in his members."

Again, In his answer to these inquiries, he shows the Christian could not continue in, or live any longer in it, because he was "dead to sin," his "old man was crucified with Christ, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth he might not serve sin" (ver. 2. 6); and because being dead to, he was "freed from sin" (ver. 7), he was "made free from sin, and became the servant of righteousness." But can he that is "sold under sin," and is "brought into captivity to the law of sin, which is in his members," be at the same time "dead to sin," and "free from sin?" Can he who "with his flesh serves the law of sin," be said to "cease from sin," and "not henceforth to serve sin?" not to "obey it in the lusts thereof" (ver. 12), not to "yield his members instruments of sin unto unrighteousness?" ver. 13. Surely there is as clear an opposition betwixt the Christian represented in the sixth chapter, as free from sin, and in the seventh, as miserably enslaved to the law of sin and death which was in his members, as betwixt light and darkness!

Again, he saith expressly, viii. 2, "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Whereas the person mentioned in the seventh is "sold under sin," is "brought into captivity to the law of sin," and crieth out under his bondage, "O miserable man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" He therefore cannot be the person "freed by the Spirit from the law of sin and death."

In fine, this exposition of the close of this chapter contradicts the beginning of it; for there the apostle saith of himself, and all his Christian brethren, that this was only their state under the law, from which they are delivered, "that they might bring forth fruit unto God," and "serve him in newness of spirit." For what else can be the meaning of these words, ver. 5, 6, "For when we were in the flesh, the motions of sin, which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death. But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve God in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter." So that they who make the apostle say of himself, that he was "brought into captivity to the law of sin, which was in his members," and to cry out, "O wretched man that I am; who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" i. e. this body of sin which worketh death; make him also to confess, that "the motions of sin did still work in his members, to bring forth fruit unto death," and that therefore he was still in the flesh. I therefore conclude this discourse in the words of Grotius on ver. 19, Deo laus sit quòd optimi, i. e. trium priorum seculorum Christiani hunc locum, sicut oportet, intellexerint, dictante illo Spiritû per quem vita illorum regebatur.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 (Being then married to this other husband, Christ, and so freed from the motions of sin, which are by the law, that we may serve God in newness of spirit, vii. 4—6). There is therefore (ἄρα, verily) now no condemnation to them which are in [1] Christ Jesus, (by faith, they being such) who walk not after the flesh (as whilst they were under the law they did), but after the Spirit (conferred upon them by faith in Christ).

2 For [2] the law of the Spirit of life (given to them who are) in Christ Jesus hath made me (believing in him) free from the law of sin and (so from that) death (which is the wages of it).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἐν Χριστῷ, In Christ.] The phrase εἶναι ἐν Χριστῷ, "to be in Christ," saith Mr. Le Clerc, is often used by Paul for being a Christian, which note he borrowed from Castalio, who renders it Christiani facti; but if either of them mean only Christians by profession, or by being only members of the Christian church, this will by no means agree with this place, nor any other of like nature: since freedom from condemnation, and other benefits conferred upon us through Jesus Christ, will not follow our being Christians in this sense; but upon a lively faith in Christ, our union to him by the Spirit, and our being so in him as to become new creatures, according to those words, ver. 9, "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him, he is none of his;" 2 Cor. v. 17, "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with its affections and lusts" (see 1 Cor. i. 30, 2 Cor. x. 7, xiii. 5, Gal. iii. 28, 29, v. 6, 1 Thess. iv. 16, 1 John v. 20).

Τοῖς κατὰ σάρκα περιπατοῦσι, ἀλλὰ κατὰ Πνεῦμα.] These words, saith Dr. Mills, are an addition to the text; see the proof of the contrary, Examen Millii in locum.

[2] Ver. 2. Ὁ γὰρ νόμος τοῦ Πνεύματος, For the law of the Spirit of life.] i. e. The Spirit of Christ gives me a new life, is now another law or rule of my actions, freeing me from the motions and power of sin, to which I was subject whilst under the law, and from the death to which that subjected me; or the gospel, attended with the Spirit, hath wrought this freedom in me, as Methodius interprets the words, ὁ γὰρ νόμος τοῦ Πνεύματος, ὁ δέ ἐστι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, Method. apud Phot. p. 918, ver. 3.

[3] Ver. 3. Τὸ γὰρ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου, For what could not be done by the law.] i. e. That freedom from the guilt of sin and death it could not minister, ὁ Θεὸς τὸν ἑαυτοῦ υἱὸν πέμψας ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας, "God sending his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh," sub. ἀνυπάρκτου ἐποίησε, hath made feasible: examples of the like ellipsis are numerous: so Luke xi. 17, "Every kingdom, διαμερισθεῖσα, divided against itself is brought to desolation," καὶ οἶκος ἐπὶ οἶκον, sub. διαμερισθείς, and "a house (divided) against a house falleth." That this is the sense is evident from Matt. xii. 25, Mark iii. 25, where it is οἰκία μερισθεῖσα καθ' ἑαυτήν· so κελευόντων, "commanding," is to be understoood after κωλυόντων "forbidding," 1 sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh (did), and [4] for sin (Gr. καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, and [5] by a sacrifice for sin), condemned sin in the flesh (i. e. took away its power to condemn us, the condemnation due unto us for it being inflicted on him):

4 That the [6] righteousness of the law (i. e. the inward purity and righteousness the law required) might be (performed and) fulfilled in (and by) us, who walk not after (the lusts of) the flesh, but after the (motions of the) Spirit. (Or,

"That the justification which the law promised, by saying, Do this, and thou shalt live, Luke x. 28, Deut. iv. 1, xxx. 15. 19, Ezek. xx. 11, and that this shall be thy righteousness, Deut. vi. 25, might be completed in us, who walk according to the Spirit, and so are absolved not only from condemnation for our past sins, by faith, but from condemnation by the new covenant, by walking according to the Spirit: for to be spiritually minded is life, ver. 6."

5 Not after the flesh, I say,) For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh (i. e. affect, and desire, and pursue carnal things); but they that are after the Spirit (affect, desire, and pursue,) the things of the Spirit (and so the one pursues the things which tend to death, and the other those things which tend to life).

6 For [7] to be carnally minded is (the way which tends to) death; but to be spiritually minded is (the

Tim. iv. 3, and καυχάσθω, "let him rejoice," is to be supplied from the ninth verse, James i. 10.

[4] Καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, And for sin.] This phrase in the Old Testament is the usual phrase for a sin-offering: so "a bullock for a sin-offering" is μόσχος περὶ ἁμαρτίας, Lev. iv. 3. 18, viii. 2. 14, ix. 2. 8, xvi. 3. 6. 27, ver. 9. 11; the "lamb for a sin-offering" is πρόβατον περὶ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, Lev. iv. 32, or ἀμνὸς περὶ ἁμαρτίας, Lev. v. 6, 7, Numb. vi. 16. And in like manner, the "goat for a sin-offering" is χίμαιρα περὶ ἁμαρτίας, Lev. v. 6, or χίμαιρος, Lev. ix. 3. 15, x. 6, xvi. 5. 15. 27, xxiii. 19, &c.; the "dove for a sin-offering" is ὁ τρύγων περὶ ἁμαρτίας, Lev. v. 7, xii. 6. 8, xiv. 22. 31, xv. 15, &c.; the "sin-offering" is τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, Lev. v. 8, 9. 11, vi. 30, vii. 7. 37, &c., and so in many other places. This therefore is sufficient to establish the sense of these words given in the paraphrase. Now the constant effect of this sin-offering was this, to make an atonement for the sin committed, that it might be forgiven, and the guilt of it might be done away. It therefore seems most reasonable to interpret the effect of this sacrifice delivered in these words, "And for sin, condemned sin in the flesh," agreeably to the constant design of all sacrifices for sin; and then these words must signify, not that he gave us power to kill sin, or, by this example of his wrath against it, engaged us to forsake our sinful courses; but that he took away its condemning power; he condemning that which before condemned us, enabling us to say, τίς ὁ κατακρίνων; "Who is he that condemns us? it is Christ that died," Rom. viii. 34. He killed sin, or made it dead by that death, which caused it not to be imputed to us to death (2 Cor. xv. 19). And this is the thing which the law could not do; it could not give life to a person condemned to death (Gal. iii. 21); it could not justify, or free us from condemnation.

[5] Καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, And by a sacrifice for sin condemned sin in the flesh.] The plain meaning of these words, saith Mr. L., is this, "That sin itself was condemned, or put to death in Christ's flesh, i. e. was suffered to have no life or being in the flesh of our Saviour, he being in all things tempted as we are, yet without sin, Heb. iv. 15." But this certainly is a false interpretation; for as sin could not be "put to death" in him, in whom it never lived, or could have any being; so much less could this be done by his offering a sacrifice for sin, that being only done at the close of his life; whereas Christ was free from sin from his conception; and being done then by a sin-offering to make atonement for the guilt of sin. The true meaning of the words is therefore this, That justification, or freedom from the guilt of sin, which the law could not procure, because of the weakness of the flesh rendering us obnoxious to sin, and so to death for it, God by sending his Son in our human nature did procure, and by giving up his Son to be a sacrifice to make atonement for the sin committed by the flesh, ἔκρινε καθ' ἁμαρτίαν, "he judged against sin in the flesh;" that is, either he showed that it deserved condemnation, as requiring an atonement to free us from the guilt of it; or else he, by this sacrifice, condemned that which before condemned us, and took away its power of condemning believers, enabling them to say, "Who is he that condemns us? It is Christ that died," ver. 34.

[6] Ver. 4. Τὸ δικαίωμα τοῦ νόμου, The righteousness of the law,] Is a phrase which occurs only here, and Rom. ii. 26, where it plainly signifies the righteousness contained in the moral law, or those internal principles of holiness, justice, and goodness, which are comprised in it, these being the "weightier matters of the law," Matt. xxiii. 23, and the only things in which the uncircumcision, or the gentiles, could keep, τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ νόμου, "the righteousness of the law;" here therefore, I conceive, the phrase bears the same sense, and confutes the vain imaginations of the Antinomians.

That which hath made most commentators interpret the third verse otherwise than I have done, seems to be this, that they seem not sufficiently to have considered the double effect of our Lord's death and passion, and the order in which they are placed in scripture, viz. (1.) freedom from condemnation, justification, and reconciliation to God; and (2.) the vouchsafement of his Spirit, as the consequent of that faith which rendered us the sons of God; God being first reconciled to us by faith in his Son's blood, and then giving us this token of his love, viz. his Spirit to dwell in our hearts; by the first of which we are justified, and by the second we are sanctified; by the first freed from the law of death, by the second from the law of sin, 1 Cor. vi. 11; the first, is "the grace of God," we being "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus," Rom. iii. 24; the second is "the gift through grace:" the first justification, the second ἡ δωρεὰ δικαιοσύνης, "the gift following upon our justification,"—"being justified freely by his grace, we have peace with God," Rom. v. 1; and then, "the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, by the Spirit that he hath given us," ver. 5; "Ye are all the sons of God by faith in Christ Jesus, and because ye are sons, God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts," Gal. iv. 6. Whence he is here styled "the Spirit of adoption," ver. 16; "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, that the blessing of Abraham (i. e. justification by faith) might come upon the gentiles, that they might receive the promise of the Spirit," Gal. iii. 14. For believing in him, "we are sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise," Eph. i. 14. Now these two being always connexed, the apostle goes frequently from the one to the other; first mentioning our freedom from condemnation, then our "walking in the Spirit," ver. 1, 2. Our freedom from the guilt of sin by the death of Christ, ver. 3, and then our fulfilling the righteousness of the law by the Spirit of Christ, ver. 4. And because the law could not justify, or free us from the condemning power of sin, therefore concluding that it could not give the Spirit of Christ to sanctify us, and that we therefore must be "freed from the law," that we might "serve God in the newness of the Spirit," Rom. vi. 7, Gal. iii. 3, ver. 6, 7. 9.

[7] Ver. 6, 7. To be carnally minded, (Gr. φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς, the wisdom of the flesh) is death, because the carnal mind (Gr. the wisdom of the flesh) is enmity to God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither can be; so they who are in the flesh cannot please God.] Hence it is by some inferred, that the unregenerate can do nothing that is truly good, nothing but what is evil, and displeasing to God.

To this I answer, That this is one of the texts abused by ancient heretics, to prove that "the flesh was by nature evil," we learn from Epiphanius,* and from Chrysostom upon the place, who therefore well observes, that by flesh here, we are not to understand the body, or the substance of the body, ἀλλὰ τὸν σαρκικὸν βίον καὶ κοσμικὸν, καὶ τρυφῆς καὶ way that leads to) life and peace (ver. 7, which life and peace cannot be obtained by them that are carnally minded).

7 Because the carnal mind is (that which sets us at) enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be (subject to it, whilst it continues such).

8 So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God.

9 But (it is not so with you Christians, for) ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now [8] if any man have not the Spirit of Christ (dwelling in him), he is none of his.

10 And if Christ be in you (by his Spirit), [9] the body is dead (it is indeed mortal) because of sin (which will never cease to be in us till we die); but the Spirit is life (i. e. will give life to it again) because of righteousness (or of that justification which is unto life, Rom. v. 17, 18).

11 But (for) if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead (by the Spirit dwelling in him) [10] shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his (same) [11] Spirit that dwelleth in you.

ἀσωτίας γέμοντα, τὸν ὅλον σάρκα ποιοῦντα τὸν ἄνθρωπον, "but a worldly carnal life, full of luxury and riotous living, and turning the whole man into flesh," as is evident from the phrase, "the wisdom of the flesh," engaging us only to mind the things of the flesh, and to be of the flesh, as the true Christian is of the Spirit, being led by, and walking in, the Spirit. And, saith Methodius,* were this said of them, who are in this body of flesh, that they cannot please God; they who commit theft, whoredom, or any other like sin, could not, on this account, be subject to reprehension by a just judge; it being then impossible for the flesh to be subject to the law of God; nor could then the intemperate person be reduced to chastity and virtue, the body lying under a natural necessity not to be subject to the law of God.

Secondly, The apostle doth indeed say, that they, who thus mind carnal things, while they continue so to do, cannot please God; this being only in effect to say, in the words of Chrysostom, ἀδύνατον πονηρὸν μένοντα, that whilst men go on in their sinful courses, they cannot please God, or live in subjection to his laws: but then, saith he, as Christ only says, "An evil tree," whilst it continues such, "cannot bring forth good fruit;" but doth not say an evil tree cannot be made good, but on the contrary saith, "Make the tree good, that the fruit may be good," Matt. xii. 33, so is it here; for the apostle, by his frequent exhortations to these carnal men, to "crucify the flesh," and "mortify the flesh, with its lusts," or the deeds of it, and to "put off the old man with his deeds;" by his threats, that "if they live after the flesh they shall die;" and by his promises, that "if through the Spirit they do mortify the deeds of the flesh, they shall live," doth show, that men may cease to live according to the flesh, and may so mortify the deeds of the flesh, that they may live. God, saith Chrysostom, hath put this ἐν ἐλευθερίᾳ προαιρέσεως, "in our free choice," so that, ἐν σοὶ λοιπόν ἐστι καὶ τοῦτο γενέσθαι, κἀκεῖνο, since the vouchsafement of the gospel, "it is in thine own power to be carnally minded, or spiritually," there being now greater strength and inducement so to be than ever.

[8] Ver. 9. If any man be in Christ he is a new creature; and he that hath not the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him, is none of his.] Hence it is plain, that none are truly said to be in Christ, by a profession of faith, provided they live not answerable to that profession, or be not renewed in mind, will, affections, and conversation; and from the following words, "If the Spirit of Christ dwell in you, he that raised the Lord Jesus from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit dwelling in you," it is evident, first, that it is not the soul, but the mortal body, which the Spirit is said here, ζωοποιεῖν, to give life to. Secondly, That the promise of being raised by the Spirit of Christ belongs only to them whose bodies shall be raised to the resurrection of life eternal. As for others, they being only, Χριστιανοὶ ὀνομαζόμενοι, "Christians in name," and not in truth and sincerity (1 Cor. v. 11), and persons to whom Christ will then say, "I never knew you," they shall be raised by the power of Christ, but not by virtue of a union with the Spirit of Christ.

[9] Ver. 10. Τὸ μὲν σῶμα νεκρὸν δι' ἁμαρτίαν, The body is dead because of sin.] That the apostle speaks not here of a moral, but of a natural death of the body, appears from this consideration, that in the verse following he speaks of this mortal body, and of the raising it from the dead; and that by "the Spirit" he doth not understand the spirit of a man, but the Holy Ghost, is also evident, because this Spirit, in the foregoing verse, is "the Spirit of Christ;" in the following verse, "the Spirit that raised Christ from the dead," and will raise us, in whom he doth inhabit, from it.

Now the reason why, after our freedom from condemnation by the death of Christ, our bodies are still subject to death, is thus assigned by the fathers;* "Because should we have lived for ever in this imperfect state, we should have sinned for ever," and therefore "God permits good men still to die, that sin might not live for ever in them, doing this not out of his displeasure to punish them for sin, but out of mercy to free them from it."

[10] Ver. 11. Ζωοποιήσει τὰ θνητὰ σώματα ὑμῶν, Shall quicken your mortal bodies.] The late commentator and paraphrast, here exposed by Mr. Locke, is D. W., and yet he is so unhappy, as neither to approve of Mr. L.'s interpretation, nor dislike his own. He cannot approve of Mr. L.'s interpretation, that σῶμα νεκρὸν, and θνητὸν, signify a body morally dead, because sin reigns not in it; (1.) because σῶμα νεκρὸν, absolutely put, bears no such sense in scripture, but only signifies a body without life, or breath, James ii. 16. (2.) Because this interpretation makes the apostle say, ver. 10, the body is dead already, i. e. as to all activity of sin, which reigns no longer in it, its sinful carnal lust being mortified, and yet makes him promise, ver. 11, that if the Spirit of God dwell in us, God shall quicken our mortal bodies, i. e., saith Mr. L., "he shall deliver them from the dominion of their carnal lusts;" that is, it makes him promise God shall do hereafter what he told us, ver. 10, was already done. (3.) In those words, "He that raiseth Christ from the dead," the apostle must be supposed to speak of a real death of the body; and therefore in the latter clause of the same sentence, "He shall quicken their mortal bodies," it is reasonable to conceive, he speaks of quickening those bodies in the same sense, viz. by raising them from the dead. Nor hath Mr. L. said any thing of weight against this sense. For,

First, Whereas he saith, "It cannot be proved that θνητὰ, mortal bodies, here signifies the same as νεκρὰ:" (1.) he hath not proved the contrary. (2.) His own interpretation plainly makes them both to signify the same. And, (3.) what is more likely than that σῶμα νεκρὸν, ver. 10, and σώματα θνητὰ, ver. 11, should be of the same import?

Secondly, When he addeth, that "θνητὸν, mortal, always signifies the thing joined with it to be living;" he considered not that the same apostle saith, that at the resurrection from the dead, τὸ θνητὸν τοῦτο, "this mortal body shall put on immortality;" and that when, τὸ θνητὸν τοῦτο, "this mortal body shall have put on immortality, death shall be swallowed up in victory." Secondly, I add, that θνητὸν, when 12 Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh (any longer, but rather to live after the Spirit).

13 For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die (i. e. be subject to death, as the punishment of sin, or to the second death): but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live (and your bodies shall be raised to eternal life).

14 For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the [12] sons of God.

15 For ye have not received [13] the spirit of bondage again to (the) fear (of death, as they who were under the law did, that threatening death to every one that continued not in all things written in the law to do them, Deut. xxvii. 16); but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, (given to us because we are sons, Gal. iv. 6,) whereby we cry, Abba, Father (i. e. we are assured that God is our Father, and so that we are heirs of God and sons of the resurrection.

16 For) The Spirit itself (Gr. the same Spirit) beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God (and this gives us a full assurance of that blessed life, enabling us to conclude thus):

17 And if (therefore we be) children, then (are we also) heirs; [14] heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ (the Son of God, now reigning gloriously in heaven); if so be that we suffer with him, (and so be conformed to his image, ver. 29,) that we may be also glorified together.

18 (Which sufferings we have reason to endure for the securing this glorious estate;) For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time (we live in the world) are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed [15] in us (or to the glory afterward to be revealed to us).

19 For (so desirable is it, that) [16] the earnest expectation of the creature (subject now to vanity) waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God (i. e. the whole race of mankind earnestly expects it).

20 For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same (i. e. the ἡ κτίσις, whole race of men, ἡ κτίσις ἀνθρωπίνη, 1 Pet. ii. 13, were made subject to corruption not of their own accord, but by reason of Adam, who by his sin subjected his posterity to death and cor- it relates, as here, to a body, to be quickened, never bears any other sense, but that of a dead body.

Thirdly, "If by quickening here," saith he, "be meant the raising them to life from the dead, how can this be mentioned as a peculiar favour to those who have the Spirit of God?" for God will also raise the bodies of the wicked. Ans. True, but he will raise them by his power, not by his Spirit dwelling in them: not as "the sons of God," to be made "joint-heirs" with Christ, ver. 16, 17, but as the children of Satan, to be cast into the "fire prepared for the devil and his angels:" not lastly, to live a happy life, ver. 13, but to die "the second death."

Lastly, Whereas he objects the want of connexion in this interpretation, with the subject the apostle is here discoursing of, that is very plain; for the apostle is here discoursing of the benefits and advantages which Christians shall receive by living, "not after the flesh, but after the Spirit;" that this will cause them to "mind spiritual things," ver. 5, that it will give them "life and peace," ver. 6. So that though their bodies die because of sin, they shall obtain a happy resurrection through the Spirit dwelling in them; ἄρα οὖν, "therefore," saith he, ver. 12, "we are debtors not to live after the flesh, for they that do so, ἀποθνήσκονται, shall die" (not in the moral, but the penal sense), "but they who through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the flesh shall live;" for, ver. 14, "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God," and so shall obtain "the adoption, i. e. the redemption of the body" from corruption, ver. 23.

[11] Διὰ τοῦ ἐνοικοῦντος αὐτοῦ Πνεύματος ἐν ὑμῖν, By the Spirit that dwelleth in you.] This is spoken according to the opinion of the Jews, that the resurrection shall be effected by virtue of the Holy Spirit, which they conclude from those words of the prophet Ezekiel, xxxvii. 9, 10, "Come O Spirit, from the four winds, and blow upon these dead, that they may live." Thus was our Lord raised from the dead (1 Pet. iii. 18): thus shall we be raised, who are "the temple of the Holy Ghost," saith this verse. And with this agrees the doctrine of the ancient fathers: "Our bodies rising by the Spirit," saith Irenæus,* "shall be made spiritual, and by the Spirit shall have life."—"They who are dead and buried with Christ, may know that by the Spirit, which raised him up, they shall be raised."† So Origen.

[12] Ver. 14. Υἱοὶ Θεοῦ, Sons of God.] The strength of this argument will be exceeding clear from these considerations; that the adopted sons of God are "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ," and so must reign with him, ver. 17, which till they live again, and be raised from the dead, they cannot do; and that their adoption is "the redemption of their bodies" from corruption, ver. 23. (2.) That we are then completely "the sons of God," when we are "sons of the resurrection," Luke xx. 37, when we have "overcome," according to those words, Rev. xxi. 7, "He that overcometh shall inherit all things, and I will be to him a God, and he shall be to me a son." And something like this is that of the Jews on these words, Ps. lxxii. 17, ינון שמו, filiabitur nomen ejus; for, say they,* "His name is called Jinnon, quia ipse filiaturus est omnes dormientes in pulvere, because he will raise, and so make sons, all that sleep in the dust."

[13] Ver. 15. Πνεῦμα δουλείας, The spirit of bondage.] That the law was to the Jews a yoke of bondage, the apostle doth inform us, Gal. v. 1. And that they who were under it, were "in bondage to the elements of the world," Gal. iv. 3. 8; that it "gendered to bondage," and subjected its children to bondage, ver. 24, 25. 31; that they were "all their lifetime subject to bondage," through the fear of death, he informs us, Heb. ii. 15. And they had reason so to be, since, as the apostle teacheth, the law given by Moses did not exempt them from the death which Adam's sin had brought upon them, but rather made that death abound, and them obnoxious to it on many fresh accounts; for "the law entered that the offence might abound" (unto death), Rom. v. 1, and the law coming, "sin revived, and I died; and the commandment was found to be unto death," the "motions of sin which were by the law working in their members to bring forth fruit unto death," vii. 4. 10. This therefore gives a clear account of the paraphrase of the first part of the verse: But we, saith he, shall live a life immortal, and enjoy a happy resurrection, as being the "sons of God," and in token of this we have received "the Spirit of adoption," enabling us to call God Father, and assuring us we are his children, and so he, being our God, must have "prepared for us a city," Heb. xi. 16.

[14] Ver. 17. Κληρονόμοι μὲν Θεοῦ, The heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ.] All having our share in this glorious inheritance, though he, as the eldest brother, hath a double portion.

[15] Ver. 18.] Εἰς ἡμᾶς often signifies, to, or towards us: and is so rendered in this epistle, v. 8. Or, for us, as xvi. 6. See for the first sense, 1 Cor. xiv. 36, 2 Cor. i. 11, ix. 5. 8, x. 1, xiii. 3, Eph. i. 8, 9, Col. i. 5, 1 Thess. iv. 8, Heb. ii. 3, and for the second, 1 Cor. xv. 10, 2 Cor. ii. 4, Eph. iii. 2, Col. i. 25, 1 Thess. v. 18.

[16] Ver. 19. Ἀποκαραδοκία τῆς κτίσεως, The earnest expectation of the creature.] Here it is to be noted, that, in the sacred dialect, desire and expectation is ascribed to creatures in reference to things they want, and which tend to their advantage, though they explicitly know nothing of them. Thus the Messiah is called προσδοκία τῶν ἐθνῶν, "the Expectation of the gentiles," Gen. xlix. 10, חמדת, "the Desire of all nations," Hag. iii. 7.

[17] Ver. 21. Ἐπ' ἐλπίδι, In hope.] So the Syriac and many Greek commentators do begin this verse.

Ἀπὸ τῆς δουλείας τῆς φθορᾶς, From the bondage of corruption.] That is, from the mortality which all their lives long made them subject to bondage (Heb. ii. 15).

[18] Ver. 22. Πᾶσα ἡ κτίσις, The whole creation.] All the world under that sense of mortality which still subjects them to bondage; for, as Cicero confesses,* "death must be terrible to those who with their life lose the enjoyment of all good things, and if it be an evil, must be an eternal evil, because it doth for ever deprive them of all good;" that† mortis metù omnis quietæ vitæ status perturbatur, "the fear of it disturbs all the tranquillity of life;" and that this renders our whole life miserable,‡ quæ enim potest in vitâ esse jucunditas, cùm dies et noctes cogitandum sit jam jamque esse moriendum? i. e. "for what pleasure can there be in that life which is perpetually perplexed with the thoughts of death?"

[19] Ver. 23. Υἱοθεσίαν, The adoption.] I know there is another exposition of these words, to this effect: That by the creature, we are to understand the gentile world, in opposition to the Christians, the word בריאה among the rabbins signifying the gentiles, in opposition to the Jews, the people of God; that their "waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God," is their waiting to see what the Jews will do, who of them will be true sons of God, who not; who of them will embrace the faith of Christ, who not; their happiness depending punctually upon the issue of this: their being made "subject to vanity," is their being subject to "the vanity of their minds," ignorance, and idolatry, Rom. i. 21, Eph. iii. 20, Eph. i. 17. That to this idolatry they were made subject, "not willingly," but by the devil's imposing it upon them, as an act of religion, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond: in pœnam incepti Babylonici, "in punishment of their attempt to build the tower of Babel," saith Dr. Lightfoot. That their hopes of being "delivered from this bondage of corruption," are their hopes of being rescued from this idolatry, those filthy courses they were engaged in, and the bondage they were in to Satan; and to be made Christ's freemen, to have a right to God's favour, and the future blessings consequent upon it, the word φθορὰ having that sense (Deut. iv. 6, Wisd. xiv. 12, 2 Pet. i. 4, ii. 12, 1 Cor. xv. 33, 2 Cor. xi. 3). But against every part of this interpretation there lies this objection, that it is not only wholly new, but wholly contrary to all antiquity, and also to the text; and it is liable to many just exceptions, as, v. g. first, κτίσις, saith this interpretation, is the gentile world, whereas πᾶσα κτίσις hath no such sense in scripture. The phrase πᾶσα κτίσις is used but three or four times more in the New Testament; twice in the Epistle to the Colossians, where Christ is styled the first-born πάσης κτίσεως, "of the whole creation," not only of the gentile world: and the gospel is said to be preached ἐν πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει, Col. i. 23, i. e. to Jew and gentile, to the whole world, or to all mankind, ver. 6; once in Peter, where subjection is required πάσῃ ἀνθρωπίνῃ κτίσει, to magistrates among men, 1 Pet. ii. 13, not only heathen sure, but also Christian, when the government should be put into their hands; and once in Mark, where the apostles are commanded to preach the gospel πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει, "to every creature," Mark xvi. 15. Now because the same disciples are commanded to preach εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, "to all nations," Matt. xviii. 19, hence it is argued, that πᾶσα κτίσις signifies the heathen world, in opposition to the Jews; whereas it plainly signifies all nations, both Jew and gentile, as is evident from these words of Christ to them, that they should "preach in his name repentance and remission of sins εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," Luke xxiv. 47. And so the whole foundation of this interpretation is destroyed, for in these places πᾶσα κτίσις is equivalent to all mankind.

To "wait for the manifestation of the sons of God," is not to wait to see what the Jews would do, who had not received the adoption, and were not the sons of God, as wanting that faith by which men become sons, Gal. iii. 26, but to expect τὴν ἡμέτεραν τελείωσιν, "our perfection, τὴν ἀφθαρσίαν, our advancement to a state of incorruption; τὴν μέλλουσαν ἡμῶν δόξαν, our future glory;" so Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact: for it must (by reason of the connective particle γὰρ) be the same with "the glory that is to be revealed," ver. 18, and with "the glorious liberty of the sons of God," ver. 12. "They expect," saith Origen, "that time when these things shall be revealed, which are prepared for them that are the sons of God."

To be "made subject to vanity," is not to be made subject to idolatry, but to be made subject to corruption, τῇ φθορᾷ· so Chrysostom, Œcumenius, Theophylact; for τὴν ματαιότητα καλεῖ τὴν φθοράν, "he calls that mutability and vanity, to which all things in the world are subject, corruption," saith Theodoret. When the apostle saith, "The creature was made subject to vanity," and in bondage to corruption,* mihi videtur quòd de hâc materiali, et corruptibilis corporis substantiâ ista dicuntur, neque enim corruptio alicui cuiquam dominatur nisi corpori; "this," saith Origen, "seems to be spoken of the body, for that only is subject to corruption." As is apparent also from the thing they groan for, viz. "the redemption of the body" from corruption, that "this mortal might put on immortality," or be clothed with its house from heaven, that "mortality might be swallowed up of life," 2 Cor. v. 1—5. Secondly, it cannot truly be said that the heathen were not willingly subject to idolatry; for the apostle saith they subjected themselves to it against the light of nature, and so "became without excuse," and that "when they knew God, they did not glorify him as God," Rom. i. 20—23. And this sense of the word vanity is very frequent in the Psalms, and in Ecclesiastes. Thus David contemplating the frailty of man, and how soon he vanisheth away, cries out, "Every man therefore is but vanity," τὰ σύμπαντα ματαιότης πᾶς ἄνθρωπος ζῶν, Ps. xxxix. 5. 11. And again, ἄνθρωπος ματαιότητι ὡμοιώθη, "Man is like to vanity, his days pass away like a shadow," Ps. cxliv. 4. And because all things here below are so frail, so subject to change and to vanish, and man hath so short a time to possess them; therefore, saith the Preacher, "Vanity of vanities," are they, "all is vanity," Eccles. i. 2. And when Adam became mortal, he called his son Abel, "vanity," Gen. iv. 2.

The vanity to which the whole creation is subject, doth not therefore signify the vain employments and distractions of this present life, but that state of mortality from which the psalmist infers, "Every man therefore is but vanity;" for it is thus subject to vanity in hope of deliverance from that bondage of corruption, which Mr. Le Clerc owns to be the corruption to which our body is naturally liable, and from which we Christians wait to be delivered by the redemption of the body from corruption (see note on ver. 23): and therefore he who subjected us to this state is not God, who brought not death into the world, but Adam, "by whom sin entered into the world, and death by sin." To be "delivered from this bondage of corruption," is not to be delivered from idolatry, nor doth δουλεία τῆς φθορᾶς ever bear this sense; but the sense is οὐκ ἔτι ἔσται φθαρτὴ, "the creature shall not then be corruptible, ἔσται γὰρ ἡ κτίσις ἄφθαρτος, ὥσπερ καὶ δι' ἡμᾶς γέγονε φθαρτὴ, for as the creature was made corruptible by us, so shall it be made incorruptible with us:" so Œcumenius, Theodoret, Theophylact. For that which it groans for is its redemption from corruption (ver. 23). Having thus offered my reasons against this interpretation, it will be very easy to confirm the ancient and true explication of the words from the scope and argument of the apostle here. For I have shown from ver. 11, that the apostle is here treating of the resurrection of the body to eternal life; that, ver. 13, he declares that life belongs to them alone, who "through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the flesh;" that, ver. 14, he proves they shall enjoy this life and resurrection, because they are "the sons of God;" and, ver. 17, that being sons, they must be "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ;" first suffering, and then reigning in glory with him; that, ver. 18, to encourage Christians thus to suffer, he shows the greatness of that glory they shall then enjoy, styling it δόξαν μέλλουσαν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι, "the glory to be revealed hereafter," i. e. after the sufferings of this present life, to which it is opposed, are ended: for, as Chrysostom and Theophylact well note, he saith not πρὸς τὴν μέλλουσαν ἄνεσιν, these sufferings are not worthy to be compared "to our future ease" from them in this life, but πρὸς τὴν μέλλουσαν δόξαν, "to our future glory" in the next; when they that have communicated with Christ in his sufferings, shall rejoice in τῇ ἀποκαλύψει τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ, "the revelation of his glory," saith Peter, 1 Pet. iv. 13, συνδοξάσονται, "shall be glorified with him;" here, ver. 17, this glory he styles ἀποκάλυψις τῶν υἱῶν τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the revelation of the sons of God," i. e. say the fathers, the time when they shall τὴν ἀφθαρσίαν ἀπολαμβάνεσθαι, "become incorruptible, this corruptible putting on incorruption;" when they shall appear to be the sons of God, τῆς ἀναστάσεως υἱοὶ ὄντες, "being sons of the resurrection," ver. 14, comforting them in the expectation of it, and their groaning after it, with this consideration, that it is the expectation of all the world, and they groan together with them for it, desiring with them to be delivered from this "bondage to corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God," and adding, that not only they, but even Christians also, who had the first-fruits of that Spirit who is the earnest of our inheritance, εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποιήσεως, "till the redemption of the promised possession," Eph. i. 14, and "by whom we are sealed up εἰς ἡμέραν ἀπολυτρώσεως, to the day of redemption," Eph. iv. 30, did "groan, waiting for the adoption, viz. τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν τοῦ σώματος ἡμῶν, the redemption of our bodies from corruption," ver. 23. For that this was the thing for which they groaned, the same apostle informs us in these words; "We that are in this tabernacle groan being burdened, that we might be clothed upon with our house from heaven, that mortality might be swallowed up of life," 2 Cor. v. 2. 4. And as here, they who have the first-fruits of the Spirit do thus groan, so there it is said, ver. 5, "He who hath wrought this expectation in us is God, who hath also given to us the earnest of his Spirit." That this was the ancient and almost primitive exposition of these words, we learn from Irenæus,* in these words: Oportet ergò et ipsam conditionem redintegratam ad pristinum, sine prohibitione servire justis, et hoc apostolus fecit manifestum, in eâ quæ est ad Romanos sic dicens, Nam expectatio creaturæ est revelationem filiorum Dei expectat: and from these of Tertullian,* Tunc erit mali finis, cùm præses ejus diabolus abierit in ignem, cum revelatio filiorum Dei redemerit conditionem à malo, utique vanitati subjectam. I differ only from the fathers in this interpretation as to this single circumstance, that I do not extend this desire of "the redemption of the body from corruption" to brute beasts and insensate creatures, but only to mankind in general, subject by Adam's fall to mortality.

26 (And as patience, so) Likewise [21] the Spirit also helpeth (to relieve us in) our infirmities: for (when we are burdened with them) we know not what we should pray for as we ought (whether for increase of patience under, or deliverance from them; or if so, whether by absence from the body, or being clothed upon): but the Spirit itself (or, the same Spirit which testifies that we are the sons of God, ver. 16) maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered (Gr. with silent groanings after this redemption, ver. 23, 2 Cor. v. 2. 4, 5).

[20] Ver. 24. Τῇ γὰρ ἐλπίδι ἐσώθημεν, We are saved by hope.] Of this resurrection and redemption of the body, being "begotten to a lively hope, through the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ, of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in the heavens for us" (1 Pet. i. 5), and "rejoicing in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 2); and "through the Spirit waiting for the hope of righteousness through faith" (Gal. v. 5).

[21] Ver. 26. Τὸ Πνεῦμα, The Spirit.] Here these words cannot signify the spirit of a man, for that cannot be said to help with us, being a constituent part of us; or to intercede for us, when "we know not (ourselves) what to pray for as we ought;" for, saith Theophylact, Moses thus prayed to see the land of Canaan, and Jeremy for the Jews, and Paul to be delivered from "the thorn in the flesh:" but that Spirit of God who is said to intercede for us, not as an advocate or mediator betwixt God and us, that being the office of our great High-Priest, but as an exciter or director of us in our addresses to God, to render them for matter according to the will of God, and for manner, fervent and effectual; προσευχὴ ἐνεργουμένη, "inwrought prayer," and to make our very sighs and groanings prevalent; for he is here said only to intercede for us with sighs and groanings, excited by him, after that redemption to which he sealeth us, and of which he being the earnest and pledge, we are hence moved with greater faith and fervency to long for the enjoyment of it: and this is the reason why I think not fit to interpret this passage with some of the fathers of a public charisma, or gift of prayer, since that must spend itself in words for the edification of the church, and not in silent groanings (see Exod. ii. 24, vi. 5, Judg. ii. 18, Ps. xxxviii. 9, cii. 20, Acts vii. 34). Thus when our Lord had twice "groaned in the Spirit" (John xi. 33. 38), he saith, "I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast heard me" (ver. 41).

[22] Ver. 28. Πάντα, All things.] That under "all things" should be comprehended "the sins of good men," is the unreasonable suggestion of St. Austin; and some of the schoolmen after him confuted the declaration of God by Ezekiel, that "if the righteous man forsake his righteousness and commit iniquity, in the sin that he hath done shall he die" (Ezek. xviii.); and by this apostle declaring to the Hebrews, "The just shall live by his faith, but if he draws back, my soul (saith God) shall have no pleasure in him" (Heb. x. 37, 38). Secondly, The love to God being "keeping his commandments," this interpretation makes the sense of these words run thus: To them that keep his commandments, even all their disobedience to them "shall work together for good." Thirdly, If the words "all things" comprehend all the sins that are or can be committed by them that love God, they may as well rejoice in all their wickedness, as in all their sufferings for the sake of Christ, seeing they may rejoice in that which by God's designation tendeth to their good; and so all the motives urged ch. vi. to engage them to die to sin, and live no longer in it, must 29 For whom he did (thus) [24] foreknow, he also did [25] predestinate (or appoint) to be conformed to the image of his Son, (by having their vile bodies changed into the likeness of his glorious body, Phil. iii. 21,) that he might be the firstborn (or chief) among many brethren (who are to be coheirs and glorified together with him, ver. 17).

30 Moreover (the method he used to bring those whom he had designed to be thus conformed to the image of his Son, was this, viz.) whom he did predestinate, them he also called (first to the profession of the Christian faith): and whom he called (upon their cordial em- not only be enervated, but even esteemed motives designed to hinder them from that which is for their good, or, according to the descants of St. Austin and St. Bernard, to hinder their proficience in caution and humility.

[23] Called according to his purpose.] From these words some argue thus: If all that love God are called accordingly to his purpose, then had he no purpose of calling them that do not love him. If they who are foreknown are "predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son," they who are not conformed to it were not foreknown. Now, in answer to these arguments, let it be observed, that this text expressly speaks of those who actually love God, not of those whom God hath loved with this supposed discriminating affection; and that to "love God," and to be "called according to his purpose," are words put by way of apposition, to show that they are both of the same import; that which God purposed in calling us by Christ being this, "that we might be holy and unblameable before him in love" (Eph. i. 4. 9); so that the whole of this argument may be granted: they who are called by God according to his purpose, or are effectually called, so that God's calling hath its designed effect upon them, being only such as love God, and are conformed according to the image of his Son. And let it be farther observed, that when the apostle saith in the following verse, ὅτι οὓς προέγνω, "For whom he foreknew," &c. the particle ὅτι is connective, and this verse giving the reason or confirmation of what was spoken in the former, it seems necessary to interpret these words thus, "Whom he foreknew" to be persons called according to his purpose, and therefore qualified for the adoption mentioned ver. 23, "them he predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son" (see the note on ver. 29). And it deserves to be considered, that all antiquity to the time of St. Austin do with one consent concur in the interpretation of Pseud-Ambrosius on this place, viz. Quos præscivit sibi devotos, ipsos elegit ad promissa præmia capessenda, "Those whom he foresaw would be devoted to his service, he elected to the reward promised such persons; those whom he foreknew to be τοὺς ἀξίους τῆς κλήσεως, worthy to be called:" so Theodoret and Theophylact. Some of them in their descants upon these words, "Called according to purpose," expound them of the purpose or free-will of man, declaring that a man is called κατὰ προαίρεσιν, "according to his choice;" and that* οὐ κλήσις μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν καλουμένων σωτηρίαν εἰργάσατο, "it is not the calling only, but the purpose of those that are called, which works salvation." For who, saith Origen,† should be called to justification, but those God loves? The apostle, saith he, τὴν τοῦ ἐφ' ἡμῖν αἰτίαν περίστησι τῆς προθέσεως, καὶ τῆς προγνώσεως, "makes the will of man the cause of God's purpose and foreknowledge, by saying, We know that all things work together for good to them that love God; ὅτι ἄξιοί εἰσι συνεργέσεως, they being worthy of his co-operation." And in his Latin commentary on these words he saith, he uses the word foreknew to show that they were foreknown by God; In quibus sciens quales essent, amorem suum Deus affectumque posuisset, "On whom God placed his affection, as knowing what they would be."

Secondly, If, saith he, you will refer this purpose to God, men are then called according to the purpose of him, qui sciens in eis religiosam mentem, et salutis inesse desiderium, "who knowing they had a religious mind and a desire of salvation, called them; and in this sense neither the cause of our perdition or salvation will be placed in God's foreknowledge, nor our justification only in our calling; neque gloriari de nostrâ penitùs potestate sublatum est; nor will our glorification be wholly exempt from our own power." Moreover he adds, that by embracing this absurd opinion, which saith, man therefore is not justified, and so not glorified, because he is not predestinated, and that he is not predestinated, because not foreknown—Ingentem fenestram aperiemus eis, qui negant in hominis potestate esse ut salvus fiat; "we shall give great advantage to them who deny that it is in the power of man to be saved:" whence they infer, that they are guilty of "no fault who are not justified, because they are not called, are not predestinated, are not foreknown." And Œcumenius saith the apostle mentions being "called according to the purpose," that he might not fall into an absurdity, which would follow, εἰ ὁ Θεός τινας εὖ ἐποίησε, τινὰς δὲ οὔ, καὶ προσωπολημψίας ἀπαλλάττει τὸν Θεὸν, "if God should do good to some persons, and not to others; and that he might free him from being an accepter of persons." Wherefore, according to the received interpretation of the ancient fathers, the import of these words is this: Those whom God foresaw would be true lovers of him, fit for the kingdom of God, and ἄξιοι, "worthy" of the "peace," and blessings of the gospel, "he foreappointed to be comformable to the image of his Son," that is, to be like him in glory (ver. 17), them also he called in due time to the salvation promised and offered in the gospel (2 Tim. i. 8, 9, Tit. i. 2, 3); and they believing in Christ upon his call, he justified them from and remitted all their past sins (Acts xiii. 38, 39, Eph. i. 7); and them he also glorified, by giving them that Spirit, who is the earnest of that glory (Eph. i. 13); and by participation of which Spirit, Christians are said not only to "behold the glory of the Lord," but also to be "changed into the same image from glory to glory." So Origen on this place. And this exposition agrees well with the context; for the apostle had said before, that Christians having the "first-fruits of the Spirit, groaned" after this "redemption of the body," ver. 23. 26, that "the Spirit helpeth their infirmities," interceding for them, "with silent groanings" after it; and that he "intercedeth for the saints according to the mind of God," to give them this redemption; and then it follows, οἴδαμεν δὲ, "Therefore we know that all things shall work together for good to them that love God."

[24] Ver. 29. Ὅτι οὓς πρόεγνω, For whom he did foreknow.] This particle ὅτι is connective; and this verse giving the reason or confirmation of what was spoken in the former, it seems necessary to interpret it thus; Whom he foreknew to be persons called according to his purpose, and therefore qualified for this adoption. It therefore is to be observed, that the words know and foreknow, in the scripture language, import an affectionate knowledge, joined with approbation and affection. So Matt. vii. 23, John x. 14, 1 Cor. viii. 3, "If any man love God, οὗτος ἔγνωσται, he is known of God;" Gal. iv. 1, "But now that ye know God, or are rather known of God;" 2 Tim. ii. 19, ἔγνω Κύριος, "The Lord knoweth who are his." So is the word προέγνω used in this epistle, xi. 2, when the apostle saith, "The Lord hath not cast off his people, ὃν προέγνω, whom he foreknew" to be faithful,* as were those seven thousand persons who had not bowed the knee to Baal; "whom he thus foreknew." See note [1] on ch. xi.

[25] Προώρισε, He before appointed.] To be conformed to the image of his Son, that as they had "borne the image of the earthly" Adam, they might "also bear the image of the heavenly," 1 Cor. xv. 49. Having glorious bodies like to his, saith Theodoret; and this agrees well with the scope and subject matter of this chapter, and with the following words, "That he might be the first-born," or chief, "among many brethren;" for as here these brethren are said to be "coheirs" with him, the "elder brother" (ver. 17), so elsewhere he is styled, "the first-born from the dead, that in all things he bracing of that faith), them he also justified (and so freed from condemnation to death): and whom he justified, them he also [26] glorified.

31 What shall we then say (Gr. what say we then) to these things? (i. e. what farther ground of assurance and so of patient waiting for these things can we want?) If God be for us, who can (successfully) be against us (so as to frustrate, or deprive us of this glorious state)?

32 He that (in pursuance of this design) spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for (the redemption of) us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things (belonging to that glory and happiness he hath purchased for us)?

33 [27] Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? (i. e. to them who are called by him to Christianity, to hinder their redemption, by charging them with that guilt which rendereth them obnoxious to death.) It is God that justifieth (and who will therefore glorify them).

34 Who is he that condemneth (them to abide still under the power of death)? It is Christ that died (to redeem them from it), yea rather, that is risen again, (for their justification, Rom. iv. 24. And if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by his life, Rom. v. 10,) who is even at the right hand of God, (invested with all manner of power, that he should give eternal life unto them, John xvii. 2,) who also maketh intercession for us (and so is able to save us to the uttermost, εἰς παντελὲς, Heb. vii. 25).

35 [28] Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? (that love which he had shown in procuring this redemption for us, ver 37,) shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?

36 (Befalling us) As it is written (Ps. xliv. 22), For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep (appointed) for the slaughter.

37 Nay, (as there it is said, All this is come upon us, yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant, ver. 17, 18, so may all this happen to us, ἀλλ᾽ but) in all these things we are (already) [29] more than conquerors through (the grace and Spirit of) him that loved us.

might have the pre-eminence," or that they might be changed into his image by the participation of the same Spirit (see note on 2 Cor. iii. 18).

[26] Ver. 30. Τούτους καὶ ἐδόξασε, Them he also glorified.] At present in their head Christ Jesus (they being "blessed with all their spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ Jesus," Eph. i. 3; they being "quickened together with Christ, and raised up together, and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus," Eph. ii. 5, 6): and them he will hereafter glorify by making their "vile bodies like unto his glorious body." Or,

Τούτους καὶ ἐδόξασε, Them he hath also glorified,] By giving them that Spirit who is the earnest of their glory, ἐδόξασε διὰ τῶν χαρισμάτων, διὰ τῆς υἱοθεσίας·—διὰ τῶν χαρισμάτων τῆς υἱοθεσίας. So Chrysostom and Œcumenius. Ἐδόξασεν υἱοὺς ὀνομαζόμενος, καὶ Πνεύματος ἁγίου δωρησάμενος χάριν, Theodoret and Theophylact. Magnificavit illos ut similes fiant Filio Dei, Pseud-Ambrosius. And by reason of which Spirit given, with the preaching of the gospel, the ministration of justification is said to be ἐν δόξῃ, "in glory," as being the ministration of the Spirit, 2 Cor. iii. 8—11, and we, by participation of this Spirit of the Lord, are said, not only to "behold the glory of the Lord," but also to be "changed into the same image with him from glory to glory," ver. 18, see the note there, and John xvii. 22. So Origen on the place; De glorificatione possumus in præsenti seculo intelligere quod dicit apostolus, Nos autem omnes revelatâ facie gloriam Domini speculantes, eâdem imagine transformamur à gloriâ in gloriam, tanquam à Domini Spiritû. In favour of this interpretation let it be noted, that when the apostle speaks of our final glorification in this chapter, he still speaks of it as of a thing future, saying, "We shall be glorified with him" (ver. 17, 18. 21), whereas he here speaks of it as a thing past, saying, "Whom he hath justified, them he hath also glorified." So when a miracle was wrought in Christ's name, ἐδόξασε, "God glorified him," Acts iii. 13 (see Luke iv. 15, John viii. 45, xi. 4, xiii. 31, 32, xvi. 14, 1 Cor. xii. 26). And when God wrought signs by Moses, ἐδόξασεν αὐτὸν, "he glorified him," Ecclus. xlv. 3 (see the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians).

[27] Ver. 33, 34.] Here it is well observed by Mr. L. that these words being read by way of interrogation, as is ver. 35, carry a full and a clear sense thus: "Who shall plead against God's elect? Shall the God who justifies them do it? Who is he that condemns them? Can it be that Christ who died for them?"

[28] Ver. 35. Nothing shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus.] To answer the argument hence urged, to show that men cannot fall from grace, because if they once truly loved God, they cannot cease to do so, let it be noted:

First, That this inquiry is not, Who shall separate us from the love with which we love God and Christ? but, Who shall separate us, who truly love God, and testify that love by our obedience to his commands (John xv. 10), and our patient sufferings for his sake (ver. 36, 37), from his affection towards us?

The apostle therefore only intimates, that such persons, continuing in the love of God, shall be preserved by him from, or enabled to overcome, the temptations here mentioned, and so supported by his grace and Holy Spirit, as to be able to triumph over them. But he doth not say, that the love of no Christian shall "wax cold," Matt. xxiv. 12, that none of them shall lose his "first love," Rev. ii. 6. Were there no fear of this, why doth Christ exhort his disciples to continue in his love? John xv. 9, and his apostles exhort others to "keep themselves in the love of God," Jude 21, to "continue in the grace of God," Acts xiii. 43, to look diligently to it, that they "fall not from the grace and favour of God," Heb. xii. 15? Note,

Secondly, That the apostle doth not say that nothing shall separate true believers from the love of God, or Christ; but only saith, at ver. 38, πέπεισμαι, "I am persuaded" nothing will do it; nor have I any cause to fear, that any of these temporal sufferings or enjoyments should shake their steadfastness, in expectation of those eternal and inestimable blessings which God hath promised, and Christ hath purchased for his church; "these light afflictions being not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed" (ver. 18), and "all co-operating for the good of them that love God" (ver. 28); that as for the weakness of the flesh, which rendered these temptations so dreadful, and gave strength unto them, they lived in hopes of a glorious "redemption of the body" from them (ver. 23); and whilst they groan under them, they have the assistance of the Spirit of God to strengthen them, and help them to bear their infirmities; a powerful and loving Father to be with them, a Saviour exalted to the right hand of God to "intercede for them" (ver. 33, 34). Upon all which accounts, he might well say, "I am persuaded" that none of these things shall separate you from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus. The apostle doth not by these words intend to teach believers, that they could not be shaken by these things; for this would have contradicted the drift of his epistles, in which he doth so often express his fears lest they should be shaken with them; and so far tempted by them as to be "moved away from the hope of the gospel" (Col. i. 23), and render all his labours vain (1 Thess. iii. 3, 4); and offers so many arguments and motives to prevent the effect of those temptations; but only doth intend to say, that upon these considerations, they had so great inducements to persevere and continue in the love of God, as made him strongly persuaded that they would do so.

[29] Ver. 37. Ὑπερνικῶμεν, We are more than conquerors.] be so still,) For I am persuaded, that neither (fear of) death, nor (hope of) life, nor (evil) angels, nor principalities, nor powers (persecuting us for Christ's sake), nor (the) things (we endure at) present, nor things to come (or which we may hereafter suffer), 39 Nor height (of honour), nor depth (of ignominy), nor any other creature (or thing), shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is (vouchsafed to us) in Christ Jesus our Lord.

For we not only bear, but "glory in tribulations" (Rom. v. 3), we are "in deaths often," but still delivered from death (2 Cor. i. 10), and "as the sufferings of Christ abound towards us, so also doth our consolation" under them "abound through Christ."

CHAPTER IX.

1 (As for the unbelieving Jews, my brethren in the flesh, that what I am to speak concerning them may not seem to proceed from any disaffection to them,) I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, [1] my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, (i. e. I call Christ and the Holy Ghost to bear witness with my own conscience, that I only speak the truth when I say,)

2 That I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart (on the account of their infidelity, that obduration and spirit of slumber, and that rejection of them, which are the dismal consequences of their unbelief).

3 For (so great is my concern for them, that were it proper, and could it avail to the procuring their salvation,) [2] I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for (these) my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh:

4 (And surely, I have very great reason to be highly concerned for them) Who are Israelites; (i. e. persons descended from one whose faith and virtue were so eminent, that as a prince he prevailed with God, and so had his name changed from Jacob to Israel, as a mark of God's affection to him, Gen. xxxii. 28;) to whom pertaineth the adoption, (God having owned them as his sons and his first-born, Exod. iv. 22, 23, Hosea xi. 1,) and the glory, (the Shechinah, or glorious presence dwelling among them between the two cherubims, and from thence shining forth upon them, Ps. l. 2, lxxx. 2,) and the covenants, (made with Abraham, Gal. iii. 17, and with Moses, Exod. xxiv. 8, the two covenants, Gal. iv. 24, the old and new covenant, Jer. xxxi. 31, xxxii. 40,) and the giving of the law (that writ with his own finger in tables of stone, Deut. x. 1. 4, and many other excellent judicial laws), and the (acceptable) service of God, and the promises (not only of signal blessings in the land of Canaan, to those who should observe his laws, but the promise of a Messiah, and of a new covenant established upon better promises);

5 Whose are the fathers, (they being the offspring of those patriarchs to whom the promises were first made, Heb. xi. 9. 13. 17,) and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ (the promised Messiah) came, (he being born of one of their nation, and so according to the flesh their offspring, even he) who (according to his divine nature) is [3] over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IX.

[1] Ver. 1. Συμμαρτυρούσης μοι τῆς συνειδήσεως ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, My conscience bearing witness in (or with) the Holy Ghost.] This verse not only shows that in cases of great moment, which cannot otherwise be sufficiently confirmed, a Christian may establish his saying by an oath; but also that he may swear by Christ, and by the Holy Ghost, and call them to be witnesses of the sincerity of his own conscience in what he doth assert. So Philo, Θεὸν μάρτυρα καλῶ τοῦ συνειδότος, "I call God to witness with my conscience." Now an oath being an act of religious worship, in which God is called upon as a witness to the truth, or an avenger of the falsehood, of what we testify or promise, by swearing by our Lord Christ, and the Holy Ghost, the apostle must perform an act of religious worship to them, and by that agnize their divinity, according to those words of Moses, "Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name," Deut. vi. 13. And by calling upon them to bear witness to the secrets of his heart and conscience, he must ascribe to them the knowledge of the secrets of the hearts of men, which is the property of God alone (1 Sam. xvi. 7, 1 Kings i. 39, 1 Chron. xxviii. 9, Ps. vii. 9, Jer. xi. 20, xvii. 10, xx. 12).

[2] Ver. 3. Ηὐχόμην γὰρ ἀνάθεμα εἶναι, For I could wish myself accursed.] The word anathema being still used in St. Paul's epistles in the severest sense, 1 Cor. xvi. 22, Gal. i. 8, 9, and the words ἀνάθεμα εἶναι ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "to be anathema from Christ," importing, in their literal sense, a separation from Christ himself, and not only from the external communion of his church, and being in the descants of the Greek* fathers the same as χωρισθῆναι τῆς ἀγάπης, ἐκπεσεῖν τῆς δόξης, ἀλλότριον εἶναι τοῦ Χριστοῦ, à salute separari, "to be separated from the love of Christ, to be alienated from him, to fall from the glory" and the salvation purchased by him; I think it reasonable to interpret the apostle's words in this sense. Nor is it a sufficient objection against this interpretation, that this can be no truly Christian wish, for the apostle doth not say, I wish; but as the ancients do well interpret him, εἰ ἐνεχώρει, εἰ ἐνεδέχετο, "If it were proper to make such a wish;" if it would avail to make so great a multitude happy, ηὐχόμην, optarim equidem, "I could even wish" so great a blessing to my brethren, though with the loss of my own happiness.

[3] Ver. 5. Ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων Θεὸς εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, Who is God over all blessed for ever.] This place galls the Arians: the note of Le Clerc upon it is this, that Dr. Hammond "should rather have examined the animadversions of Grotius upon it, than copied out of the Jewish fables, which make little to the purpose; Erasmus having written enough to overthrow all that can be inferred from them: for if what Grotius and Erasmus have observed stand good, Dr. Hammond's reasoning cannot be thought of any force." Now here I might refer him to the solid confutation of what Erasmus had said by Josue Placæus, par. iii. disp. 25, or to himself, Art. Critic. par. iii. p. 102. 106. But to give him all possible satisfaction in this matter,

First, I assert that the reading we follow is certainly the true reading,

1. Because it is the reading with which all the versions agree, the Latin, the Arabic, the Ethiopic, and the Syriac; for it is a mistake in Grotius, when he insinuates the contrary of the Syriac version, which in Tremellius runs thus; Quis est Deus, qui est super omnia.

2. Because it hath the general consent, omnium fermè patrum, of almost all the fathers, who have thus cited it from the second to the sixth century; viz. the testimony of Irenæus, lib. iii. 18, of Origen in locum, of Tertullian, contra Praxeam, cap. 13. 15, Novatian, de Trin. cap. 13. 20, Cyprian, lib. ii. de Testim. contra Jud. sect. 6, Quòd Deus Christus, ubi editio Oxoniensis hæc habet; Interea agnoscere oportebit, vocem "Deus," in Spirensi veteri innominatâ Remboldi, et Erasmi editionibus abesse, sed in sequentibus habetur, atque etiam in omnibus editionibus

* Origen. Chrysost Theod. Œcum. Phot. Theophylact.

6 (But we must) Not (exaggerate this blindness and rejection of the Jews, whose were the covenants and the promises, in prejudice of the veracity of God,) as though the word of God hath taken none effect (i. e. the promises of God concerning the seed of Israel, and the blessings to be conferred upon them, ἐκπέπτωκεν, had failed; this doth by no means follow). For they [4] are not all Israel, which are of Israel (i. e. all that are descended from the loins of Israel by carnal generation, are not the children of the promise made to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 14, which yet are only to be accounted for the seed, ver. 8):

7 Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham (according to the flesh), are they all children (of the promise made to Abraham): but (only they who are the seed of Isaac, for thus the promise runs), In Isaac shall thy seed be called.

8 That is, They which are the children of the flesh (of Abraham, and have the sign of the covenant in their flesh), these are not (on that account alone) the child-

Sed non ignorat Paulus Christum Deum, dicens, Quorum patres, et ex quibus Christus, qui est super omnia Deus,—non hic creatura in Deum deputatur, sed creaturarum Deus est qui super omnia Deus est. Verba hæc etiam Chrysostomi textù occurrunt, qui insuper verba sequentia ὃς ἐστιν εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, ab apostolo dicta pronunciat, pro omnibus gratiarum actionem unigenito Dei referente; agnoscente autem Erasmo non potest hæc particula ad Christum pertinere, nisi ad eundem et illa referantur, Qui est super omnia Deus. Secondly, I assert, that the words will not admit of that interpunction and interpretation of Erasmus, which will do any service to the Arians or Socinians, viz. that a colon must be put after the words κατὰ σάρκα, "after the flesh;" and the words following must be an ecphonema, and grateful exclamation for the blessings conferred upon the Jews, thus, "God who is over all be blessed for ever." For this exposition is to harsh, and without any like example in the whole New Testament, that as none of the orthodox ever thought upon it, so I find not that it ever came into the head of any Arian: Socinus himself rejects it for this very good reason, that Θεὸς εὐλογητὸς "God be blessed," is an unusual and unnatural construction; for wherever else these words signify "blessed be God," εὐλογητὸς, is put before God, as Luke i. 68, 2 Cor. i. 3, Eph. i. 3, 1 Pet. i. 3, and Θεὸς hath an article prefixed to it, nor are they ever immediately joined together otherwise. The phrase occurs twenty times in the Old Testament, but in every place εὐλογητὸς goes before, and the article is annexed to the word God, which is a demonstration that this is a perversion of the sense of the apostle's words. (2.) The apostle having said in the immediate preceding words, that Christ came from the fathers κατὰ σάρκα, "according to the flesh," or as to his human nature, is it not reasonable to conceive he would proceed to say what he was according to his divine nature, especially when he was discoursing of and to those Jews, who, as Trypho saith,* and Origen† and Jerome‡ testify, held their Messiah was only to be a man, and denied his divinity? Is it not unreasonable to think he should then say nothing of the τὸ κατὰ πνεῦμα, or the superior nature of Christ? Especially if we consider that the limitation τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, "according to the flesh," plainly insinuated there was another nature in him, according to which he came not from the fathers. In a word, all the ancient versions render the words as we do, taking no notice of this interpunction. All the Greek scholiasts, and the ancient commentators among the Latins, excepting Chrysostom, here triumph over Arius, one of them indeed hinting, "that there might be men, who would be inclined to say these things were not spoken of Christ,"* but none ever saying that any did then actually ascribe them to any other person. Hence from the beginning, these words have been used by the fathers as an argument of Christ's divinity. For, saith Irenæus,† "because he is Emanuel, lest we should think him a man only, the apostle saith, Of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came;" qui est Deus super omnes benedictus in secula. And in a like expression to this of the apostle, he saith, Secundùm id quòd verbum Dei homo erat ex radice Jessæ, filius Abrahami; "According to that nature in which the Word of God was man, of the root of Jesse, and the son of Abraham, the Spirit of God rested upon him;"‡ secundùm autem quòd Deus erat, "but as to that nature by which he was God, he judged not after the sight of his eyes, for he knew what was in man." And if these words are spoken by the Spirit of God concerning Christ, the arguments hence to prove him truly and properly God are invincible: for, first, ὁ Θεὸς ἐπὶ πάντων, "God over all," is the periphrasis by which all the heathen philosophers did usually represent the supreme God: and so is God the Father described both in the Old and the New Testament, as ὁ ἐπὶ πάντων, he that "is over all," Eph. iv. 6. Secondly, This is the constant epithet and periphrasis of the great God in the Old Testament, that he is εὐλογητὸς εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, "God blessed for evermore," 1 Chron. xvi. 36, Ps. xli. 13, lxxxix. 52, and also in the New, where he is styled the God ὃς ἐστιν εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, "who is blessed for ever." This was so evident to Enjedinus the Socinian, that he saith, this epithet is so peculiar to God the Father, "that it is never attributed in the New Testament to any other, but wheresoever we find this phrase, 'God blessed for ever,' it is always ascribed to the Father." Of the custom of adding to the name of God "blessed for evermore," used by the Jews, the reverend doctor hath said sufficient; and why all that he here saith should pass with Mr. Clerc for Jewish fables, what reason can be given, if not his averseness to the doctrine the doctor here endeavours to establish? especially when we find this very phrase, εὐλογητὸς Κύριος, ὁ Θεὸς ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος, καὶ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, or εὐλογητὸς Κύριος εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, "Blessed be the Lord God from everlasting," Ps. xl. 13, lxxxviii. 51, cv. 48, and find Paul following his example, and Clemens Romanus in his epistle so often using the same epithet when he makes mention of the God of heaven: Edit. Jun. p. 29. 42. 50. 57. 59. 66, ver. 6.

[4] Ver. 6. Are not all Israel.] The apostle having declared, that both Jew and gentiles had sinned, and "fallen short of the glory of God," and so were to be justified only by faith in Christ, Rom. iii. 23, 24, the Jews objected against this, (1.) that they being the seed of Abraham, to whom the promises were made, it was not consistent with the divine veracity to exclude them from the blessings promised, and to confer them on the believing gentiles. To the first part of this objection the apostle answers, by distinguishing be-ren of God (of whom it is said, I will be a God unto thee, and thy seed after thee, Gen. xvii. 7): but (they only who are) the children of the promise (as Isaac was) are (to be) [5] counted for the seed.

9 For this is the word of promise, (Gen. xviii. 10,) At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son (which words confine the children of the promise to the seed of Sarah, excluding that of Hagar from it).

10 And not only this (instance is proper to demonstrate the distinction of the seed of Abraham according to the promise); but (that) when (of) Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac (two children born of the same father, and of the same mother, and lying in the same womb);

11 (For the [6] children (of her womb) being not yet born, neither having done any good nor evil, (which

twixt "the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh," and "according to promise," or the spiritual seed, from ver. 6 to the 14th, at those words, "What shall we say then? is there injustice in God?" He begins to answer the second part of the objection, that the adoption, and the promises belonging to the Jews, ver. 4, and the gentiles being strangers from the covenant of promise, it seemed unreasonable to confer those blessings on them, and not upon the Jews. To this the apostle answers, that this justly befell them, because they continued in their infidelity, after all the miracles wrought to convince them that Christ was the true Messiah; and so as by their obstinacy, like to that of Pharaoh, they had made themselves obnoxious to the severest of his judgments; so had they rendered themselves incapable of the blessings promised to Abraham and his seed, "they who are of faith," being only "the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise," Gal. iii. 7. 9. 29, whereas the gentiles believing in Christ, are through this faith entitled to the blessings promised to Abraham and his seed, ver. 14, for they being Christ's by faith, "are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise," ver. 29.

[5] Ver. 8. Λογίζεται εἰς σπέρμα, Are accounted for the seed.] That is, of this distinction of seeds, to which the promise belongs, you have a manifest instance in the seed of Abraham: for before Abraham had any seed at all the promise of inheriting the land of Canaan was made unto him thus, "Unto thy seed will I give this land," Gen. xii. 7; "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed after thee for ever," Gen. xiii. 13; "Unto thy seed have I given this land," Gen. xv. 18. But though Ishmael was his first-born, and had that circumcision which was the seal of the covenant made with Abraham; yet he, and his posterity, those twelve princes and great nations which issued from him, were all excluded from the covenant; and Isaac, not yet circumcised, or born, and his posterity, are declared to be the seed of Abraham, to whom the promise should be made good, and with whom the covenant should be established. For when Abraham said to God, "O that Ishmael might live before thee!" God returns him this answer: "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee; behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation; but my covenant will I establish with Isaac, whom Sarah shall bear unto thee," Gen. xvii. 18. 20, 21. Again, when Sarah had said of Ishmael, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son; for the son of this bondwoman shall not inherit with my son, even with Isaac," Gen. xxi. 10, and Abraham thereupon was grieved because of his son, ver. 11, God speaks thus to him, "Let it not be grievous in thine eyes, because of the lad; in all that Sarah hath said, hearken to her, for in Isaac shall thy seed be called," ver. 12. Which instance shows, it was not being of the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, or having the sign of the covenant in the flesh, that rendered men the sons of God, or children of the promise then: for Ishmael was Abraham's first-born, and circumcised, and yet by God excluded from the promise; Isaac not circumcised, not yet born, not having the right of primogeniture, and yet to him, and his seed alone, belong the adoption and the promises. Two things may here be added for illustration of this instance.

First, That the Jews can make no just exceptions against this argument of the apostle, it being suitable to their own theology; for it is a rule among them, that* "whoso vows concerning Abraham's seed, is free from Ishmael and Esau's sons, and is not bound but touching Israelites, for in Isaac shall seed be called to thee;" and so Isaac said of Jacob, "And God give thee the blessing of Abraham."

Secondly, That there is a great emphasis in these words,

* Maimon. of Vows, ch. 9, sect. 21.

"The children of the promise;" for upon this account it was said of Isaac, that he was "not born according to the flesh, but according to the promise," Gal. iv. 23. Thus Ishmael was Abraham's son "according to the flesh," but Isaac "according to the Spirit;" to be therefore children of the promise, seems to be Abraham's spiritual seed; whence the apostle saith of those who believe in this seed, that they are "the sons of God by faith in Christ Jesus," and so are Abraham's seed, "and heirs according to the promise," Gal. iii. 29. That they according to Isaac, are "children of the promise," Gal. iv. 28. That they are children "not of the bondwoman, but of the free," ver. 31. Accordingly the Jews say,* "A proselyte is the son of Abraham, who is the father of the whole world, as it is said, A father of many nations have I made thee." And because the Jews might quarrel against the pertinence of this instance, alleging this might be because Ishmael was only the son of Abraham's bondmaid, whereas Isaac was the seed of his own wife; or that Ishmael had forfeited his right by idolatry, or denying the world to come, of which they accuse him: here follows the instance of choosing Jacob and his seed, excluding Esau and his seed, against which no such cavil could take place.

[6] Ver. 11. Μήπω γὰρ γεννηθέντων, For the children being not yet born.] The argument of the apostle is to this effect, that though both Jacob and Esau had the same father and the same mother, yet of these two, when they were yet unborn, and so were neither circumcised, nor had done any thing at all to oblige or disoblige God, or to give any ground for any difference to be made betwixt them, and their offspring, God speaks thus of them to Rebecca, "Two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels, and the one people shall be stronger than the other people, and the elder shall serve the younger" (Gen. xxv. 23); i. e. not he to whom by birthright it belonged, but he whom God was freely pleased to choose, should inherit the land of Canaan, promised to the seed of Abraham, and the other privileges of his seed. Which instance seems plainly to inform us, that the choice which God makes of men to the enjoyment of the favour of being his people, and beloved by him above others, as to such things, is not according to their external privileges or works, but according to his free choice. And this prediction was fully verified in after ages; for Jacob and his posterity were planted in the land of Canaan, which "flowed with milk and honey," and was "the glory of all lands," whereas the Edomites were planted in a barren desert land; and this gave ground for those words of the prophet Malachi, "I have loved you, saith the Lord to Israel, yet ye say, Wherein hast thou loved us? Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord: yet I loved Jacob, and hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness." Now for farther explication of these words, let it be observed,

First, That this instance of Esau's being rejected, and not owned by God as belonging to the promised seed, is suitable to the sentiments of the Jews, not only because he, being an idolater, and a denier of the resurrection, and of the blessings of the world to come, was not, according to their forementioned canon, to be accounted for seed; and their received rule,† "That he who swears concerning the seed of Abraham, is free from Ishmael, and Esau's son," and is not bound but touching Israelites; but also from their observation on these words of Jacob,‡ "The God of my father Abraham, of my father Isaac;" viz. that "he saith not so of Esau, that Abraham and Isaac were his fathers, because he chose not to walk in their ways, and do their works."

might move God to dislike the one more than the other, as may be alleged in the case of Ishmael,) that[7] the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of (Gr. from) works, but of him that calleth;) (i. e. that the purpose of God in preferring one of these seeds and nations before the other, to be the promised seed, and so his church and people, might appear to be, not on consideration of their works, but his free choice;)

12 It was (then) said unto her, The elder (in his posterity) shall serve the younger (i. e. shall be inferior to him, who had the right of primogeniture according to the flesh.

13 According to which preference it happened to their posterity,) As it is written (Mal. i. 2, 3), Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.

14 What shall we say then (after these instances)? Is there (any cause to say there is) unrighteousness with God? (in taking then, for the seed of Abraham, or for his sons and people, the posterity of Isaac, rather than of Ishmael; the posterity of Jacob, rather than the Edomites? or in calling now the gentiles, and upon their faith owning them for his people, the spiritual seed of Abraham; and rejecting the Jews from these advantages and privileges, because of their unbelief?) God forbid (that we should accuse God of unrighteous dealing upon this account).

15 For (to begin with the freedom which God reserveth to himself, in showing acts of grace and favour to an offending people, in this he only doth what) he saith to Moses (he would do, making this declaration

Secondly, Hence it is evident that the apostle speaks not here of the persons, but of the nations and posterity of Jacob and Esau, or not of them personally, but nationally considered, according to the note of Irenæus, Partum Rebeccæ prophetiam fuisse duorum populorum (lib. iv. cap. 38). This is plain,

(1.) From the words of God to Rebecca, "Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels, and the one people shall be stronger than the other." (2.) From this observation, That as to the persons of Esau and Jacob, it was never true that the elder did serve the younger, but only as to their posterity, when the Edomites became tributaries to David (2 Sam. viii. 14). And, (3.) because what is here offered as a proof or confirmation of this, is cited from the prophet Malachi, who prophesied long after Jacob and Esau were personally dead, and so could only speak of their posterity the Israelites and Edomites, as he expressly doth. And,

Thirdly, Hence it clearly follows, that the apostle cannot here discourse of any personal election of them to eternal life, or any absolute love or hatred of them, with respect to their eternal interest; for if so, seeing he manifestly speaks of the whole nation of Israel, they must, according to that opinion, be all elected to salvation; whereas the apostle informs us that "God had no pleasure in many of them," 1 Cor. x. 5, and the whole Jewish history shows the contrary. Again, then must the whole posterity of Esau be the object of God's hatred and his reprobation, which is so far from being true, that Job and all his friends appear to have been of the posterity of Esau. And (2.) then it must follow, as Esthius contends, that not only election, but even reprobation also, must be without any respect to works, and so God must adjudge men to eternal perdition, without respect to any evil done, or to be done by them; for "the children having done neither good nor evil," saith the apostle, it happened to them as it is written, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated." It is certain then, that the apostle speaks here only of the election of one seed and nation before another, to be accounted and treated by him as the seed of Abraham; this only doth his argument require, and his instances prove, and this is sufficient to justify God's dealing with the unbelieving Jews, so as to reject them from being accounted for, and treated as, the seed of Abraham; and his raising up children to Abraham out of those believing gentiles, who, imitating the faith of Abraham, became the spiritual seed and "heirs according to the promise," that he would be a God to his seed, and that he should be "the father of many nations," and "in him should all the families of the earth be blessed," and his calling them to the faith, though sinners of the gentiles; that depending not on works, but his free pleasure.

Note also, that those words, "The children being not yet born, nor having done good nor evil," being used as an argument to prove the election or preference of the one above the other could not be of works, is a strong argument against the pre-existence of souls, and their being sent into bodies by way of punishment for their former sins: for upon that supposition it could not be true, that "the children had done neither good nor evil," before they were born; nor could the argument be firm, that one could not be preferred before the other on the account of any works done by them, seeing the one might have sinned more than the other in their state of pre-existence.

[7] Ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν πρόθεσις Θεοῦ, The purpose of God according to election.] Here I shall briefly consider the import of the words πρόθεσις, the purpose; πρόγνωσις, the foreknowledge; προώρισμος, the foreappointment of God; of all which, let it be noted,

First, That none of them relate to particular and individual persons (save only when they are used of our blessed Lord, and his sufferings for us), but only to whole churches and nations; and, in general, to the whole body of believing Jews and gentiles, whom God had chosen, προωρίσας, "foreappointing them to the adoption, by Jesus Christ," Eph. i. 5, "in whom also," saith he, ἐκληρώθημεν, "we are made his portion, or peculiar people, προωρισθέντες κατὰ πρόθεσιν, being foreappointed so to be according to his purpose," ver. 11, God having purposed and foreappointed that this should be the portion of believers, and the consequence of faith in Christ, by which we become the sons of God. To all the converted Jews throughout their dispersions, they being chosen κατὰ πρόθεσιν, "according to the purpose of God the Father" (1 Pet. i. 2): and, lastly, to the posterity of Jacob, of whom, that ἡ κατὰ Θεὸν πρόθεσις, "the purpose of God, according to the election, might stand," it was said, when Rebecca bore twins, "The elder shall serve the younger."

Secondly, That this foreknowledge, purpose, or appointment, is only that of calling men to the knowledge of salvation by Christ Jesus. Thus the apostle teacheth, that he was appointed to "preach to the gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, according to the ancient purpose which God hath made in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 11); and that "according to his purpose before ages, he called us with a holy calling" (2 Tim. i. 9).

Thirdly, This calling is designed by God ἐπὶ τοῦτο, "for this end," that they who are called might "obtain salvation through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth" (2 Thess. ii. 13); "through sanctification of the Spirit of obedience, and through the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus" (1 Pet. i. 2): all Christians being chosen to this end, "that they might be holy, and unblameable before God in love" (Eph. i. 4). But hence it cannot reasonably be concluded, that this election is no larger than the holiness designed to be produced by it; for "the riches of God's goodness, patience, and long-suffering" are designed to "lead" all those to whom it is vouchsafed "to repentance." But hence it cannot be concluded that this riches, goodness, patience, and long-suffering, is exercised to none but those who truly do repent, seeing the apostle mentions many who despised these means, and after the vouchsafement of them still continued to "treasure up wrath against the day of wrath" (Rom. ii. 4). The Baptist was sent "to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and of the disobedient unto the wisdom of the just," but his preaching was far from having its effects on all that heard him. The end of the Messiah's advent to the Jews was, that he might "save his people from their sins," and might engage them to "serve him in holiness and righteousness all the days of their life" (Luke i. 75): but yet it sadly failed of this effect upon the stubborn people; "the saving grace of God appeared to all men, to teach them, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world;" but yet it is too sadly evident, it hath not had this good effect on all.

Fourthly, As men were appointed from the beginning to to him, Exod. xxxiii. 19),[8] I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion.

16 So then (these instances show, that) [9] it is not of him that willeth, (for Abraham willed that Ishmael might live to be partaker of the blessings promised to his seed, when he said, O that Ishmael might live before thee! Gen. xvii. 18, and when he was grieved at the saying of Sarah, The son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with my son Isaac, Gen. xxi. 11,) nor of him that runneth, (for when Esau ran to fetch venison for his father, that he might receive the blessing, Gen. xxvii. 5, God's wisdom saw it fit to have it otherwise,) but of God that sheweth mercy (that any one is chosen to be the seed to which the promise made to Abraham belongs, and so to be his church and people.

To proceed now to the other part of the objection, the seeming injustice or severity of rejecting and reserving them to wrath, and of giving them up to an obdurate heart, who will not accept of the way God hath appointed for their justification, viz. that of faith in Christ, but rather will continue in their infidelity: this will be cleared by another instance, that of Pharaoh, who had so often hardened his heart, refusing to let Israel go).

17 For the scripture saith (upon that account) unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose [10] have I raised thee up (i. e. have made thee stand in the plague of boils, and prolonged thy life for some farther time), that I might (the more illustriously) shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth (by that conspicuous judgment I will execute upon be called, so the gospel, which is "the wisdom of God through faith unto salvation," was that ἣν προώρισεν, "which God had foreappointed" to be preached to men for that end, 1 Cor. ii. 7, this word of God giving the hope of that salvation, which he had "promised before all ages." And hence, by virtue of this promise and foreappointment, men were in time called by the gospel to the faith in Christ, whence they who were thus called are said to be called "according to the purpose of God" (Rom. viii. 28), and "according to his purpose and grace given us through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. i. 10): the knowledge and purpose, from the foundation of the world, of sending Christ to die for the remission of sins, being the ground of this calling, on which account he is said to be "given up to the death according to the foreknowledge of God, and his foreappointed counsel" (Acts ii. 23); and they who slew him are said to have done only what his counsel had foreappointed to be done (Acts iv. 28). These observations will direct us to answer what is argued from these and such like places of scripture in favour of an absolute election.

[8] Ver. 15. Ἐλεήσω ὃν ἂν ἐλεῶ, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy.] It is here to be noted, that God made this declaration after Israel had committed idolatry, in making the golden calf, and so had made themselves naked, i. e. divested of the divine presence and protection, or of a covenant relation to him, insomuch that God sent this dreadful message to them, "I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee" (Exod. xxxiii. 5), and said to Moses, "Let me alone, that I may destroy them in a moment." And though God suffered himself to be prevailed upon by Moses to adopt them again for his people; yet he lets him know this was part of his glory, "to be gracious to whom he will be gracious, and also to show mercy to whom he will show mercy" (Exod. xxxiii. 19). If therefore, upon the infidelity of the Jews, he will call the idolatrous gentiles, and receive them to be his people, as he did the Jews again after their idolatry, who can accuse him of injustice upon that account? (see the note on ver. 18.)

[9] Ver. 16. Οὐ τοῦ θέλοντος, οὐδὲ τοῦ τρέχοντος, It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth.] i. e. You see this is not to be obtained by the most passionate wishes of a faithful Abraham, nor by the fervent desires of an Esau (Heb. xii. 17), nor by the greatest zeal we can employ in such courses as seem best to our own wisdom; but we must own it to be a blessing which depends merely upon the divine goodness; and therefore must seek it according to his pleasure, in such ways as he appoints, and not in those which seem to us most proper to obtain it: though then you have a zeal for God, and follow after the law, that you may obtain righteousness, it is not to be wondered you obtain not the blessing of justification promised to the seed of Abraham, because you seek it not by faith in the Messiah, which is the only way in which God hath declared he will confer it.

Some of the fathers* interpret these words thus; "It is not of him that wills, or runs only, but of God that showeth mercy, and crowns the work by his assistance; for otherwise," say they, "it cannot be our duty, either to will or run, provided we can, neither by willing nor running, do any thing to incline God to show mercy; and why then doth God blame us for not willing?" (Matt. xxiii. 17, John v. 40,) and require us "so to run that we may obtain?" (1 Cor. ix. 24, Heb. xii. 1.) And whereas Austin objects, That according to this interpretation it might be said, It is not of God that showeth mercy only, but of man that wills and runs; Origen,* Chrysostom,† and Theophylact,‡ answer, That this follows not, because man's willing and running would not avail without the divine aid, to enable him to run, and his grace and mercy to accept his running; and therefore according to the custom of the scripture, the effect is to be ascribed to the chief agent only; as, "Except the Lord build the house, their labour is but vain that build it," &c., Ps. cxxvii. 1; so, "Paul that plants, and Apollos that waters, is nothing, but God that giveth the increase," 1 Cor. iii. 6, 7, "I laboured, yet not I, but the grace of God," 1 Cor. xv. 10.

[10] Ver. 17. Ἐξήγειρά σε, I have raised thee up.] Heb. העמדתיך, "I have made thee to stand," Exod. ix. 16, or, have preserved thee; ἕνεκεν τούτου διετηρήθης, "For this cause hast thou been kept," so the LXX.; i. e. from falling by the plague of boils, so Junius and Tremellius; Feci ut superstes maneres, "I have kept thee alive," saith the Targum of B. Uziel. See the Chaldee, the Syriac, and the Arabic versions to the same sense; and the connexion of this with the former verse rightly rendered makes this sense necessary; for the fifteenth verse cannot be rendered in the future tense, as our translation doth, "Now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with the pestilence, and thou shalt be cut off from the earth;" for Pharaoh and his people did not die by the pestilence. It is therefore to be rendered, as the Jews, Fagius, Amama, Cartwright, and Ainsworth, translate it; "For now I had sent out my hand, and I had smitten thee and thy people with the pestilence, and thou hadst been cut off from the earth; but in very deed, for this cause I have made thee stand up."§ So the Targum of B. Uziel, Quum jam miserim plagam fortitudinis meæ, æquum erit ut percuterem te et populum tuum morte, ut perderem te à terrâ; verùm profectò non ut benefaciam tibi in vitâ conservavi te, sed ut videre faciam te robur meum, &c. Whence we may learn how alien from the truth, and from the import of the words, is that exposition which saith, "For this cause have I created thee," or "raised thee to be the king of Egypt."

Observe farther, that God hardened Pharaoh's heart, not by any positive influx upon it, which made it necessary for him to continue obstinate. This Origen observes from those words, "If thou refuse to let my people go, I will do so and so;" that Pharaoh's heart was not so hardened as to take away τὸ αὐτεξούσιον, "all power from him" to let the people go, for this he doth at last when God's hand was strong upon him, according to these words, iii. 19, "I am sure that the king of Egypt will not let you go;" ולא ביד חזקה nisi per manum fortem, Vulg. ἐὰν μὴ μετὰ χειρὸς κραταιᾶς, "if not by a strong hand," Septuagint; nisi cum manû validâ, Samarit., thee, in the sight of all nations of the earth, Josh. ii. 10, 1 Sam. iv. 8).

18 Therefore (from these instances and scriptures we may learn that) hath [11] he (God) mercy on whom he will have mercy, and (that) whom he will he hardeneth (or reserves for punishment).

19 Thou wilt say then unto me (against this account of the divine dispensations towards the unbelieving Jews, If God hardeneth us because he will), Why doth he yet find fault (with us for our impenitence)? For who hath (at any time) resisted his will? (How therefore is it in our power to avoid being hardened, if it be his will we should be so?)

20 Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest

"but by a strong hand," so the Bishop of Bath and Wells. This sense the words will bear, saith Ainsworth, ו being rendered si, Exod. iv. 23, Numb. xii. 14. And this sense is plain and certain from the words following; "And I will stretch out my hand, and smite Egypt with all my wonders, which I will do in the midst thereof, and after that he will let you go," Exod. iii. 20. And again, vi. 1, Then said the Lord to Moses, "Now shalt thou see what I will do to Pharaoh, for with a strong hand shall he let them go." Hence God is always said to have brought them out of Egypt ביד חזקה "with a strong hand," Exod. xxxii. 11, Deut. v. 15, vi. 21, vii. 8, ix. 26, Dan. ix. 15. Nor can they who think otherwise, show any way how or in what sense Pharaoh can be so often said to have "hardened his own heart," if God himself had hardened his heart before; or why God doth so often command him to let his people go (vii. 16, viii. 1. 20, ix. 1. 13), i. e. to do what he had rendered him unable to do; or why Moses should say, "Let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more, in not letting the people go" (viii. 29); or why God did reprove him, because he had hitherto refused to let the people go (vii. 16, viii. 29, ix. 17, x. 3); or why he threatens judgments to him, if he refuse to let them go (viii. 2. 21, ix. 2, 3. 14, 15), and executes them on him upon that refusal, since nemo tenetur ad impossibilia, "no man is obliged to do what he cannot;" much less what he cannot do by virtue of a disability that God hath laid upon him; and no man justly can be blamed, and much less punished, for not doing what he is not obliged to do. Nor can God command any man to do what he himself by his own influx restrains him from doing, even when he doth command it; for what he thus restrains him from, he is not willing he should do; whereas what he commands he is willing should be done; and when he punisheth any one for not obeying his command, he punisheth them for not doing his will. Now it is impossible that God at the same time, and in reference to the same action, should be both willing and not willing it should be done. This will be farther evident from a consideration of all the places where the heart of Pharaoh is said to be hardened. As,

Ch. vii. 13, "And he hardened Pharaoh's heart;" Heb. ויחזק "And the heart of Pharaoh was hardened." So the same words are rendered by us, ver. 22, and so hereby Ainsworth, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Bishop of Ely, and all the versions on this verse; nor is there any person mentioned in the verse, besides Pharaoh, to whom this action can be ascribed; his heart was therefore hardened at this time, not by God, but by the arts of his sorcerers, for "the magicians did so with their enchantments, and Pharaoh's heart was hardened" (ver. 22).

Ch. viii. 15, we read thus, "When Pharaoh saw there was respite, he hardened his heart;" when the fathers truly observe that Θεοῦ μακροθυμία σκληροκαρδίας αἰτία, i. e. the heart of Pharaoh was hardened by God's mercy, in taking off his hand from him: thus upon removal of the flies, "Pharaoh hardened his heart" (ver. 31, 32); "and when he saw that the rain, and the hail, and the thunders, were ceased, he sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, he and his servants:" and then immediately follow these words; "And the Lord said to Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh, for (or, although) I have hardened his heart, and the heart of his servants," x. 1; so ver. 20, the Lord then "hardened Pharaoh's heart" only by taking away the locusts; and, ver. 27, "the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart" only by taking away the darkness, the three days assigned to it being ended, as Aben Ezra observes on ver. 24, "None rose from his place during those three days," but post triduum, they being ended, Pharaoh called unto Moses; and hence we read, not as at other times, that Pharaoh asked for the removal of this plague; and therefore when it is said, ix. 12, that "the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkened not unto them," i. e. not to Moses and Aaron; we have reason to conclude he did that also by removing the plague of the boils; for had the boils continued upon the Egyptians, there was no reason for calling for the succeeding plague of hail, nor could the servants of Pharaoh, with their boils upon them, have gone into the field to house their cattle, ver. 20. We read also, xiv. 8. 17, that "the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart" to follow the Israelites; and of this we may give the same account, that he did this by causing the Israelites to encamp so as to give occasion to Pharaoh to say, "They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in" (ver. 3), and by causing him to see the Israelites walking safely through the midst of the sea. But I am not concerned for these places, the hardening of Pharaoh then being not for sin (God having not commanded Pharaoh not to pursue after them, or follow them into the Red sea), but for punishment: when therefore God saith, iv. 21, "I will harden the heart of Pharaoh, that he shall not let the people go;" his meaning may be only this, I will so order matters by removing the plagues inflicted on him and his people, to mollify him, and engage him to permit them to go, that he shall be hardened, till I come with my strong hand and slay his son, even his first-born (ver. 23), after which he did let them go (xii. 31. 33). From these two observations it is easy to discern how apposite this example is to the case of the Jewish nation. For,

First, Did God harden Pharaoh by his lenity, in removing his plagues and judgments from him? the same God saith of the Jews in this epistle, when he speaks thus unto them, ii. 4, 5, "Despisest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance; but after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of God's righteous judgment?"

Secondly, If they object, that if God would have cast them off from being his people, and have cut them off from any share in the promises made to the seed of Abraham, why did he not this before, when they had so oft deserved it for their idolatries, from which they were now free? the answer is, from the example of Pharaoh preserved alive when he had long deserved to be cut off, that he might fall at last, more to the illustration of God's power, justice, and glory; and this is the thing hinted ver. 22, as you will see in the exposition of it.

[11] Ver. 18. Ὃν θέλει ἐλεεῖ, ὃν δὲ θέλει σκληρύνει, He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.] That is, hence it appears that God shows mercy according to his own wise pleasure, and not as we think fit; and he gives men up to the hardness of their own hearts, and so reserveth them to be examples of his illustrious judgments, according to the same good pleasure, and not according to the time and measures that they would prescribe; showing mercy to you Jews, when you deserved to be cut off for your idolatry, in making and worshipping the golden calf, and reassuming you to be his people, and reserving the execution of his wrath upon Pharaoh, who had before deserved it for the hardness of his heart, till his destruction would minister to the greater illustration of his power and justice upon stubborn sinners.

Execrable is the note of Esthius here, that God is here said to harden whom he will, quòd induratio cujuspiam in primâ suâ origine, quæ est prima derelictio, seu peccati permissio, non aliam habet causam quàm Dei voluntatem; "because the first rise of any man's induration, which is God's dereliction of him, hath no other cause than the will of God:" for as this is contrary to the known saying even of Austin, Deus non deserit nisi deserentem, "God deserts no man, who leaves not him first;" so it makes God alone the cause of all men's hardening, since causa causæ est causa causati: for if this dereliction be the cause of induration, and that hath no other cause but the will of God, the will of God must be the cause of all men's hardening it. It also makes all God's exhortations to men not to harden their hearts, and his reproofs and punishments of them for so doing, exhorta-

(thus) against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?

21 Hath not the [12] potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?

22 What (therefore) if God, (being) [13] willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power (more illustriously) known, endured with much longsuffering (you refractory Jews, which were so long ago) the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction, (or for breaking, Ps. xxxi. 13, what reason have you to complain against him on this account?)

23 And (what if God) that he might make known the riches of his glory (showed mercy) on the vessels of mercy, [14] which he had afore (by working faith in them) prepared unto glory (or to be a glorious church), 24 Even us, whom he hath called, (us, I say,) not of the Jews only (the natural seed of Abraham), but also of the Gentiles? (What is there in this that should offend you?

25 For, first, as for the called gentiles, is not this the very thing foretold by their own prophet Hosea, when he introduceth God thus speaking,) As he saith also in Osee, I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which (then) was not beloved.

26 And it shall come to pass, that in the place (and nation) where (formerly) it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; [15] there shall they be called (i. e. there shall arise a people which shall be called) the children of the living God.

27 (And whereas but a small remnant of Israel have believed, and so but a few of them are fitted to be vessels of his mercy; is not this also the very thing foretold by their own prophet) Esaias also (when he) crieth concerning Israel (x. 22, 23), Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, (yet) a remnant (only of them) shall be saved (i. e. shall be converted to good, say the Jews, and so continue to enjoy the name and title of his people):

28 For (saith he) he will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness: because [16] a short work will the Lord make upon the earth (i. e. the land of Judea).

29 And (this hath happened according) as Esaias said before, (i. 9, That there was a time when the sins of that people were so highly provoking, that) except the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, (except his exceeding goodness had redeemed us in mercy, there were sins in us, saith the Chaldee paraphrast, for which) we had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrha.

30 [17] What shall we say then? (τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; what do we say then? i. e. what is therefore the substance of what I have intended in this discourse? It is even this,) That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness (i. e. who before the coming of Christ were not solicitous touching justification before God, as having no idea, and no notice of it, or call to it, and so as little thought of being preferred before Israel, as Isaac, being not born, of being preferred before Ishmael; and tions to what his will is the true cause of their not doing, and reproofs and punishments of that which his will caused them to do.

[12] Ver. 21. Οὐκ ἔχει ἐξουσίαν ὁ κεραμεὺς τοῦ πηλοῦ; Hath not the potter power over the clay?] That is, there is no more cause from God's dispensation in this case, in taking away the means of grace from and rejecting such a hardened people, and showing his favour unto others, who submit to his terms of mercy, to make this objection, than for the clay of Jeremy, when it was marred and broken (Jer. xviii. 4. 6), to complain against the potter, that he took one part of it and made it a vessel of dishonour, and another part of it and made it a vessel of honour.

That this example, of the clay in the hands of the potter, relates to God's dealing with sinners according to his pleasure, is evident not only from the application of it here to the impenitent, ver. 7, 8, but also from the like passage in Ecclesiasticus, where we are taught from this very instance, that "the ways of God are κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν αὐτοῦ, according to his good pleasure;" because "as the clay is in the hands of the potter, so is man in the hands of him that made him, to render to them as liketh him best, κατὰ τὴν κρίσιν αὐτοῦ, according to his righteous judgment" (Ecclus. xxxiii. 13).

[13] Ver. 22. Εἰ δὲ θέλων ὁ Θεός, What if God, &c.] i. e. What injustice therefore is it in God to deal with you as he dealt with a hardened Pharaoh, you having as oft refused to hearken to his voice as Pharaoh did? Or what if he long hath, and still at present bears with such "vessels of his wrath fitted for destruction," till in a more illustrious manner, and with more signal marks of his displeasure, for thus rejecting the gospel, and the promised Messiah, he swallow up their nation, their people, their temple, and their holy city, in one general destruction? Is it not for the glory of the divine power and wisdom to reserve the rejectors of the Messiah, sent to bless them, and the persecutors of the Christian faith, to be at last cut off with such a remarkable destruction, as shall render it visible to the world that God's indignation is incensed against them for this sin, and so shall give to Jew and gentile a farther motive to believe in Jesus?

And again, What if God is pleased, upon their impenitence and obduration, to show the riches of his glorious goodness and mercy upon those Jews and gentiles, whom he hath called to the faith of Christ, and so hath fitted and prepared to be the vessels of his mercy? Hath he not a just right to show his mercy to such persons who have submitted to the terms upon which he hath promised favour and acceptance, and so to own them as the spiritual seed of Abraham, and so as his peculiar people?

[14] Ver. 23. Ἃ προητοίμασεν εἰς δόξαν, Whom he hath prepared for his glory.] Thus the apostle, discoursing of the day of the Lord, which was coming to execute his dreadful judgments on the Jews, saith thus, "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess. v. 9).

[15] Ver 26. Ἐκεῖ κληθήσονται, There shall they be called the children of the living God.] It must be acknowledged, that in these words the prophet primarily speaketh of the restoration of the Jews exiled, and cast off from being his people; but yet that these words may not only be accommodated, but even extended to the gentiles, who were emphatically not his people, and yet by faith became the seed of Abraham; and the true Israelites being the sons of God by faith in Jesus Christ (ver. 6. 8), may be argued from the phrase במקום, "in the place" or nation "where it was said, Ye are not my people:" and so the Jews themselves interpret these words in the gloss upon the Talmud, saying, "They who were not of my people shall adhere to the Lord, and be to me for a people" (Glos. Talmud. in Tract. de Paschate, ad cap. 8); according to that of the prophet Zechariah, "And many nations shall adhere to the Lord in that day, and shall be my people" (Zech. ii. 11).

[16] Ver. 28. Λόγον συντετμημένον, A short work.] i. e. Such a consumption and decision is by God designed upon that multitude of evil-doers in the land of Israel, as shall cut them very short and lop them off, so that they shall be as a tree, of which only the stump remaineth; "They shall be reduced," saith R. Solomon, "to a small remnant, and a remnant of that remnant shall be converted" (see Examen Millii here).

[17] Ver. 30. Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; What do we then say?] From this recapitulation of the whole dispute of the apostle in this chapter, and his declaration that this was the design of it, to justify God in this proceeding and dealing with them both, it is exceeding evident that it was not at all designed to determine any thing touching God's absolute decrees of dealing with mankind in general, thus or thus, as to their final and eternal state, but only to justify his dealings, as in his providence he had actually done with the unbelieving Jews, rejecting them upon their stubborn infidelity and the hardness of their hearts; and with the believing gentiles, admitting them to be his church and people, and the spiritual seed of Abraham, upon their faith and submission to the terms he Jacob in the womb, of being chosen to be the promised seed before Esau), have (yet, through God's grace and favour through faith,) attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith (and so are made God's, and his peculiar people).

31 But Israel, (to whom the promise was first made, and) which followed after the law of righteousness (i. e. earnestly pursued after righteousness, and acceptance by the works of the law), hath not attained to the law of righteousness, (or to the righteousness which God accepteth.

32 And) Wherefore (is it so)? Because they sought it (this justification) not by (that) faith (which alone God prescribed for that end), but [18] as (if) it were (to be obtained) by the works of the law, (by which no flesh can be justified, iii. 20, and the reason why they sought not by faith in Christ is this,) for they [19] stumbled at that stumblingstone; (and so it happened to them,)

33 As it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion a [20] stumblingstone and rock of offence: and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed, (but they that believe not shall stumble, and fall, and be broken by the stone of stumbling, and rock of offence, Isa. viii. 14, 15).

had proposed for their justification and acceptance with him.

[18] Ver. 32. Ὡς ἐξ ἔργων νόμου.] Ὡς, say Hesychius and Phavorinus, is used ἀντὶ τοῦ ὄντως ἀληθοῦς, as ב in the Hebrew is, or as an expletive: so Matt. xiv. 5, xxi. 6, John i. 14, 2 Cor. i. 17, Phil. ii. 7, 1 Pet. i. 12, so Neh. vii. 2, αὐτὸς ὡς ἀνὴρ ἀληθὴς, "He was a true man, and one that feared the Lord:" see Noldius, Concord. Partic. p. 376, 377, and is, as the Greek commentators often note, οὐχ ὁμοιώσεως ἀλλὰ βεβαιώσεως καὶ ἀναμφισβήτου διορισμοῦ, "a particle not of similitude but of confirmation," and so may here be rendered, "But verily," or, "But indeed, by the works of the law."

[19] Προσέκοψαν γὰρ, For they stumbled, &c.] They sought not justification by faith in Christ, because whereas God had pointed out to them this way of salvation, by saying, "Behold, I lay in Zion a corner-stone, elect and precious, and whosoever believeth in him shall not be ashamed," Isa. xxviii. 16, this corner-stone became to them of Israel, according to the words of the same prophet, viii. 14, "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence:" they being offended at him because of his poverty, humility, and outward meanness, and the spirituality of his kingdom; and so they stumbled and fell off from being God's people, and exclude themselves from the blessings procured for and offered to them by the Messias promised to their forefathers (see 1 Pet. ii. 6—8).

[20] Ver. 33. Προσκόμματος λίθου, A stone of stumbling, &c.] The Jews say, "The Son of David, i. e. the Messias, cometh not till the two houses of the fathers of Israel shall be taken away, to wit, the head of the captivity of Babylon, and the prince who is in Israel, as it is said, 'He shall be a stone of stumbling, and a rock of ruin, to the two houses of Israel, and many of them shall stumble and fall, and be broken.'" And the Chaldee paraphrast upon the place saith thus, &c. ואם לא יקבלון, "And if they will not obey, or receive (him), my word shall be to them for scandal and ruin to the princes of the two houses of Israel."

CHAPTER X.

1 Brethren, my heart's desire and [1] prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved.

2 For I bear them record that they have [2] a zeal of God (being very desirous to do what they conceive well pleasing to him, and acceptable in his sight), but (this zeal is) not according to knowledge (i. e. not joined with the knowledge of those things which would render them truly acceptable to him).

3 For they being ignorant (through unbelief, 1 Tim. i. 13,) of God's righteousness, (i. e. of that way of justification which alone renders us righteous, and acceptable in the sight of God, see note on Rom. i. 17, 2 Cor. v. 21,) and going about to establish their own righteousness (which is of the law, Phil. iii. 9, and so a righteousness peculiar to them who are Jews), have not submitted themselves unto (that righteousness which is through faith in Christ, and is) the righteousness of God.

4 For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness (to be imputed) to every one that believeth (in him; the law being our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith, Gal. iii. 25.

5 Which righteousness by faith can never be obtained by the works of the law;) For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law (thus), That the man which doeth those things [3] shall live by them (so that this righteousness is, plainly, not of faith, but of works).

6 But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh (so as that we may accommodate the works of Moses to it) on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above) (to be a teacher of it to us):

7 Or, Who shall [4] descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead) (to give us the salvation purchased by his death).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. X.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἡ δέησις, My prayer.] That the apostle speaks not in the preceding chapter of the absolute and peremptory rejection and reprobation of Israel, is evident from this prayer, and vehement desire; for on supposition of such a decree of reprobation, this must not only be a vain prayer, but also an opposing of his will, and εὐδοκία, to "the good pleasure" of Almighty God revealed to him; for it is evident he prays here for all Israel, for them whose "zeal to God" was "not according to knowledge," and who were "ignorant of God's righteousness," ver. 2, 3, not for those only, as Esthius descants, whom God hath predestinated to be saved by the prayers of the saints.

[2] Ver. 2. Ζῆλον Θεοῦ, A zeal for God.] Hence were some of them called "zealots," taking that name ἀπὸ τῶν ἐπ' ἀγαθῷ ζηλωτῶν, "from those who were zealous for that which was good," saith Josephus, de Bello Jud. lib. vii. cap. 30, p. 986.

[3] Ver. 5. Ζήσεται ἐν αὐτοῖς, Shall live by them,] A prosperous and happy life in the land of Canaan, as Origen* interprets the words, eternal life being not the promise of the law, but of the gospel; and if eternal life was obscurely hinted as the reward of their obedience to the law of Moses, it related not to their obedience to the ceremonial, but to the moral law; of which our Saviour saith, "If thou wilt enter into life (eternal, ver. 16), keep the commandments," Matt. xix. 18, and "This do, and thou shalt live," Luke x. 28. Obedience to which includes faith in his word and promises: and so faith in Christ, when once that is revealed as the condition of our justification, and the obedience they yielded to it, availed to their salvation, only through the new covenant of grace, which pardoned the infirmities of that obedience (see Examen Millii here).

[4] Ver. 7. Τίς καταβήσεται εἰς τὴν ἄβυσσον; Who shall descend into the deep?] These words, Deut. xxx. 13, are these, "Who shall go over the sea?" that is, say the Targums of Jerusalem and B. Uziel, "the great sea," or the deep sea; and the Jerusalem Targum renders the words thus, "Oh that there were one like Jonas the prophet, who would descend לעיקי ימא, into the depth of the great sea!" Now we know Jonas descending into the deep was a type of Christ, Matt. xii. 20, "descending into the deep of the earth," Ps. lxxi. 20, and being brought again, say the LXX., ἐκ τῶν ἀβύσσων

8 But what saith it? (what therefore saith it?) The word is [5] nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith, which we preach;

9 That if thou shalt [6] confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness (Gr. to justification); and [7] with the mouth confession is made (of that faith) unto salvation.

11 For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed (of his hope and salvation by him, Rom. iv. 5.

12 And it rightly saith, Whosoever,) For there is no difference (as to the way of justification and salvation) between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him (for salvation).

13 For (as the prophet Joel saith, ii. 32) [8] whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.

14 Now this calling upon him supposes God's intention, that the gentiles, as well as Jews, should hear, in order to their believing; for did they not believe,) How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? (Did they not hear,) and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and (this hearing supposeth some preacher was to be sent to the gentiles, for) how shall they hear without a preacher?

15 And (this preacher must have a commission from God, for) how shall they preach, except they be sent? (Now certainly we have been sent to you Jews, preaching peace to you by Jesus Christ, Acts x. 36,) as it is written (Isa. lii. 7, 8), How [9] beautiful (upon the γῆς, "from the abysses of the earth;" and this might give occasion to the apostle to allude to their traditional interpretation, or paraphrase on the words of Moses; like to which are those of Baruch, iii. 16, "Who hath gone up into heaven, and taken wisdom, and brought her down from the clouds? who hath gone over the sea, and found her?" And to this effect is that of Philo, "What need is there ἢ μάκρας οἰδοπορίας, ἢ τοῦ θαλαττεύειν, either to take long journeys, or go to sea in search of virtue, we having the root of it within us?" or, as Moses saith, "in our mouth, in our heart, and in our hand?" lib. Quòd omnis probus liber, p. 677, E. Note also, that the apostle says not, to bring Christ ab inferis, as Esthius here doth, but only to bring him ἐκ νεκρῶν, "from the dead;" this place therefore concerns not Christ's descent into hell, in the sense of Esthius.

[5] Ver. 8. Ἐγγύς σου, Nigh thee.] It is neither far from any man's hearing, for we preach it every where; nor far from his understanding, for in preaching it "we use great plainness of speech," 2 Cor. iii. 12; it is in thy mouth to profess, and in thy heart to believe it, and thus we preach.

[6] Ver. 9. Ἐὰν ὁμολογήσῃς, If thou shalt confess, &c.] Hence observe,

First, That the justification is here expressly ascribed to faith, and that not as including works, but only as being that principle which, when it is cordial and sincere, will certainly produce them: I say, not as including all those works which by the gospel are required to salvation; for then the righteousness of faith must be described as is the righteousness of the law, viz. that "the man who doth these things shall live in them," which is contrary to the words of the apostle, ver. 5, 6. See the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians.

Secondly, Observe, that the faith to which justification and salvation are ascribed, is not here, as it is elsewhere said to be, faith in his blood, but a belief that "God had raised up Jesus from the dead." So Paul, having discoursed of the faith of Abraham, which was imputed to him for righteousness, saith, "This was not written for his sake alone," that it was imputed to him, "but for us also to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe in him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. iv. 23, 24). Thus are we said to be risen with Christ "through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12). And in Peter, the Christian is said to "believe through Christ in God, who raised him from the dead, that our faith and hope might be in God" (1 Pet. i. 21). Now this belief in God, as raising our Lord Jesus from the dead, is therefore represented as faith unto salvation, because it ministereth to us a full assurance of salvation by Christ, and of our resurrection also; for "if we believe that Jesus Christ died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him" (1 Thess. iv. 14); "knowing that he that raised up the Lord Jesus, shall also raise us up by Jesus" (2 Cor. iv. 13, 14). And this belief of a happy resurrection to eternal life is a sufficient motive to be "steadfast, immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord" (1 Cor. xv. 58). And where it hath not these effects upon us, we do not in the scripture sense duly believe and attend to it. Note, Thirdly, That when the apostle saith, "If thou dost thus confess and believe thou shalt be saved," we need not understand this of actual and complete salvation, to be imparted at the day of judgment: but that this faith and this confession will put us in the way of salvation, and give us a right to it, whilst we continue to act suitably to this faith, which I have shown to be the frequent import of the word salvation and saved, when salvation is ascribed to faith and grace (see the notes on Eph. ii. 8, Titus iii. 5).

[7] Ver. 10. Στόματι δὲ ὁμολογεῖται, With the mouth confession is made to salvation.] For in those times of persecution for the sake of Christ, he that continued, under those fiery trials, to hold fast his profession, could do it only through that lively faith in Christ, and that sincere affection to him above all worldly interests, which he hath promised to reward with life eternal.

[8] Ver. 13. Ἐπικαλέσηται τὸ ὄνομα Κυρίου, Shall call upon the name of the Lord.] The word in the original is Jehovah, whence it is certain that the prophet speaks these words of the true and only God; and yet it is as certain that the apostle here ascribes them to our Lord Jesus Christ, both from the following words, "How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed?" (for the apostle in this whole chapter discourseth of faith in Christ;) and from the words foregoing, of which these are a proof, and to which they are connected with the particle γὰρ· for those words, "Whosoever believeth in him shall not be ashamed," are spoken by the prophet Isaiah of Jesus Christ the "corner-stone," Isa. xxviii. 16, and so are they interpreted by Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7. And in the prophet Joel these words follow, εὐαγγελιζόμενοι, οὓς Κύριος προσκέκληται, "And the evangelized, whom the Lord shall call, shall be saved." Here then we have two arguments for the divinity of Christ: (1.) That what is spoken of Jehovah is ascribed to him. (2.) That he is made the object of our religious invocation (see note on 1 Cor. i. 2). But

Mr. L. indeed attempts to invalidate the force of both these arguments, first, by saying that this calling upon the name of the Lord doth not import the invocation of Christ, but only an open profession of faith in him, because St. Paul argues closely, and yet in the three preceding verses requires an open profession of the gospel. Ans. There is not one word of professing either in the eleventh or twelfth verses; in the ninth or tenth he mentions "confession with the mouth," and believing with the heart, as necessary, because the scripture saith, "Whosoever believeth shall not be ashamed, the same Lord over all being rich to all that call upon him:" for, Joel ii. 32, "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." If then Paul be a close reasoner, he must speak of invocation of the name of the Lord. Moreover, this being the character of the disciples of Christ, even before they were called Christians (see note on Acts ix. 2), and the continual practice of all Christians from the beginning (see note on 1 Cor. i. 2), the apostle might well argue from believers, to those that call upon Christ's name. The first argument he would invalidate by denying that the words cited by Paul from Joel are to be understood in the sense in which they are used by the prophet, which in effect is to deny that the apostle argued either closely or truly, for the whole of the apostle's inference is lost, if either "the Lord," ver. 13, be not the same Lord with him in ver. 12, or if to "call upon" him doth not bear the same sense in both places.

[9] Ver. 15. Ὡς ὡραῖοι, How beautiful, &c.] The Midrash Shir Hashirim upon those words of Cant. ii. 12, "The voice mountains) are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things! (that say unto Zion, Thy God reigneth, or, as the Chaldee, The kingdom of thy God is revealed.)

16 But (if the apostles were sent to the Jews, how is it that) they have not all obeyed the gospel. (I answer, This incredulity of the Jews is only that which was foretold by their own prophets;) for (so) Esaias saith (of them, liii. 1), Lord, who hath believed our report? (τὴν ἀκοὴν ἡμῶν.)

17 So then (ἄρα, these testimonies show that) faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by (the preaching of) the word of God.

18 But (Gr. moreover) I say (of the gentiles), Have they not heard? Yes verily (that of the psalmist being true of us the preachers of the gospel), their [10] sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world. (Ch. viii., Colos. i. 16. 23.)

19 [11] But (yea, or also,) I say, Did not Israel know (of the preaching of the gospel to the gentiles, and of their own infidelity in rejecting it? This surely they might know from their own scriptures; for) first Moses saith, I will provoke you (refusing to believe) to jealousy by them that are (yet) [12] no people (of God), and by a foolish nation I will anger you.

20 But Esaias is very bold (in his expression), and saith (of the gentiles), I was found of them that (formerly) sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me.

21 But to Israel (foretelling their infidelity) he saith, [13] All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people.

of the turtle is heard in our land," saith thus, "This is the voice of the King Messiah, crying out, and saying, How beautiful," &c. Moreover, from those words, "How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard?" ver. 14, and from those, ver. 17, "Faith cometh by hearing," &c., it follows that those gentiles who never had the gospel preached to them, or any opportunity of hearing it, cannot be condemned for want of faith in Christ or in his doctrine, that being to condemn them for the want of that which they never were in a capacity to have; if therefore they are capable of a reward, as they must be who are obliged to "believe that God is the rewarder of all them that diligently seek him" (Heb. xi. 6), Christ must be a Saviour to them who do thus seek him, though they know not of him.

[10] Ver. 18. Ὁ φθόγγος αὐτῶν, Their voice.] These words being spoken literally of the preaching of the Hebrews to the gentiles, touching the power, wisdom, and the goodness of God; and the psalmist speaking immediately after of God's teaching his people by the law, as a more glorious discovery of his will to the Jews, the apostle very appositely accommodates these words to the revelation of his power, wisdom, goodness and mercy, in the gospel to the heathens.

Moreover, that קוּם, which we render "their line," Ps. xix. 4, does signify "their loud cry," and so is well rendered by the apostle here ὁ φθόγγος αὐτῶν, "their sound," i. e. the sound of the apostles, is fully proved by Dr. Pocock, Miscel. cap. 4, p. 48.

[11] Ver. 19. Ἀλλὰ, But.] That ἀλλὰ signifies yea, see our translation rendering it so five times, 2 Cor. vii. 11, John xvi. 2. That it signifies, quin etiam, quin immò, see Noldius, and Luke xii. 7, 1 Cor. iii. 2, xii. 22.

[12] Ἐπ' οὐκ ἔθνει, By them that are no people.] That this is the description of the heathens, see note on 1 Cor. i. 28, who are also styled, not only by the Jews, but by the scriptures, whilst idolaters, "a foolish people," Jer. x. 8, Rom. i. 21, 22, Titus iii. 3.

[13] Ver. 21. Ὅλην τὴν ἡμέραν, All the day long.] These words are cited from Isa. lxv. 1, 2, and Aben Ezra informs us, that R. Moses Hacoben* said, "The first verse is to be understood of the nations of the world, as if it had been said, I am found of the nations which are not called by my name, but to my people have I stretched out my hand:" and so the apostle interprets and applies the words here.

CHAPTER XI.

1 I SAY then, (that the generality of the Jews are hardened and cast off, but what then?) Hath God cast away his people (utterly and without exception)? God forbid (we should so think). For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin (and yet chosen to be an apostle of Christ).

2 God (therefore) hath not (thus) cast away his people [1] which he foreknew. (Ps. xcv. 3, And to represent this in a like case well known to you,) Wot ye not what the scripture saith of Elias (ἐν Ἠλίᾳ, in the history of Elias)? how he (in it) maketh intercession to God [2] against (the king and people of) Israel, saying,

3 Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XI.

[1] Ver. 2. Ὃν προέγνω, Whom he foreknew.] Concerning the people of Israel, Moses speaks thus; "Thou art a holy people to the Lord thy God; the Lord thy God προείλετο, hath chosen thee to be a special people to himself above (or, before) all people that are upon the face of the earth," Deut. vii. 6, x. 15. Now to be "chosen," and to be "known of God," are the same thing in scripture, and therefore the phrase is elsewhere varied thus; "You only have I known before all the families of the earth," Amos iii. 2, ὑμᾶς ἔγνων ἐκ πασῶν τῶν φυλῶν τῆς γῆς· Numb. xvi. 5, "To-morrow, ידע, and the Lord will know who are his, and who is holy, even him whom he hath chosen," which by the LXX. is thus translated, καὶ ἔγνω ὃς Θεὸς τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ, καὶ τοὺς ἁγίους ——οὓς ἐξελέξατο αὐτῷ, "The Lord knoweth who are his, and the holy ones whom he hath chosen to himself;" and, ver. 7, "The man whom the Lord doth choose, he shall be holy." And those words of Hosea, "Judah yet ruleth with the Lord, and is faithful with his saints," xi. 12, are by the Septuagint thus rendered, καὶ Ἰούδα νῦν ἔγνω αὐτοὺς ὁ Θεὸς, καὶ ὁ λάος ἅγιος κληθήσεται Θεοῦ, "And as for Judah, now God hath known them, and he shall be called the holy people of God:" so that the "people whom he foreknew," may be here only a periphrasis of the Jewish nation, which God hath chosen before all other nations of the world, and therefore would not utterly cast off, because his "gifts and callings are without repentance" (ver. 29): or it may signify those of them who believed in Christ, and so were such as he had purposed to have, or "the election according to grace" (ver. 5. 7), which sense this phrase bears, Rom. viii. 29, 1 Pet. i. 1, 2.

[2] Ἐντυγχάνει τῷ Θεῷ κατὰ τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, He maketh intercession to God against Israel.] Ἐντυγχάνειν ὑπερ, is to intercede or be an advocate for a person, and he that doth so is called συνήγορος, and this is the office of our blessed Lord, "who ever lives to make intercession for us;" but ἐντυγχάνειν κατά τινος, is to accuse, or charge a person with a crime, and so to intercede against him. So 1 Macc. viii. 32, "If the Jews complain against thee, ἐὰν ἐντύχωσι κατά σου, we will do them justice." And when wicked men came to king Alexander to complain against Jonathan, the king commanded a proclamation to be made, τοῦ μηδένα ἐντυγχάνειν κατ' αὐτοῦ περὶ μηδενὸς πράγματος, "that no man should complain against him about any matter," 1 Macc. x. 61. 63. And again, xi. 25, "Some wicked men complained against him," ἐντύγχανον

[3] down thine altars; and I am left alone (of all thy prophets), and they seek my life.

4 But what saith the answer of God unto him (in that history)? (It speaks thus,) I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee [4] to the image of Baal.

5 Even so then (is it) at this present time also (for even now) there is a remnant according to the [5] election of grace.

6 And if (they who are chosen in Christ, Eph. i. 4, to be God's church and people, are put into this state) by grace, (being justified freely by his grace, Rom. iii. 24,) then is it no more of (the) works (of the law that they are thus justified and accepted by him): otherwise grace is no more grace; (for what need is there of grace, where men have continued in all things written in the law to do them? Moses having said, The man that doth these things shall live by them, Rom. x. 5.) But (on the other hand) if it be of works (that we are justified and accepted), then is it no more (of) grace: otherwise work is no more work (for grace comes in only to supply the defect of works, that is, to procure pardon for the non-performance of them, according to the tenor of the law).

7 What then (must be said in this case but this? viz. that the whole nation of) Israel hath not obtained that (righteousness or justification, Rom. ix. 30, 31) which he seeketh for; but the election (the chosen generation of believers, 1 Pet. ii. 9) hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded

8 (And this blindness hath happened to them,)(According as it is written, [6] God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;) unto this day.

9 And (as) David saith, Let their table be (or [7] their table shall be) made a snare, and a trap, and a κατ' αὐτοῦ. So here, ἐντυγχάνειν κατὰ τοῦ Ἰσραήλ, is to "complain against Israel."

[3] Ver. 3. Τὰ θυσιαστήριά σου, Thy altars.] Not those which God approved of after the building of the temple, they being then obliged to offer all their sacrifices "at the place which God had chosen to put his name there," Deut. xii. 5, 6; but those which had before been used by the patriarchs and prophets for the service of God, as that of Samuel in Ramah and in Mizpeh, 1 Sam. vii. 9, ix. 13, in Gilgal, xi. 16, at Bethlehem, xvi. 2. 4, and the altar of the Lord at Carmel, 1 Kings xviii. 30, on which the pious people of the ten tribes sacrificed when they were not permitted to go up to Jerusalem, that law, saith Kimchi, then ceasing as to them.

[4] Ver. 4. Τῇ Βάαλ, To Baal.] That is, to the image of Baal; so Hos. ii. 8, "I gave her the gold and the silver which she prepared for Baal," Gr. αὐτὴ δὲ ἀργυρᾶ καὶ χρυσᾶ ἐποίησε τῇ Βάαλ, "But she prepared this gold and silver for the image of Baal;" she made idols of them, saith the Targum; so Tobit i. 5, ἔθυον τῇ Βάαλ τῇ δαμάλει, "They sacrificed to the heifer Baal;" Jer. ii. 28, "according to the number of their streets in Jerusalem, ἔθυον τῇ Βάαλ, have they sacrificed to the image of Baal;" for sure they had not as many Baalims as they had streets, and therefore, where the Septuagint reads, τῇ Βάαλ, there the Chaldee adds, "idols," or "images:" "I will blot out the names of Baal," τὰ ὀνόματα τῆς Βάαλ; reliquias idolorum Baal, Targum (see Hosea xiii. 1). This I prefer before that notion of the learned Selden, that Baal was ἀρρενοθήλυς, "male and female."

[5] Ver. 5. The election of grace.] See note on ver. 28. That many who belonged to this election fell away, is evident from the Epistle to the Hebrews (see the note on 2 Thess. ii. 3); and whereas Dr. Mills contends that the words following, viz. εἰ δὲ ἐξ ἔργων, οὐκ ἔτι ἐστὶ χάρις, ἐπεὶ τὸ ἔργον οὐκ ἔτι ἐστὶν ἔργον, are supposititious, as being not found in the Vulgar, in Hilary the deacon, and in the Latin Origen: that they are genuine, is proved in the Syriac and Arabic versions, from Theodoret, Photius, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, who all retain them: and from these words of Chrysostom, who, tom. v. ed. Morrell. p. 718, explains and confirms them thus: He that contends he is to be saved by the works of the law, hath no title to grace, ὅπερ οὖν καὶ Παῦλος αἰνιττόμενος ἔλεγεν, εἰ χάριτι, &c. εἰ δὲ ἐξ ἔργων, οὐκ ἔτι ἐστὶ χάρις, ἐπεὶ τὸ ἔργον οὐκ ἔτι ἐστὶν ἔργον. See Examen Millii in locum.

[6] Ver. 8. Ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Θεός, God hath given them a spirit of slumber, &c.] The Hebrew נתן, and the Greek δίδωμι, is often used to signify a permission of that which we can hinder, as Gen. xxxi. 7, οὐκ ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ ὁ Θεὸς κακοποιῆσαί με, "God (saith Jacob) permitted not Laban to hurt me," Deut. xviii. 14, καί σοι οὐκ οὕτως ἔδωκε Κύριος ὁ Θεός σου, "The Lord thy God hath not suffered thee to do so" (see also Judg. xv. 1, Acts ii. 27, xiii. 35). So again, 1 Kings xxii. 22, 23, "The Lord hath put, ἔδωκεν ὁ Θεός, a lying spirit in the mouth of all thy prophets;" i. e. he hath permitted him freely to go forth, and to deceive them, ver. 22. Esth. ix. 13, "If it please the king, ἐοθήτω Ἰουδαίοις, let it be granted to the Jews to do so to-morrow also." Of him that sat upon the red horse it is said, that ἐδόθη αὐτῷ, "it was given him to take peace from the earth," Rev. vi. 4, ix. 3. 5; of the beast it is said, ἐδόθη αὐτῷ, "There was given to him a mouth to speak great things, and blasphemies; and it was given him to make war with the saints, and overcome them" (see Hos. xiii. 11, Joel ii. 17. 19, Rev. vi. 8, ix. 14, 15, see the note on i. 24. 26). And in this sense God is here said to have given the Jews "a spirit of slumber," by permitting them to lie under those prejudices against the true Messiah, which their traditions concerning him, and the doctrine and authority of the scribes and pharisees had wrought within them; as also by delivering the things belonging to Christ's kingdom obscurely to them, and in parables, because they would not receive them when more plainly taught (Matt. xiii. 13); and by "taking the kingdom of God from them, and giving it to a nation that would bring forth the fruits of it," because they contradicted and blasphemed the doctrine of that kingdom, and so caused the apostles to turn from them to the gentiles (Matt. xxiii. 43, Acts xiii. 45, 46); and by refusing to walk in the light whilst they enjoyed it, they made it just that "darkness should (thus) come upon them," or that they should "have eyes, and see not, ears, and hear not;" which is a mode of speaking used frequently in the Old Testament, and in Philo the Jew, and others, to represent men who had contracted such prejudices against God's word, and such vicious habits, as made them not to discern or give ear to the voice of God, or reason, calling them to reformation and amendment. So God speaks by his prophet Isaiah, "Hear ye deaf; and look, ye blind: seeing many things, but thou observest not; opening the ears, but he heareth not," Isa. xlii. 18. 20. And by the prophet Jeremiah, "Hear now this, O foolish people, and without understanding; which have eyes, and see not, which have ears, and hear not," Jer. v. 21. By the prophet Ezekiel, saying, "They have eyes to see, and see not: ears to hear, and hear not: for they are a rebellious house," Ezek. xii. 2. So Christ speaks to his own disciples, "Having eyes, do ye not see?" Mark viii. 18. So Philo often saith of men addicted to their sensual pleasures, and pursuing them against the dictates of their minds, that* ὁρῶντες οὐχ ὁρῶσι, καὶ ἀκούοντες οὐκ ἀκούουσι, "seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not;" this he saith, περὶ τῶν ἡδονῆς κεκορημένων, "of persons satiated with pleasure, and drunk with the love of wine." This, saith he, happens,† ἐν τοῖς κόροις, ἐν ταῖς μέθαις, "when we indulge to gluttony, or drunkenness;" and‡ ἐν ταῖς καθ' ὕπνον φαντασίαις, "in the phantasms of our dreams." Thus of those heathens who worshipped the works of their own hands, Justin Martyr§ saith, that ὀφθαλμοὺς ἔχοντες οὐχ ἑώρων, οὐδὲ καρδίαν ἔχοντες συνίεσαν, "having eyes, they saw not, and having hearts, they did not understand."

[7] Ver. 9. Γενηθήτω, &c. Their table shall be, and their eyes shall be.] They who are skilled in the Hebrew tongue, know that these words are as capable of the future, as the imperative mood and tense: they are rendered in the future by stumblingblock, and a recompence unto them (of their evil deeds):

10 Let their eyes be (or their eyes shall be) darkened, that they may not see, and (thou shalt) [8] bow down their back alway.

11 I say then (or moreover, of those of the Jewish nation which are thus blinded), Have they (so) stumbled that they should (irrecoverably) fall? God forbid (we should think so of them): but rather (so hath it happened through the wise counsel of God that) through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles (whom God hath now chosen to be his people), for to provoke them to jealousy (or to an emulation of their faith, that they also may be saved).

12 Now (εἰ δὲ, and) if the fall of them (from the prerogative of being God's peculiar people happened thus to) be the riches of the (gentile) world, and the diminishing of them the riches (and increase) of the Gentiles; how much more (shall) [9] their fulness (be the increase of them)?

13 (Of you gentiles, I say,) For I speak (this) to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, (and by thus speaking) I magnify mine office: (as declaring it to reach to the whole body of the gentiles, and to have been thus efficacious among them, Rom. xv. 18, 19:

14 And I speak of your being chosen thus to be God's people;) [10] If by any means I may provoke to (an) emulation (of your faith) them which are my flesh, and (so) might (be a means to) save some of them.

15 (And indeed their salvation is desirable, not only for their own, but for your sakes:) For if the casting away of them be (an occasion of) the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them (again into favour) be (to the gentiles), but (even as) life (or a resurrection) from the dead?

16 (Nor are you to imagine this is an improbable and even desperate supposition:) For if the (patriarchs, who were the) [11] firstfruit (of them) be (were) holy (called and separated to the service of God from all the people of the earth), the lump (of the whole nation) is also (in God's designation) holy: and if the root (of them, viz. Abraham) be (was) holy (and beloved of God), so are the branches (also beloved still of God for the fathers' sake, and so will be once more, in his good time, admitted to his favour).

17 And if (it hath so happened that) some of the branches (through infidelity) be broken off, and thou (gentile), being a wild olive tree (or branch), wert graffed in among them, and with them (who believe) partakest (of the privileges) of the root and fatness of the olive tree (into which thou art graffed);

18 Boast not against the branches (now cut off, as if they were utterly rejected from God's care and favour). But if thou boast, (consider) thou bearest not the root, but the root thee; (the promises being not made to thee, but to Abraham their root; and if thou becomest partaker of them only by being the spiritual seed of Abraham, by imitation of his faith, how much more shall they, who are by lineal descent the seed of Abraham and so the primary and direct heirs of the promise, Acts iii. 25, xii. 26, in due time be graffed into their own root? ver. 24.)

19 Thou wilt say then, The (natural) branches were broken off (for their infidelity), that I might be graffed in (i. e. received as God's people in their stead).

20 Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, (i. e. rejected from being his church and people, ver.

Arias Montanus: and the Seventy interpreters sometimes render them in the imperative, as Ps. cix. 6. 15, and sometimes in the future, as ver. 17, "As he loved cursing, so let it come upon him, καὶ ἤξει αὐτῷ as he delighted not in blessing, so let it be far from him," καὶ μακρυνθήσεται ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, and ver. 8, "Let them curse, but bless thou," καταράσονται αὐτοὶ, καὶ σὺ εὐλογήσεις, "They shall curse, but thou shalt bless."

[8] Ver. 10. Τον νῶτον αὐτῶν, &c. Ever bow down their backs.] That is, let them be in slavery and bondage; the contrary, "going upright," signifying their freedom from Egyptian thraldom, by taking that yoke of bondage from them, which made them stoop under it. So Lev. xxvi. 13, "I have broken the bands of your yoke, and made you to go upright." So the Midrash Tillim upon these words of the psalmist, Ps. cxlvi. 8, "The Lord raiseth them that are bowed down," saith, "These are the Israelites carried captive from their own land; for since they were banished from Jerusalem, they have not been able to stand upright, but have bowed down their backs before their enemies, who go over them:" and therefore in their second benediction, before their reading of the morning schema, they pray thus, "Bring us in peace from the four wings of the earth, et duc nos staturâ erectâ in terram nostram, and lead us standing upright into our own land." Having thus answered the first question, he proceeds to inquire, whether they of them who thus stumbled have fallen so as that they shall never be recovered.

[9] Ver. 12. Πλήρωμα αὐτῶν, Their fullness.] As πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου, signifies the whole tract of time appointed for such an event, Gal. iv. 4, Eph. i. 10, πλήρωμα τῆς γῆς, "the whole contents of the earth," 1 Cor. x. 26. 28, and πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος is "the full perfection of the Deity," Col. ii. 9, and πλήρωμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, is "the perfection," or the fullness of grace and wisdom, with which he fills his members, Eph. iv. 13, and that ἐκ τοῦ πληρώματος αὐτοῦ, from that fullness of the Spirit which is in him, John i. 16, and πλήρωμα Θεοῦ is the same fullness derived from God, Eph. iii. 19; so here, πλήρωμα τῶν αὐτῶν is the time when the gentiles should more fully come in, and God would show mercy to them all, ver. 25. 32, and πλήρωμα τῶν Ἰουδαίων, "the fullness of the Jews," is "the coming-in of all Israel," ver. 26. And so Paul himself all along interprets it, styling it, ver. 15, πρόσληψις, "the receiving them into grace" and favour by God, the "engraffing" them who were broken off, as the unbelieving Jews were, "into their own olive-tree," ver. 23, 24, the "turning away iniquity from Jacob," ver. 26.

[10] Ver. 14. Εἴ πως παραζηλώσω, If by any means I may provoke them, &c.] This seems to be said in allusion to those words of God, Deut. xxxii. 21, "They have moved me to jealousy with that which is not God, κἀγὼ παραζηλώσω and I will move them to jealousy with those that are not a people," ver. 12; that seeing them who before were not the people of God, now chosen to be his people, and invested with all the privileges which formally belonged to them, viz. being of his church, among whom he dwells, and to whom he gives his Spirit, his new law, his prophets, apostles, and evangelists, they might be induced to believe, and so might still share in all those blessings. Hence also it appears that the apostle did not think they were so blinded or given up to a spirit of slumber, but that they might still be saved.

[11] Ver. 16. Εἰ δὲ ἡ ἀπαρχὴ, The first-fruits of them were holy.] It is generally known that the word holy, when applied to persons, families, churches, and nations, signifies their being called, consecrated, and separated from the world unto God's service: in which sense, in the Old Testament, it is frequently applied to the priest, Numb. xvi. 5, Ps. cvi. 16, to the Levites, Numb. iii. 13, viii. 14—17, to the whole Jewish nation, Exod. xxii. 31, xix. 6, Deut. vii. 6, xiv. 2. 21, xxviii. 9, Isa. lxii. 12, Dan. viii. 24, xii. 7. Hence then the argument runs thus: If God so loved Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as to engage his word that he would be their God, and the God of their seed for ever, Gen. xvii. 7, and by thus entering into covenant with them, hallowed to himself all their posterity, even as the "first-fruits" of their dough, made an offering, "hallowed the whole lump," Numb. xv. 20, then will he, in his good time, be so mindful of them as to bring them again into his covenant, so that "they shall be his people, and he will be their God;" for "as touching

15,) and thou standest (Gr. hast stood) by faith. Be not highminded, (vaunt not thyself over them, ver. 18. 25,) but fear (lest this should also be thy case):

21 For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed (thou hast cause to fear) [12] lest he also spare not thee.

22 Behold therefore (in this dispensation) the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity (in taking the kingdom of God away from them, Matt. xxi. 43); but toward thee, goodness (in admitting thee to be his church and people; which goodness will be still shown to thee), if thou continue in (or worthy of) his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off (for thy infidelity and disobedience).

23 And (as thou standest by faith, so) they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be graffed in: [13] for God is able to (work in them that faith which will) graff them in again.

24 (And that he will thus graff them in, we have just cause to think;) For if [14] thou wert cut out of (Gr. off from) the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert graffed contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches (though now cut off), be graffed (again) into their own olive tree?

25 (And this now I declare;) For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this [15] mystery (of the intended calling of the now-rejected Jews), lest ye should be wise in your own conceits (boasting over them, ver. 18, as being yourselves men of greater wisdom, and more highly favoured of God); that blindness in part is happened to Israel, (i. e. as to the greatest part of them, a remnant only being now brought into the faith, ver. 5. 7, ix. 27,) until the (time of the) fulness (or more complete conversion) of the Gentiles be come in.

26 And so [16] all (the nations of) Israel shall be saved (i. e. called and put into a state of salvation, 1 Tim. i. 9): as it is written (Isa. lix. 20), There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob:

27 For (again he by Isaiah saith) this is my covenant unto them (Isa. lix. 21), when I shall take away their sins (xxvii. 9).

28 As concerning the gospel (preached to them first, and upon their rejection of it, to the gentiles, Acts xiii. 45. 47), they are (now) enemies (to it, and by opposing it, to God and Christ) for your sakes: (being prejudiced against it, because you are received to the blessings of it, and that without circumcision, or being joined to them, Acts xvii. 13, xxii. 21, 22, 1 Thess. ii. 16:) but [17] as touching the election (of that nation to be a holy people to himself), they are (thus) beloved for the fathers sakes.

the election, they are still beloved for the fathers' sake." If this argument runs only upon the supposition that they do believe, it saith that only which is as true of all gentiles; it therefore seems to be an argument that they will be received into favour, and therefore will believe, ver. 21.

[12] Ver. 21. Μήπως οὐδέ σου φείσηται, Lest he also spare not thee.] Φόβου, "Fear" is to be repeated from the former verse. So 1 Thess. iii. 5, "I sent to know your faith," μήπως ἐπείρασεν ὑμᾶς, subaud. φοβούμενος, "fearing lest the tempter should have tempted you."

[13] Ver. 23. Δυνατὸς γάρ ἐστιν ὁ Θεός, For God is able, &c.] From which power we may reasonably conclude his will to do so, for so the apostle argues, xiv. 4, "He shall be holden up, for God is able to make him stand;" 2 Cor. vi. 8, "He that soweth liberally, shall reap liberally; for God is able to make all grace abound towards you" (see note on xiv. 4).

[14] Ver. 24.] Note, that there should be a fullness of the fallen Jews, and a receiving them again into favour, whom God had now cast off, the apostle plainly doth suppose, ver. 12. 15, and how he sets himself to the proof of it, by an argument, à minori ad majus, viz. If they, who had no such relation to Abraham, and the blessings promised to him, as the Jews had, were yet partakers of the blessings promised to Abraham, the root of that nation, how much more shall this favour, in God's due time, be granted to them who are children of the stock of Abraham!

[15] Ver. 25. Τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο, This mystery, &c.] See the confirmation of this exposition in the appendix to this epistle.

[16] Ver. 26.] Hence the second argument for a general conversion of the Jews runs thus: If that part of the Jews to which blindness hath happened shall be delivered from that heavy judgment, if "there shall come to them out of Zion a Deliverer to turn away their iniquity," if God will accomplish his covenant hereafter with them, "by taking away their sins," then they who are thus blinded shall be converted to the Christian faith. Where note,

First, That this promise is made to that part of the Jews to which blindness had happened, ver. 15, and so the promise of salvation to this Israel, cannot be interpreted of all the true children of Abraham, Jews and gentiles both.

Secondly, It saith that God will take away their sins, and "turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Now if this signifies that God will send "a Deliverer out of Zion," to procure the pardon of this people's sins, since pardon only can be given to them through faith in Christ, this Deliverer must be that Jesus who saves his people from their sins; if it imports that God would take away the punishment of their iniquity, that being the blindness and spiritual slumber which was then, and is still upon them; the removal of it must signify their conversion, this blindness being only then to be taken away, "when they shall turn to the Lord," 2 Cor. iii. 14—16.

[17] Ver. 28. Κατὰ δὲ τὴν ἐκλογήν, As touching the election.] Here is in this chapter mention of a double election, viz. ἐκλογὴ χάριτος, "election of grace," ver. 5, the gospel election of persons and nations to be his church and people, which being purely on the account of that faith which is the gift of God, without consideration of any other worthiness that we had, or any works that we had done, is styled "the election of grace;" and thus a remnant only of the Jews were chosen, ver. 7, "for many" of them were "called" by the preaching of the gospel to the faith, it being preached to them first, Acts xiii. 45, but "few" of them were "chosen" to be members of the church of Christ, because few of them believed. And, secondly, there is an election, διὰ τοὺς πατέρας, to be God's people for their fathers' sake, in which sense the whole nation of the Jews are styled the elect: as in these words, "Because he loved thy fathers," viz. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Deut. iv. 37, καὶ ἐξελέξατο τὸ σπέρμα αὐτῶν μετ' αὐτοὺς ὑμᾶς, "therefore he chose you their seed after them, and brought you out of Egypt by his mighty power;" where it is evident that all that were brought out of Egypt, were the elect, or the chosen seed. So Deut. vii. 6—8, "The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, οὐ προείλετο ὑμᾶς, he did not fore-elect you, because you were more in number than any people; but because the Lord loved you, and because that he would keep the oath which he had sworn to your fathers, hath he brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage." Where again it is evident, (1.) that their being chosen to be God's peculiar people before other nations, is their election: and (2.) that all who were brought out of Egypt were thus beloved, and thus chosen. And again, x. 14, 15, "The Lord had a delight in thy fathers to love them, καὶ ἐξελέξατο τὸ σπέρμα αὐτῶν μετ' αὐτοὺς ὑμᾶς, therefore he elected you their seed after them above all people; circumcise therefore the foreskin of your hearts, and be no more stiffnecked." Where again evident it is, that the whole seed of Abraham by Isaac, even the stiffnecked of them, were the beloved, and the elect of God; it being therefore not upon account of their righteousness, Deut. ix. 5, but for the love he had, and the promises he made, to their fathers, that he first loved and chose them for his people; and his love to these forefathers being still the same, and his promise to them being this, that he would be "for ever a God to them, 29 For (though they have rendered themselves unworthy of his favour, yet) the [18] gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

30 (Nor will their present infidelity and disobedience be any obstacle to this conversion;) For as ye (gentiles) in times past have not believed God (Gr. were disobedient to God), yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief (God having received you gentiles to be his people, because of their infidelity):

31 Even so have these also now not believed (Gr. not obeyed), that [19] through your mercy they also may obtain mercy.

32 For [20] God hath concluded them all (both Jew and gentile) in unbelief, that (at last) he might have mercy upon all.

33 O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! (by which he is able to convert all things to the honour and glory of his name, and make his severest judgments to conclude at last in mercy!) how unsearchable are his judgments (to any human understanding), and his ways past finding out (by any wit of man)!

34 For who hath (through his own wisdom, without revelation,) known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor (in thus ordering matters relating to Jew or gentile)?

35 Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? (i. e. who hath laid any obligations on him to reward him? Surely no man.) and their seed after them," Gen. xvii. 7, he must have that kind affection and regard to them, which will engage him to choose them again for his peculiar people, notwithstanding their present blindness; and "all Israel" being thus elected "for the fathers' sake," this calling must belong to them all.

[18] Ver. 29. Τὰ χαρίσματα, For the gifts, &c.] The particle for shows that these words relate to what was said in the former verse, viz. "They are beloved for their fathers' sake," to whom God gave this διαθήκη αἰώνιος, "everlasting covenant to be the God of their seed after them," Gen. xvii. 7. Now this covenant made with the fathers being absolute, and the calling of their seed to be his peculiar people being the effect of it, God will not repent for ever of his kindness to them; hence he engageth to save them "with an everlasting salvation," Isa. xlv. 17, "with everlasting kindness to have mercy on them," liv. 8, lvi. 5, lx. 19, 20, lxi. 7, and saith, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love," Jer. xxxi. 3. If then God will not repent for ever of his covenant made with their forefathers, "to be the God of their seed after them for ever," or that "he chose Jacob for himself, and Israel for his heritage," Ps. cxxxv. 4, then will he certainly restore them to that privilege and happy state; but God will not thus repent, "for the gifts and callings of God are without repentance."

[19] Ver. 31. Τῷ ὑμετέρῳ ἐλέει, To your mercy.] i. e. Which unbelief hath happened not to your rejection, as it did to them, but "to your mercy," that they also may obtain mercy together with you, and you with them, the fullness of the gentiles coming in with their conversion.

This argument for calling the Jews runs thus: If God hath called the gentiles to his grace after a long idolatry and infidelity, though they were not before ever admitted to those privileges the Jews enjoyed, nor had not God promised to be their God for ever, much more will be recall his chosen people from their infidelity.

[20] Ver. 32.] Esthius's note upon these three verses is this, That the apostle doth without controversy in these words speak of Israel according to the flesh, and therefore in the preceding words must be supposed to speak of the same Israel; so that hence the tradition of the church concerning the calling of the Jews towards the end of the world is established.

(See the appendix to this chapter, concerning the calling of the Jews to the Christian faith, at the end of this Epistle.)

CHAPTER XII.

1 I BESEECH you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of (that) God, (of whom, and through whom are all things, and to whose glory they are all designed, xi. 36, or by the mercies of God, mentioned xi. 30—32,) that ye [1] present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.

2 And [2] be not conformed to (the evil customs of) this (heathen) world: but be ye transformed (into other

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XII.

[1] Ver. 1. Παραστῆσαι τὰ σώματα ὑμῶν θυσίαν ζῶσαν, To present your bodies a living sacrifice.] By sin reigning in our mortal bodies, and by obeying the motions of it in our inward actions, we being said to present τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν, "the members of our bodies instruments of unrighteousness to sin" (vi. 12, 13), the apostle here doth properly exhort us παραστῆσαι, "to present" the same bodies now "a living sacrifice," in opposition to the legal sacrifices, which were first slain, and then offered up to God upon the altar, viz. by being now "dead unto sin, but alive unto God, through Jesus Christ our Lord:" a holy sacrifice, as being consecrated to the service of God, and "having our fruit unto holiness," as the servants of God still have (Rom. vi. 22): and as the sacrifices offered to God were to be free from any spot and blemish, and so holy; so are our bodies made "a holy sacrifice," when they are kept "in sanctification and honour," and free from "all filthiness of the flesh," and so a sacrifice "acceptable and well-pleasing" to that God, who desired not the legal sacrifices, nor delighted in burnt-offerings (Ps. li. 16, Heb. x. 8): and this, saith he, is not as the sacrifices of the law, ἐκ τῶν ἀλόγων, "of dead and unreasonable beasts," which was bodily service, or that in which the body chiefly was employed; but it is λογικὴ λατρεία, "a sacrifice of our reason," devoting ourselves, who are rational creatures, to his services, and also is highly suitably to our reason.

[2] Ver. 2. Καὶ μὴ συσχηματίζεσθε τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ, And be not conformed to this world.] It is the observation of Grotius on the former verse, that the apostle having shown before that justification could not be obtained by the law, comes now to show how the gospel perfected and spiritualized the law, as to the ritual and the judicial parts of it, and engaged us more exactly to fulfil the moral parts of it; beginning first with the sacrifices, which by the Jews were esteemed one great and chief part of their ritual worship. And then he may here proceed to their separations from men of other nations, or, as the pharisees had improved it, even from the vulgar sort, thinking it unlawful to eat, or converse with, or even touch "the people of the earth," as they styled them, and making their holiness to consist chiefly in such niceties and separations; showing that we do most effectually comply with all that God designed by any precepts of this nature, when we "keep ourselves unspotted from the world," or free from any conformity unto the sinful customs of it, as Christianity especially requires, Christ giving up himself for our sins, "that he might deliver us from this present evil world" (Gal. i. 4); or, he instructs them how to change their former heathen into a Christian conversation, declaring that whereas formerly they walked κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, "according to the course of this world," Eph. ii. 2, and "according to the will of the gentiles," 1 Pet. iv. 3, they should "no longer live the rest of their time to the lusts of men, but to the will of God," ver. 2.

men) [3] by the renewing of your mind (and judgment of things), that ye may prove (Gr. discern and approve, see note on 1 Cor. xi. 28, Gal. vi. 4) what is [4] that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God (i. e. that will which under the gospel requires only what is substantially good, and therefore always acceptable to him, and perfectly instructs us in our whole Christian duty.

3 Which will of God you will the better discern by your humility and diligence in the exercise of your spiritual gifts;) For I say, through the grace (of apostleship, see note on i. 5,) given unto me, to every man that is among you (thus gifted), not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, (on the account of those ministerial gifts conferred upon him, not for his own sake, but for the benefit of others, 1 Cor. iv. 6, 7, xii. 7, as did the scribes and pharisees, and doctors of the law, on the account of their wisdom and knowledge of it, Rom. viii. 18. 23;) but to think soberly (of himself), according as God hath dealt to every man the [5] measure of faith.

4 For as we have many members in one body (natural), and (Gr. but) all (the) members (of it) have not the same office (but some are more feeble, some more vigorous, some employed in more, some in less honourable services, 1 Cor. xii. from ver. 12 to 27):

5 So we (Christians), being many, are one body in Christ (our head), and every one (of us are different) members one of another.

6 Having then gifts differing according to the grace (or favour of God) that is given to us, whether (it be) prophecy, let us prophesy according to [6] the proportion of faith;

7 Or (if it be) [7] ministry (that of an evangelist), let us wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth, on teaching;

8 Or he that exhorteth (by a spiritual afflatus, 1 Cor. xiv. 3. 31), on exhortation: he that [8] giveth (or distributes to the church's stock), let him do it with

[3] Τῇ ἀνακαινώσει τοῦ νοὸς ὑμῶν, By the renewal of your mind.] The whole new creature doth consist in the renewal of the mind, the will, the affections, and actions of men (1 Thess. v. 23), but because this renewal doth begin with the change of mind, discerning and approving "what is acceptable to the Lord," and upon that follows the choice of what is so by the will, and the inclination of the affections to what the mind doth thus approve of, and the regulation of our outward actions is according to what we thus approve, choose, and affect; this "renewal of the mind" is put for the renovation of the whole man, and we are said to be "renewed in the spirit of our mind," and to "put on the new man," Eph. iv. 23, 24, "which is renewed εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν, in knowledge, according to the image of him that created him," Col. iii. 10.

[4] Τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸ ἀγαθὸν καὶ εὐάρεστον καὶ τέλειον, The good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.] The ritual precepts of the law had no internal goodness in them antecedent to the command; and so God himself says of them, "I gave them statutes which were not good," Ezek. xx. 25, and in opposition to their costly sacrifices and burnt-offerings, saith, "He hath shown thee, O man, what is good, and what the Lord requireth of thee, even to do justice, and love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God," Micah vi. 8. They were not pleasing to him in themselves, Ps. li. 14, Heb. x. 8, but he declareth his delight in justice and mercy, Jer. xxii. 16, and the design of the apostle in the whole Epistle to the Hebrews, is to prove the imperfection of the sacrifices, and of the old covenant, and therefore the necessity of a better sacrifice, and a new and better covenant; and so in opposition to these ritual injunctions, he may here style the gospel institution, the "good, and acceptable, and the perfect will of God."

[5] Ver. 3. Μέτρον πίστεως, The measure of faith.] Here the Greek scholiasts agree in the exposition of these words, that by "the measure of faith," we are to understand the measure of gifts proceeding from this miraculous faith which was required to the exercise of them, τοῦ γὰρ χαρίσματος αἴτιον ἡ πίστις, "for faith is the cause of these gifts," saith Chrysostom; and when they found this faith raised in them, they exercised them; they being given, saith Theodoret, "according to the measure of their faith." This faith enabled them to "remove mountains," 1 Cor. xiii. 2, to "heal the sick," James v. 15, to cast out devils," Matt. xvii. 20; and hence Peter exhorts them who had received these gifts to "minister them ὡς ἐκ ἰσχύος ἧς χορηγεῖ ὁ Θεός, as from the ability and strength of faith which God giveth," 1 Pet. iv. 11; and this is elsewhere styled "the measure of the gift of Christ," Eph. iv. 7. This they did, saith Origen,* ἐπὶ τὴν πίστιν ταύτην, "by this faith," καθὼς εἷς ἕκαστος αὐτῶν τὴν ἀφορμὴν εἴληφε παρ' αὐτοῦ, "as every one received the gift from Christ," saith Irenaus.† This phrase occurs twice in Maimonides,‡ where he saith, "God declared he would try the Jews with false prophets, to know, mensuram fidei vestræ in veritate legis, the measure of their faith in the law;" et ad mensuram fidei vestræ in lucem producendum num firmiter et constanter persistatis in eâ: whence we learn that the strength and firmness of faith is the measure of it.

[6] Ver. 6. Κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν τῆς πίστεως, According to the proportion of faith.] That is, say some, according to those principles of faith and good life, which are known among you; but surely they who prophesied by a spiritual gift, could not do otherwise; for no man can by the Holy Spirit be excited to contradict the doctrine or precepts of Christianity; others, let him do it according to the measure of the miraculous faith imparted to him, enabling him now to reveal mysteries, now to foretell things, now to disclose the secrets of men, according as God, upon his faith, shall grant ability to him to do it. And therefore Chrysostom,* Œcumenius, and Theophylact say, that though this was a gift, yet "it flowed in upon a man according as by his faith he made himself a vessel fit to receive the gift of prophecy." And this seemeth to be the better exposition, not only because it hath the suffrage of the ancient expositors, but because it answers to "the measure of faith" mentioned ver. 3; for ἀναλογία, saith Origen here, is not ratio, as the Latins render it, but mensura competens, "a competent measure," and κατ' ἀναλογίαν in Hesychius is κατὰ τὸ μέτρον, "according to the measure;" and it agrees best with the phrase of Peter, to exercise these gifts according to the ability that God hath given them, and to be content with that, though others may enjoy it in higher measures.

[7] Ver. 7. Διακονία, Ministry.] This charisma being reckoned here before that of teaching or exhortation, I think it best to interpret it of the office of the evangelist, ranked before that of the pastor and teacher, Eph. iv. 11, and immediately after that of the prophets, as here, rather than to interpret it of the office of a deacon; all these four offices, of apostle, prophet, evangelist, and teacher, being designed, saith the apostle there, ver. 12, εἰς ἔργον διακονίας, "for the work of the ministry." Hence Paul writes thus to Timothy, "Do the work of an evangelist, fulfil τὴν διακονίαν σου, thy ministry," 2 Tim. iv. 5, and of Mark, the evangelist, he saith, "Bring Mark with thee, for he is profitable to me, εἰς διακονίαν, to the ministry;" i. e. to be sent to preach the gospel, or visit the churches where I cannot come (ver. 11); and in this sense saith Peter, εἴ τις διακονεῖ, "If any man ministers, let him do it as of the ability that God giveth," not as of the charity of others, which was the proper office of the deacon. Of the teachers, see note on 1 Cor. xii. 28, Eph. iv. 4, Acts vi. 4, xiii. 1, xx. 24, 2 Cor. vi. 3, Col. iv. 17.

[8] Ver. 8. Ὁ μεταδιδούς, He that giveth, and he that showeth mercy.] These two expressions seem to denote the same persons who are called "helps," 1 Cor. xii. 28 (see the note there). "He that ruleth," may be the same with those who are there styled "governments," and elsewhere προεστῶτες, or προϊστάμενοι, 1 Thess. v. 12, 1 Tim. iii. 4, v. 17, or, ὁ μετα-διδοὺς here may signify him that is moved by an afflatus to give to the church's stock; for so the word is used in Job, saying, ὀρφανῷ μετέδωκα, "I have given of my meat to the orphan," xxxi. 17; Prov. xi. 26, "A blessing shall be on the head τοῦ μεταδιδόντος, of him that giveth." So Luke iii. 11, "He that hath two coats, μεταδότω, let him give to him that hath none;" Eph. iv. 28, "Let him work with his hands, that he may have μεταδιδόναι, to give to him that needs;" and then the προεστῶς will be the person set over this stock to manage it aright; for as the Jews had in every city viros notos et fideles, "men of note for their fidelity," who were constituted to be collectors and distributors of their alms to the poor; so say the apostles, "Look you out ἄνδρας μαρτυρουμένους, seven men of honest report, οὓς καταστήσωμεν, whom we will appoint over this business," Acts vi. 3, and these are styled προστάται and πρόξενοι, and by Eustathius are said προΐστασθαι τῶν ξένων, "to preside over strangers" (see Beza in Rom. xvi. 2). So Origen on the place, Qui tribuit, et præest indigentibus; and Theophylact, προΐστασθαι δὲ ἐστὶ τὸ βοηθεῖν, καὶ διὰ ῥημάτων, καὶ διὰ τοῦ σώματος, "To preside is to help both with words and deeds" (see the note on 1 Cor. xii. 28). This in after ages was made the work of the bishop, but in the first ages of the church was the work of the deacon.

[9] Ver. 11. Τῷ Κυρίῳ δουλεύοντες, Serving the Lord.] So the Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic versions, and all the Greek scholiasts read. The other reading, τῷ καιρῷ δουλεύοντες, "serving the time," mentioned by Ambrose, St. Jerome, and Ruffinus, seems to have had its rise from the abbreviation of the word in MSS., they reading ΚΩ· though it hath a good sense thus, Tempori servite, rebus præsentibus vos accommodantes; et si quid inciderit incommodorum, vel declinantes si liceat commodè, vel tolerantes: see Eph. v. 26, Col. iv. 5 (see Examen Millii here).

[10] Ver. 13. Ταῖς χρείαις τῶν ἁγίων κοινωνοῦντες.] So read all the Greek scholia, Basil, tom. ii. p. 474, the Vulgar, and all the other ancient versions. And wherein Dr. Mills contends the true reading is ταῖς μνείαις τῶν ἁγίων, see this abundantly confuted in the examination of him upon this place.

[11] Ver. 17. Τὰ καλὰ, Honourable.] That there be actions, which, according to the voice of nature, and antecedently to any positive commands, are good and evil, honourable and praiseworthy, or matter of dishonour, or dispraise, in the general opinion of the world; and that these actions are τὰ καλὰ, "honourable before men," as well as "in the sight of God" (2 Cor. viii. 21), this epistle doth abundantly demonstrate; for the apostle in the first chapter having mentioned all the unrighteousness and impure actions of the heathen world, he adds, that the heathens knew from the consideration of the righteousness of God, that "they who did such things were worthy of death," ver. 32. In the second chapter he informs us, that the gentiles having not a written law, and notwithstanding "doing by nature the thing contained in the moral law, show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness to it, and their thoughts accusing or else excusing one another," ver. 14, 15; that the exercise of righteousness and peace renders us not only "acceptable to God," but also "approved of men" (xiv. 17). Accordingly the wise man saith that "by observing mercy and truth we shall προιοεῖν καλὰ, provide things honourable in the sight of God and men" (Prov. iii. 3, 4).

[12] Ver. 19. Avenge not yourselves.] When Phocion was condemned to die by the Athenians, some of his friends desired him to leave some precept to his son, how he should demean himself: his command therefore to him was μηδὲν Ἀθηναίοις μνησικακεῖν, "not to remember the injuries the Athenians had done him;" and for this, saith Ælian, every wise man must ὑπερθαυμάζειν τὸν ἄνδρα, "very much admire the man" (Var. Hist. lib. xii. cap. 49).

[13] Δότε τόπον τῇ ὀργῇ, Give place unto wrath.] i. e. Refer it to the punishment of God, συγχωρήσαν αὐτῷ ἐπεξελθεῖν, τοῦτο γάρ ἐστι, δότε τόπον τῇ ὀργῇ, "Suffer him to come in with his wrath upon those who are your enemies, and persecute you for his sake; for this is the import of these words, Give place unto wrath." So Chrysostom, Œcumenius, Theophylact. And this exposition is confirmed by the ensuing reason, "For vengeance is mine, I will repay it;" and from the occasion of those words, Deut. xxxii. 35, they being spoken for the comfort of God's people, whose cause he will plead, and for whose sakes he will repent of the evil he brought upon them, ver. 36.

[14] Ver. 20. Ἄνθρακας πυρὸς σωρεύσεις ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐτοῦ, Thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head.] I know that many good interpreters conceive here is an allusion to artificers that melt lead, or other metals, by heaping coals of fire upon them, and so imagine that the import of these words is this, Thou shalt melt him down, or work him, by this obliging kindness, into good affection towards thee: but I believe the sense is rather this, That if he persevere in his enmity to, his persecution of thee, and perverseness towards thee after these kind offices, the event, though not sought by thee, will be this; thou by thy patience shalt engage the thou shalt heap coals of fire (the divine vengeance) on his head.

21 Be not [15] overcome of evil (let it not prevail upon thee to be impatient under or avenge it), but overcome evil with good.

wrath of God to fall upon him, and to maintain thy cause against him; and so shalt be more certainly and happily delivered from his malice, than by avenging thyself thou wouldest be. So Prov. xx. 22, "Say not thou, I will recompense evil, but wait on the Lord, and he shall save thee." For,

First, This suits best with the connexion of this with the foregoing verse by the particle, "Therefore, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place to the wrath" of God, to fall upon your enemies, or persecutors, seeing he "will repay vengeance" to them. Therefore, let not their enmity hinder you from being kind to them; for that kindness, if it do not mollify them, will cause the wrath of God to wax hot against them.

Secondly, Because the words are plainly taken from Prov. xxv. 21, where they are exactly to be found; where, saith Grotius, apparet de pœnâ divinâ agi, "it is evident the wise man speaks of the divine vengeance." And this is the continual import of the phrase in the Old Testament, where only it occurs, and where it still signifies the wrath and indignation of the Lord. So Ps. cxl. 9, 10, "As for the head of them that compass me about, let the mischief of their own lips cover them, let ἄνθρακες πυρός, coals of fire fall upon them." So Isa. xlvii. 14, "They shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flames, ὅτι ἔχεις ἄνθρακας πυρὸς καθίσαι ἐπ' αὐτούς, for thou hast coals of fire to cause to sit upon them." So Ezek. x. 2, God commands the angel to fill his hand, ἀνθράκων πυρός, "with coals of fire," and to scatter them over the city to burn the city with them. And 2 Esdr. xvi. 53, "Let not the sinner say he hath not sinned, for God shall heap coals of fire upon his head, who saith before the Lord God, and his glory, he hath not sinned" (see the like saying in Stob. Serm. 82, p. 477).

CHAPTER XIII.

1 Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers (or supreme authority placed over them). For there is no [1] power but of God (the fountain of it): the powers that be are ordained of God.

2 Whosoever therefore [2] resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist (the ordinance of God) [3] shall receive to themselves damnation (Gr. judgment).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

[1] Ver. 1. Οὐ γάρ ἐστιν ἐξουσία εἰ μὴ ἀπὸ Θεοῦ, There is no power but of God.] That this may be rightly understood, let it be noted, (1.) That God doth not now, as in the case of Saul and David, by himself appoint and nominate the person who shall sway the sceptre in any nation of the world. The Roman emperors, the powers then in being when Paul writ this epistle, had no such appointment, but were elected by the Roman armies, or chosen and confirmed by the senate; whence it appears, that an immediate appointment, or designation of the person by God, cannot be necessary to render any prince God's ordinance.

(2.) By virtue of God's general appointment or ordinance, whether in the fifth commandment, or by a law of nature, requiring that all nations should have some government placed over them, no individual person can claim a right to be the "higher power" in any nation, more than others; nor are the people by it tied to yield obedience to this man more rather than to that. This therefore cannot be sufficient to make a man the individual person who is God's ordinance, in reference to such a nation. It remains, therefore,

(3.) That this authority be conveyed to this or that individual person or family by compact, consent, or choice of the persons governed, that such a person or family shall have the supreme authority in such a nation. It therefore must be such a choice, consent, or contract, that renders any person the ordinance of God to such a nation: and this is what men call "a legal right," or title to the crown; that is, a title by the laws and constitutions of the land.

But then, as mutual consent and contract make two persons man and wife, and yet matrimony is God's ordinance, and the power of man over the wife, and of the wife over the body of the husband, is from God: and as among us, one becomes a master, another a servant, by consent and covenant, and yet the master hath from God authority over his servant; so here, the individual person becomes the higher power, by the consent, the choice, or contract, original or actual, of the community; but yet the power he exercises in that station is of God, the fountain of all power; and he acts in that station, not as the minister of man, but of God.

[2] Ver. 2. Ὁ ἀντιτασσόμενος τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ, Whosoever resisteth the power.] Origen* having cited this and the preceding verse in his Dissertation against Celsus, confesses it is a place "capable of much disquisition, by reason of such princes as govern cruelly and tyrannically, or who by reason of their power fall into effeminacy and carnal pleasures;" referring us to his comment on that place for the farther explication of the words. Now there he saith,* "This is not to be understood of persecuting powers, for in such cases that of the apostle takes place, We must obey God rather than man, but of those powers, which are not a terror to good works, but to the evil:" and it is a contradiction to the holiness, justice, and goodness of God, to say that he hath given princes any power to oppress, rob, spoil, murder, or to do any injury to their subjects. They cannot purely upon this account, that they are "the ordinance of God," have any power or authority to do evil to them; and so resisting, i. e. not being subject or obedient to them in any such thing, cannot be that resisting of God's ordinance to which the penalty is here annexed. Now this is the non-resistance of which the Greek commentators speak, even the non-performance of subjection and obedience to their commands; and so the coherence seems to require, which saith, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers, for whosoever doth resist them (by not being subject) resisteth the ordinance of God:" moreover, they only are "the ordinances of God" as they are "the ministers of God," ver. 3, 4; now they are only "the ministers of God for good, for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well," ver. 4. And, thirdly, the subjection here required, to which the resistance is opposed, is a subjection due to them, "not only for wrath, but for conscience' sake;" but we cannot be obliged, from conscience towards God, to be subject to them in those things which they have no authority from God to require, and for refusal of obedience to which we have God's authority.

They who interpret this of violent resistance by force of arms, speak the truth, but not the whole truth, that being not the only resistance here forbidden. For, as Dr. Falkner observes, ἀντιτάσσεσθαι, which we translate to resist, includes all practising out of a spirit of averseness, opposition, and contradiction, and whatsoever is contrary to ὑποτάσσεσθαι, "the being subject," ver. 1. 5 (see Acts, xiii. 8, xviii. 6).

[3] Ἑαυτοῖς κρίμα λήψονται, Shall receive judgment to them-

* Πολλῆς ζητήσεως οὔσης κατὰ τὸν τόπον, διὰ τοὺς ὠμότερον καὶ τυραννικώτερον ἄρξαντας, ἢ τοὺς ἐκ τοῦ ἄρχειν ἐπὶ θρύψιν, καὶ τρυφὴν ἐξοκέλλοντας. Lib. viii. p. 421.

* Non hic de illis potestatibus dicit quæ persecutiones inferunt fidei, ibi enim dicendum est, Oportet Deo obtemperare magis quam hominibus, sed de istis potestatibus dicit, quæ non sunt timori boni operis sed mali.

3 For rulers (if they act by the authority of God, and according to law,) are not a terror to good works (i. e. such as the light of nature pronounceth good), but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power (that it will do thee any harm)? do (then) that which is good, and thou shalt (rather) have praise of the same:

4 For he is (by his institution) the minister of God to thee for good (if thou art a doer of what is good). But if thou do that which is evil, (thou hast cause to) be afraid; for he beareth not the sword (of justice) in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath (Gr. for wrath) upon him that doeth evil.

5 Wherefore ye must needs (Gr. ye ought to) be subject (to this minister of God), not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake.

6 For [4] for this cause pay ye tribute also (to them): for (that) they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing (the executing judgment between man and man, to preserve every man in his right, and to punish the wrong doer).

7 [5] Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom (i. e. all legal impositions); fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour (is due).

8 Owe no man any thing (which justice obligeth you to render him), but (be especially concerned) to love one [6] another (which love, if ye observe its precepts, will preserve you from doing any evil or injustice to selves.] i. e. They shall be sentenced, punished, and condemned for it by the magistrate, who is a terror to all evil works. So the word κρίμα signifies in these words, "Fearest not thou God, seeing thou art ἐν αὐτῷ κρίματι, under the same sentence of condemnation" by the magistrates? (Luke xxiii. 40, see note on v. 16.) And to this sense the connexion inclines, "He shall receive sentence or punishment (from the rulers), for rulers are a terror to evil works; if therefore thou doest evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain, but is an avenger of wrath." Or, if he escape the hand of the magistrate, he shall be punished by that God whose minister and ordinance the power he resisteth is; this follows from the obligation to be subject, not only out of wrath, but also from conscience towards God; but hence it does not follow that he must be damned, as that imports his being sentenced by God to eternal torments; it follows not from the word κρίμα, seeing that in its literal import signifies judgment, and no more, and sometimes is applied to human judgments; not from the obligation to be subject out of conscience, for then all men must be damned who neglect what they, in conscience towards God, stand bound to do, or do what they in conscience are obliged not to do, and then, woe be to them who through weakness or prejudice mistake their duty, or are ignorant of it, and therefore do neglect it, or transgress against it. Seeing then the resister of God's ordinance here is not only the wilful rebel, but he who also is not subject and obedient to the commands of lawful authority, if the punishment of this sin, without exception, be eternal torments, all must be sentenced to them who, out of ignorance and weakness, misunderstanding or prejudice, refuse in any lawful matter to yield obedience to the commands of their superiors, and so not only sins of wilfulness, but sins of ignorance and weakness, must be damnable.

Now according to this double notion of resistance, let it be noted,

First, That the resistance which consists in non-subjection, or a refusal to yield actual obedience to the law of the superior, can only be allowed when the matter of the law is sinful, and so forbidden by the higher power, not when it is judged inexpedient or unprofitable only; for of this subjects are not to judge, but the lawgiver only, in that they lawfully may, and therefore, to avoid scandal and punishment, and from respect to him who is God's vicegerent, ought to obey, even as servants ought to obey their froward masters (1 Pet. ii. 18), and children their parents in all lawful things (Col. iii. 20), not disputing their authority in such matters, and this from conscience towards God.

Secondly, That no resistance of the higher powers by force of arms, or violence, can be allowed purely on the account of religion; for, if so, we could not be obliged to "suffer wrong" in such cases "from conscience towards God," as the apostle saith we are, 1 Pet. ii. 19, or from the example of our Lord, ver. 21. 24, because the sufferings which God hath not obliged us to undergo, we cannot undergo "from conscience towards God."

Thirdly, That no violent resistance, or no resistance of the higher powers by force, can be allowed to any who have not the power of the sword, and who are no "avengers of wrath;" for he that thus useth it, plainly "takes the sword" without authority from him to whom belongeth vengeance, and the power of life and death originally, and so without authority from him to whom this power of the sword originally belongs; and therefore, by our Saviour's aphorism, deserves to perish by it (Matt. xxvi. 52). Hence therefore it must follow,

1. That in absolute governments there is no power of lifting up the sword against the higher powers, because there is none can claim a share in the government, and so none can have any power of the sword, or right to be "an avenger of evil," but the absolute power.

2. That in mixed governments, if any persons or states can claim the power, it must be either, (1.) upon compact that such persons shall have power to defend their laws; or, (2.) by virtue of that rule of Grotius,* that "where a people hath conferred, not an absolute power, but a government according to the law, they must be supposed to have reserved to themselves a power necessary to preserve their laws." Or else by some act done by the superior which is a virtual abdication, or a renunciation of his government; in all which cases we can have no direction from the words of the apostle, who in general commands subjection to the higher powers, but declares not how far any man is so, or when he ceaseth to be so.

[4] Ver. 6. Διὰ τοῦτο γὰρ καὶ φόρους τελεῖτε, For this cause pay ye tribute also.] Hence it appears, that paying tribute to, is an acknowledgment of the right of government in him to whom we pay it, it being payable only on this account, "because he is the minister of God," &c. and rendered to Cæsar because it is Cæsar's; i. e. because it doth belong to him as being Cæsar, or the power God hath set over us.

[5] Ver. 7. Ἀπόδοτε οὖν πᾶσι τὰς ὀφειλάς, Render to all their dues.] It is observable, that all that is said here and Tit. iii. 1, 1 Pet. ii. 11, 12, seems plainly to relate to those false doctrines and opinions which had obtained among the Jews, and were destructive to all government, and which all Christians therefore were concerned to show their freedom from, and opposition to, that so they might stop the mouths of those heathens who, looking upon Christians as the offspring of the Jews, were apt to charge them with the same principles of opposition to all heathen governments. Now their principles are these:

First, That being the people of God, God alone was to be owned as their lord and governor, in opposition to all earthly governors; at least in opposition to all governors which were not of their own nation, and by him immediately chosen, and ruling by his laws. See this fully proved, note on 1 Pet. ii. 16.

Secondly, As a consequent of this, they refused to pay tribute to Cæsar, crying out to Agrippa,† τὰ τέλη ἀναιρεῖν, "to take away their tributes;" looking upon them as a sign of subjection, which they ought not to submit to."

your brother): for he that (truly) loveth another hath fulfilled the law (relating to him).

9 For this (that which the law forbiddeth in these words), Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment (of the law relating to thy neighbour), it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself (i. e. with the like love thou bearest to thyself, though not with love equal to it. See note on Matt. xxii. 39, 40.

10 He that is acted by) Love[7] worketh no ill to his neighbour (which is the thing required in these negative precepts): therefore [8] love is the fulfilling of the law.

11 And that (Gr. this) (exhortation to obey authority, and walk in fervent charity towards all men, I recommend to you now, is very seasonable), knowing the time, that now it is high time (for all) to [9] awake out of sleep: for now is our [10] salvation (or, the salvation of the gentiles) nearer than when we (first) believed.

12 [11] The night (of heathen ignorance, Acts xvii. 31) is far spent, [12] the day (of grace and salvation to them) is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light.

13 Let us walk [13] honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in [14] chambering and wantonness (1 Pet. iv. 3), not in strife and envying (things inconsistent with that Christian charity which is the glory of our profession).

14 But [15] put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.

πλησίον, "his neighbour," shows that every man is the Christian's neighbour.

[7] Ver. 10. Κακὸν οὐκ ἐργάζεται, Worketh no evil.] Not that the law is exactly fulfilled by doing no evil to our neighbour, but because, in Christ's interpretation, the neglect of doing any good we are able, and have opportunity to do for him, is doing evil, Mark iii. 4. Here therefore is a meiosis, for "charity is" also "kind," 1 Cor. xiii. 4, and engageth us "by love to serve another," Gal. v. 13, 14.

[8] Πλήρωμα οὖν νόμου ἡ ἀγάπη, Love therefore is the fulfilling of the law.] The apostle plainly here discourseth of the fulfilling of the law as it relateth to our neighbour; but, as Esthius here notes, love is also the fulfilling of it as it respects our duty to God; for he that loves his neighbour aright, loves him for God's sake, and in obedience to him, and so must principally love God: he also "loves his neighbour as himself:" now no man truly loves himself who loves not him above all things who is his chief good, and in loving whom thus his happiness consists (see Matt. xxii. 37).

[9] Ver. 11. Ἐξ ὕπνου ἐγερθῆναι, To awake out of sleep,] Is a phrase importing two things: (1.) The conversion of heathens to Christianity, as in that call to them mentioned Eph. iv. 14, "Wherefore he saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life," or shine upon thee. (2.) Our care to walk as becometh converts, with true Christian vigilance; as when the apostle saith to the Corinthians, "Awake to righteousness, and sin not," 1 Cor. xv. 34, and to the Thessalonians thus, "Let us not sleep, as do others," 1 Thess. v. 6, 7.

[10] Νῦν γὰρ ἐγγύτερον ἡμῶν ἡ σωτηρία, For now is our salvation nearer.] i. e. Say some, the deliverance of you Christians from the persecution of the Jews, stirring up the heathens against you. And I believe this passage hath a relation to the destruction of the Jewish nation, and the dissolution of that church, and of the worship confined to the temple; but chiefly upon this account, that then was the time when the salvation of the gentiles was to be more fully and gloriously accomplished, that being the time when God would show forth all his wrath upon the unbelieving Jews, and crucifiers of our Lord, and their Messiah, and upon that account "the vessels of his wrath" (Rom. ix. 22). Hence the apostle exhorteth the believing Jews to constancy in the faith, "forasmuch as they saw this day approaching" (Heb. x. 25): and they being then, saving a little remnant, entirely rejected, and cut off from being any more the church of God, the gentiles were to be more fully called and owned as his church. The apostle had before discoursed of this matter, telling the Romans, that "by their rejection and fall came, σωτηρία, salvation to the gentiles," xi. 11, that their fall would be "the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the gentiles," ver. 12; and, ver. 13. 15, "I speak," saith he, "to you gentiles," that their rejection will be "the reconciling of the world." And of this salvation of the gentiles he saith, "It is now nearer than when they first believed," the time of the utter rejection of the Jews drawing nigh; and therefore he advised them, especially now at this season, to give no obstruction to their conversion, and lay no obstacle in their way, by any disobedience against their superiors; but by their submission "to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake," to put to silence all the objections of ignorant men against them, as disturbers of government; and that they would diligently avoid all works of darkness, that they who "spoke of them as evil-doers, might, by their good works which they beheld, (be induced to) glorify God in the day of their visitation" (1 Pet. ii. 12), and to avoid all strife and envy, and to walk in love, as being that which rendered them so amiable in the eyes of the very heathens.

[11] Ver. 12. Ἡ νὺξ προέκοψεν, The night is far spent.] Νύκτα καλεῖ τὴν ἀγνοίας καιρόν, "He calls the night the time of the ignorance of the gentiles," saith Theodoret; and so the day must be the appearance of the gospel light to them: and this is very suitable to the language of the holy scripture, which speaketh of the gentiles thus, "Ye were sometimes darkness, but now ye are light in the Lord," Eph. v. 8, and as men darkened, and "blinded in their minds," Eph. iv. 18, and "whose foolish hearts were darkened," Rom. i. 20. In the Old Testament they are still represented as men who "sat in darkness, and in the shadow of death," Isa. ix. 1, and when Christ was sent to be "a light to the gentiles," he is said to be sent "to give light to them that sat in darkness," Luke i. 78, 79. And when Paul was sent to convert them, he is said to be sent "to turn them from darkness to light," Acts xxvi. 18. And when Peter mentions their conversion, he tells them, "God had called them from darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Pet. ii. 9.

[12] Ἡ δὲ ἡμέρα ἤγγικεν, And the day is at hand.] i. e. The day of salvation, 2 Cor. vi. 8, whence they to whom this salvation was come, by receiving this gospel light, are said to be τῆς ἡμέρας, "men of the day," and υἱοὶ τῆς ἡμέρας, "children of the day," 1 Thess. v. 5. 8, and bid here "to walk honestly as in the day."

[13] Ver. 13. Εὐσχημόνως, Honestly.] Decently, honourably, as becometh Christians, both towards our governors, having our conversation καλὴν, "honourable," and decorous among the gentiles, that they, "beholding our good works, may glorify God," that is, may own him whom the Christians worship as a good and holy God, and so be gained to the faith.

[15] Ver. 14. Ἐνδύσασθε τὸν Χριστὸν, Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ.] i. e. Be conformable to his doctrine and holy life. So Chrysostom saith it was a common phrase, ὁ δεῖνα τὸν δεῖνα ἐνέδύσατο, "Such a one hath put on such a one;" that is, he is an imitator of him: so, to "put on the new man," is to walk as new men in newness of life and conversation, Eph. iv. 24, "in holiness and righteousness, after the image of him that hath created us" anew, Col. iii. 10.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 (Now to prevent these strifes and envyings,)Him that is weak in the faith (and so not rightly grounded in it) receive ye (into Christian communion), but not to [1] doubtful disputations (not respecting the difference in their thoughts and reasonings from yours).

2 For (such difference of conceptions there is among the Jewish and gentile Christians, that) one (i. e. the gentile Christian) believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is [2] weak, (Gr. but the weak, i. e. the Jewish convert, who is mistaken in, and doth not rightly understand his Christian liberty, abstaineth from all meats, as fearing they may pollute him, and so) eateth (only) [3] herbs.

3 Let not him that (suitably to this belief) eateth (all kinds of meat) despise him that (through weakness) eateth not (of any); and let not him which eateth not judge (and condemn) him that eateth (as unclean for not observing these distinctions between meats clean and unclean by the law, or according to their traditions, by being offered to idols, or polluted by the unclean): for [4] God hath received him.

4 (Since therefore God hath received and owned him

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIV.

[1] Ver. 1. Μὴ εἰς διακρίσεις διαλογισμῶν, Not to doubtful disputations.] Not discriminating them by their inward thoughts or reasonings, or rejecting any from communion upon that account, because they are weak in judgment; this sense the antithesis seems to require, and this sense will be confirmed from our note on ver. 23, and from a like passage of James, "If you say to the man in gay clothing, Sit thou here honourably, and to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit down at my footstool, οὐ διεκρίθητε ἐν ἑαυτοῖς; do you not put a difference or a discrimination among yourselves, and are become judges, διαλογισμῶν πονηρῶν, of evil reasonings."

[2] Ver. 2. Ὁ δὲ ἀσθενῶν, But the weak.] I have observed, note on v. 6, 1 Cor. viii. 13, that "the weak" person is not the man of a doubting conscience, about a thing indifferent, but of an erroneous conscience, about a thing unlawful; this is plain, 1 Cor. viii. 7, from these words, "Some with conscience of the idol to this hour eat it as a thing offered to an idol, and their conscience being weak is defiled." Now to eat "with conscience of the idol," must be to eat with an erroneous conscience; and the thing is as plain here from ver. 14, which shows that the weak person "esteemeth that unclean, which in itself was not so," and therefore acted from an erroneous conscience. I have observed there also, that ὁ ἀσθενὴς, "the weak," and ἀσθενεῖν, "to be weak," is to fall and stumble; and here it also signifieth one that stumbleth at some doctrine of Christianity, viz. at that of Christian liberty from Jewish observances, and who is scandalized at it, or made to fall by the use of that liberty by others, as is evident also from these words, ver. 21, "It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor to do any other thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak." And ver. 13, "Let us not therefore judge one another any more, but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall (Gr. a scandal) in his brother's way."

[3] Λάχανα ἐσθίει, Eateth herbs.] Why herbs only? Chrysostom thinks it was διὰ τὸ μὴ γίνεσθαι δῆλον, "that it might not appear whether they did it out of observance of the Jewish law, or only out of temperance;" but this the apostle contradicts, by saying, not that he did this, being cautious, but he did it, "being weak;" and (ver. 14) that he did it, esteeming that which he abstaineth from as unclean: and this is supposed as a thing evident throughout this chapter, that he abstained out of conscience from eating that which he esteemed unlawful. Others say, the word λάχανα, "herbs," is taken synecdochically, "for all sorts of meat allowed by the law;" but then they ought in reason to show us some example, or instance, where the word λάχανα is used in this sense. Let it be therefore noted, (1.) That the Essenes,* among the Jews, abstained from all flesh, "using as victuals, with great delight, green herbs, and the fruit of trees:" and this they did, as judging flesh, μὴ κατὰ φύσιν, "not to be natural food," as there it follows. Philo saith,† they had τράπεζαν καθαρὰν τῶν ἐναίμων, "a table pure from any thing that had blood in it, as being an incentive to concupiscence, and did only eat bread and salt, and hyssop" (see note no Col. ii. 1). Here then is one instance of them, who "being weak, did eat herbs." Moreover, Josephus saith of some priests of his acquaintance, sent bound to Rome from Judea, for some little crime, that *"they were good men, who in their afflictions forgot not their piety to God, nourishing themselves there with figs and nuts;" yea, their superstition would not permit them to use the oil of heathens,† as being not clean, and so such as they could not use the meats of gentiles, much less things offered to idols (as sometimes all the meat sold in the shambles was), without transgressing their own institutions and traditions. They therefore might eat herbs, either that they might avoid eating things sold in the shambles, which had been offered to idols, and which were therefore deemed κοινὰ "common or unclean," by the whole Jewish nation;‡ or to avoid the eating things which they esteemed polluted by the gentiles, as the Jewish priests mentioned by Josephus did. Moreover, the person who "believeth he may eat all things," here, is so like the person who saith "All things are lawful for me," 1 Cor. x. 23, where the apostle is speaking of things offered to idols, and the arguments, many of them, are so apparently in sense the same here, and 1 Cor. viii. and ch. x., that I can see no reason wholly to exclude this sense.

[4] Ver. 3. Ὁ Θεὸς γὰρ αὐτὸν προσελάβετο, For God hath received him.] This is St. Peter's argument, Acts xv. 9, "God put no difference betwixt us (Jews) and them, purifying their hearts by faith," and so making them clean in his sight, though they were not circumcised, nor abstained from those meats we count unclean; he therefore received them without requiring this of them, and therefore so should we. Note here, that though God testified his reception of them by a visible and miraculous dispensation of the gift of tongues and prophecy; yet doth not the apostle say, God hath thus testified his reception of them, but only, "He hath received them," i. e. into communion with him, viz. by giving them that Spirit which is the medium of our union to, and communion with him. Note also, that these words prove against Esthius, that the apostle here speaks not of the Jews, but of the gentiles, whom the Jews always deemed unclean, till they became proselytes to their law, and so obliged to observe these differences between meats (see note on 1 Cor. vii. 14); and therefore thought God would not receive them, whilst they did not observe this law. Moreover, when the apostle saith, ver. 2, "Another believeth he may eat all things:" is this other the Jew? then the strong Jew believed not only that he might eat swine's flesh, but even "things offered to idols," which yet Esthius denies, ver. 1, the reason is, because both these must be included in quibuslibet cibis, all kinds of meat. But if it be the gentile, as is far more probable, then the apostle speaks here of the gentiles. Again, when the same apostle saith, "Another esteemeth every day alike," does he mean the Jews? did the Jew think the obligation to observe the sabbath was abolished? and if he meant the gentile, the apostle must here speak of them. But, saith Esthius, this doctrine could not extend to the gentile, to whom it was not lawful to comply with the legal observances, no, not for the sake of the infirm Jews. To this I answer, (1.) That the apostle says nothing in this whole chapter which doth oblige him so to do, but only not to judge, not to exclude from communion, those Jews that did so, and not to eat of those meats, when that would minister scandal to the Jews; and doth he not prescribe the same rule to the gentile, in the case of this scandal, in these words, "But if any man say unto thee, This is offered to idols, eat not for his sake that showeth it, and for conscience' sake?" 1 Cor. x. 28. (2.) Paul, who had the same persuasion, that the law was not binding to him, as any gentile could have, yet "to the Jew became as a Jew, that he might gain the Jew;" why therefore might he not permit the strong gentile so to do, especially when this was not done out of respect to the law of Moses, but purely to the higher law of charity!

[5] Ver. 4. Σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ κρίνων ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην; Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?] Some interpret these words thus: We are not to judge another man's servant for doing what his own master alloweth or permitteth. But this is adding to the text; for the apostle doth not say, Who art thou that judgest another man's servant wrongfully, or condemnest in him what God allows? nay, he plainly supposeth him weak and erroneous, and yet allows not any condemning and rejecting him, and "excluding him," saith Dr. Hammond, "out of the church," because God hath received him to be his servant.

[6] Σταθήσεται, He shall be established.] The apostle seems plainly here to speak of the weak Jew, who, through the error of his judgment, might be apt to stumble at the liberty which the strong Christian used, and which the Christian doctrine taught that Christ had purchased for him also, as thinking both himself and others obliged to observe the law of Moses; and of him he saith, He is now indeed weak, but he shall be established, i. e. the time will come, when, by the destruction of the Jewish temple, to which their service was annexed, and in which alone a great part of their ceremonial worship was to be performed, they should be better satisfied of the cessation of their obligation to obey those precepts. Thus also he saith, Phil. iii. 15, "As many as are τέλειοι, fully instructed in the Christian liberty, let them mind this thing," viz. that it is only "the circumcision of the Spirit" that God now regardeth (ver. 3), and "if any be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you," i. e. he will in his due time convince them of this truth (see the note there). Note also, that the effusion of the Spirit on the Jews, though circumcised and zealous for the observation of the law, was an argument that God also had received the believing Jew to his favour, notwithstanding his weakness of judgment in these matters.

[7] Δυνατὸς γάρ ἐστιν ὁ Θεὸς στῆσαι αὐτόν, For God is able to make him stand.] The apostle elsewhere argues from God's power to his will; so xi. 23, "If they abide not in unbelief they shall be grafted in, for God is able to graff them in again;" xvi. 25, "To him that is able to confirm you;" 2 Cor. ix. 6. 8, "He that soweth liberally shall reap liberally; for God is able to make all grace abound towards you;" Heb. ii. 18, "He is able to succour them that are tempted." And this argument is always good, where we put no obstruction to his will, by rendering ourselves unworthy of his illuminations and his favours; he being otherwise always as ready as he is able to do what he sees needful and truly conducing to our spiritual good.

[8] Ver. 5. Ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ νοῒ πληροφορείσθω, Let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind.] The Greek and Latin fathers give this sense of these words: In matters of this nature, touching the observation of a day, required by Moses, to the Lord, or not, the abstaining from meats, or not, "let every man abound in his own sense;" i. e. let there be no condemning, no excluding any man on the account of such different sentiments: and this sense is very agreeable to the context, if the word πληροφορέω will bear it, of which, sure, the Greek interpreters must be sufficient judges; especially when Phavorinus saith that πληροφόρησον is the same with πλήρωσον, fulfil, as in that of the apostle, τὴν διακονίαν σου πληροφόρησον, "Fulfil thy ministry," 2 Tim. iv. 5, and when this sense accords so well with the Hebrew proverb, איש ימלא את לבו, i. e. "Let a man fulfil his heart," or do his pleasure.

They who render the words thus, as we do, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind," as the word πληροφορία doth import, Col. ii. 2, Heb. vi. 9, x. 22, 1 Thess. i. 5, either refer it to the preceding words thus, Let every man content himself with this, that he is fully persuaded he doth as he ought, and not search into the actions or judgments of other men about these matters, to condemn them for them; and this also is a sense against which I know no exception, and is made more probable from ver. 14. 21, 22, or else give the sense thus, Let a man have that persuasion of the lawfulness of what he doth, or abstains from, as will preserve him from sinning against conscience in it.

[9] Ver. 6. Κυρίῳ, To the Lord.] If "the Lord" here signifies the Lord Christ, as we may gather from ver. 7—9, it is evident from the reason following, "for he giveth God thanks," that Christ is God: if it signify God the Father, yet the following verses, which apply it to Christ, make it plain that the argument is good from God the Father to our Lord Christ, and again from Christ, ver. 10, to God the Father, ver. 11, and consequently that they must equally be God (see Examen Millii).

Here we are told, that "no man can be said to do any thing to the Lord, or out of conscience towards God, in such cases wherein God has not interposed his authority; nor is any man in scripture said to do any thing to the Lord, who cannot produce a plain law for what he does; but when both contending parties can produce a divine authority for doing or not doing the same thing (i. e. the law forbidding, and yet commanding the same thing), there is great reason for them to receive one another, because they both act out of reverence to the divine authority." But this assertion may be evidently disproved,

First, From the example of St. Paul, who "served God from his forefathers with a pure conscience" (2 Tim. i. 3), and conversed before God "in all good conscience" (Acts xiii. 1), and was "zealous for God," even when he persecuted Christians to the death (Acts xxii. 3, 4), and thought himself bound in conscience "to do many things against the name of Jesus" (Acts xxvi. 9): he therefore, if he may be believed, did these things "out of conscience towards God," wherein God had not interposed his authority.

Secondly, This also is evident from the instances related in this verse; for a law cancelled and disannulled by God himself, hath no divine authority; and he who only produceth such a law, is so far from producing a plain law for what he doth, that he produceth none at all, nor doth he act out of reverence to the divine authority, but only with respect to his own erroneous conceptions of a divine authority, when there is no such thing; nor can he produce any divine authority for what he doth. "Oh! but God had once interposed his authority in this case, and the Jews could not be satisfied that this authority was repealed." I answer; And so it is with all the unbelieving Jews unto this very day, who to the Lord he doth not regard it (i. e. because his Lord hath freed him from any obligation so to do). He that eateth (freely of all kinds of meats), eateth to the Lord (or to his glory), for he giveth God thanks (for his liberty thus to eat); and he that eateth not (so), to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks (even for those herbs he eateth, or that he hath provided for him other food).

7 For none of us (who are Christians) [10] liveth to himself, (but to him that died for him and rose again, 2 Cor. v. 16,) and no man (dying) dieth to himself (so as to be exempted from the power and jurisdiction of the Lord, whose servants we are).

8 For whether we live, we (Christians, if we act suitably to our duty and our obligations,) live unto the Lord (under his dominion, and under the government of his laws); and whether we die, we die (and, dying, we are still subject) unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's.

9 For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he [11] might be Lord both of the dead and living (Phil. ii. 10).

10 But why (why then) dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? (as if he were thy servant, and thou his master and his judge, seeing) for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ (and from him, who is our Lord and Master, shall receive the sentence according to our works).

11 For it is written (Isa. liv. 23), As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God.

12 So then every one of us shall [12] give account of himself (and of his behaviour in these matters)

still observe the law of Moses, as far as under their present circumstances they can; as believing it was given them for an everlasting covenant, and so being unsatisfied that the authority of it is repealed; so far is it from being true, that this case hath no parallel: it is therefore evident that in this sense it cannot be said, He that regardeth a day, enjoined by the law of Moses, regardeth it to the Lord; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not: for the apostle, in this very chapter, declareth himself persuaded by the faith of the Lord Jesus, that "there was nothing unclean of itself," but only through the mistaken estimation of the Jew (ver. 14); and elsewhere, that the Jewish feasts, new moons, and sabbaths, were only "shadows of good things to come;" and that Christ was the body or the substance of them (Col. ii. 17), and that there was made ἀθέτησις, "a disannulling of the former command, by reason of the weakness and unprofitableness of it" (Heb. vii. 18). It could be therefore nothing but prejudice and error, which made the Jew conceive he observed those days, and abstained from those meats, by a divine authority, or that he could produce such an authority for so doing; he therefore must be said to do this "to the Lord," and "out of conscience towards God," because he, through the weakness and error of his judgment, thought the law of Moses obliged him still in conscience to the observance of these things. Now this is so far from being an unparalleled case, that it is the very case of the Romanists, using still the anointing of the sick; of the anabaptists, dipping them who are baptized; of the Greek church, refusing to eat things strangled, and blood, out of reverence to the apostolical injunction; of the dissenters, using prayer "by the Spirit," or conceived prayer, out of reverence to the command, to "pray in the Holy Ghost," and abstaining from communion with that church which observes no church-discipline, out of respect to the command, to "purge the evil from among us;" for all this is done by them out of a mistaken reverence to a divine authority, which they conceive obliging to them. But then the Greek expositors here note, that this indulgence to men of an erroneous conscience is not to be extended to "doctrines of faith, and matters of great moment, but only to cases of meat and fasting, and the like;"* and that it is especially to be granted to those who are infirm, and want indulgence.

[10] Ver. 7. Οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἡμῶν ἑαυτῷ ζῇ, For none of us liveth to himself.] This I conceive to be a reason, not of that which is contained in the sixth verse, but of what was delivered ver. 4, viz. that Christ was our Master, and we his servants; and therefore, by judging one another for these things, they took upon them to judge another man's servant. For (1.) in the next verse the apostle reassumes this matter, inquiring, "Who art thou that judgest thy brother?" and (2.) those words are a plain proof of this; for we are his servants to whom we live, and to whom we must give an account of our actions, and who is "Lord both of the dead and the living:"

but they seem not so applicable to what is delivered, ver. 6, or to give a clear reason why he that abstains from swine's flesh, or that religiously observes a Jewish festival, doth this unto the Lord Christ, who came to take away, not to enforce the obligation of those things.

[11] Ver. 9. Ἵνα κυριεύσῃ, That he might be Lord.] He by his resurrection being constituted "Lord of all things," and having "all power both in heaven and earth" conferred upon him, must have power over all, we being all his servants, and so obliged "not to live unto ourselves, but to him that died for us, and rose again" (2 Cor. v. 16). He being also the rewarder of all those that serve him faithfully, he must be the Lord over the dead, so as to be able to bring them to life again, that they may receive the promised reward.

[12] Ver. 12. Περὶ ἑαυτοῦ λόγον δώσει τῷ Θεῷ, Shall give an account of himself to God.] Here Œcumenius notes, that it is said of God the Father, that "he judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to his Son" (John v. 22), and therefore, what the apostle here saith, viz. "Every man shall confess to God, and bow the knee to him" (ver. 11), and "give an account of himself to God" (ver. 12), is manifestly spoken of Christ as judge, ἄρα Θεὸς ὁ Χριστός, "and therefore Christ is God:" and this argument was used before the Nicene council by Novatian* and others. It is a wonder that Socinus should deny that the apostle says, that "every knee should bow" to Christ, when, citing the same place, Phil. ii. 10, 11, the apostle so expressly declares, that "at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus is the Lord;" and here, from this place, proves, that "Christ is Lord both of the dead and the living," before whose tribunal they must all stand; and so must own his power and authority over them, which is the thing expressed metaphorically by bending of the knee, and the confession of the tongue: and if these words, which the prophet certainly spake of Jehovah, the God of the Jews, be well applied by the apostle to Christ, Christ must be also the person intended by them; for how could the apostle prove that "every knee must bow" to Christ, from the words of God, saying, "To me every knee shall bow," if Christ were, in his whole nature and essence, as different from that God who spake those words of himself, as is a creature from his great Creator? Crellius here saith, Paul accommodates this passage to Christ, †"not that he is God, but because what is contained in it shall, by Christ, as subordinate to God, be exhibited and performed to God himself." But this subterfuge is confuted by the words of the apostle, who saith expressly, Phil. ii. 10, 11, that "to the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus is the Lord;" and so declares, these words are fulfilled by the honour exhibited, not to God the Father, but to our Lord Jesus Christ: and seeing he is Lord over the dead, by the power by which "he to God (and it becomes not us to antedate his judgment).

13 Let us not therefore (take upon us to) judge one another any more: but (let us) judge this rather, that no man (ought to) [13] put a stumblingblock or an occasion to fall (from the faith) in his brother's way.

14 I know, and am persuaded by (the faith of) the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but (notwithstanding this) to him that [14] esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him (as to the use of it) it is unclean.

15 But (though nothing be unclean of itself, yet) if thy brother be [15] grieved (i. e. scandalized) with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably (in eating it to his offence and ruin; wherefore) destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died.

16 Let not then (any thing be done by you, whereby) [16] your good (i. e. your Christian calling may) be evil spoken of (Gr. blasphemed) (by them who are thus offended at this use of your Christian liberty):

17 For the kingdom of God is not (a thing which consists in) meat and drink; but (in) righteousness, and peace, and [17] joy in the Holy Ghost.

18 For he that in these things serveth Christ is acceptable to God, and approved of men.

19 Let us therefore follow after the things which make for (the) peace (of the church), and things wherewith one may edify (and build up) another (in Christian love and union into one spiritual temple in the Lord).

20 For meat destroy not the work of God (i. e. the Christian convert, 1 Cor. iii. 9, for though) all things indeed are pure; but (yet) it is evil for that man who eateth with offence (to do so).

21 It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor (to do) any (other) thing (from which thou mayest is able to subdue all things to himself" (Phil. iii. 21), which doubtless is the power of God; and seeing, having raised all men, he "will bring to light the hidden things" which they have done, and "manifest the counsels of their hearts" (1 Cor. iv. 5), and so must be omniscient, and have the knowledge of the secrets of the heart; and it is the property of God alone to raise the dead by his power, and be the Searcher of all hearts: these properties ascribed to Christ here, and elsewhere, must show that he is truly God (see the note on Phil. ii. 10).

[13] Ver. 13. Μὴ τιθέναι πρόσκομμα, Not to put a stumbling-block.] i. e. Not to cause our brother to stumble at the Christian faith, and fall off from it, or to perish; for what is here, Do not put a stumbling-block (by thy meat) in thy brother's way, is, ver. 15, "Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died;" and to eat, διὰ προσκόμματος, so as to put this stumbling-block before him, is "for meat to destroy the work of God:" and that in this sense the phrase is still used in the epistles, see note on 1 Cor. viii. 9; only let it be noted that, where there is the same danger of destroying my brother, or dissolving the work of God, be it not by infidelity, but schism, or idolatry, or loose living, there is the same reason and obligation, "not to put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall in our brother's way:" for the reason why the apostle would not have us put this stumbling-block, which makes our brother fall from the faith, in his way, is this, because he would not have us be instrumental to his perishing, or to "destroy him for whom Christ died." He therefore must equally forbid the doing any other thing which may be left undone without sin; and, being done, hath a like tendency to cause my weak brother to perish.

[14] Ver. 14. Τῷ λογιζομένῳ τι κοινόν, To him that esteemeth any thing unclean, &c.] Here is a plain demonstration that the person here mentioned, as "weak in faith," was also weak in understanding; i. e. one who understood not that meat to be free from uncleanness which indeed was so; and that he was therefore "weak in the faith," because he was so in his understanding; and so also it is plainly, 1 Cor. viii. 7. 10. It is therefore without ground affirmed, That these two sorts of weak persons must be used very differently; you must have a care of offending those who are weak in faith, but you must instruct and govern those who are weak in understanding.

Secondly, Here also is a plain evidence that the weak Jew had no just matter of offence given him by the gentiles' eating, or that they did not take offence at the open violation of an express law of God by the gentiles' eating; nor were they thus weak out of reverence to any express positive law, which all men agreed was given by God to them, at whose eating they were scandalized. To make this very clear, consider that the weakness of the Jews consisted in two things;

1. That they were not convinced that the law of Moses was out of date, and therefore durst not do any thing which was forbidden by that law, nor omit doing what the law commanded: and as to this, it is true, they were weak out of reverence to an express positive law, which, through the weakness of their understanding, they thought to be still binding, but the apostle here declares to be by Christ taken away.

2. That they could not endure to see others do what they themselves durst not do; i. e. they could not endure to see the gentile converts eat those meats which the law of Moses forbade the Jews to eat: now here, I say, they were not weak out of reverence to any express positive law; nor could they take offence at the open violation of any express law of God: for there was no such law given to the gentiles, to abstain from such meats as unclean, nor to the gentile converts to Christianity to observe any such law; they therefore by eating of these meats did violate no law given by God to them, and so the Jews could take no offence at their violation of any such law. And so much stronger is the case of eating things offered to idols, in which yet the apostle doth require this abstinence, with regard to the conscience of the weak Jew (1 Cor. viii. 7. 10, x. 28, 29), for the eating of things offered to idols (unless it were done in the idol-temple, the place appointed for his worship) was against no law of God, but only against the canons of the Jews; and so here the Jews could not be thus offended with that action, out of reverence to any law which God had made against it, but only from the Jewish canons, and interpretations of the law, touching abstaining from idolatry: the imagination of the Jew, that such meats bought in the shambles, or set before Christians at a friendly entertainment, were unlawful, was a vain imagination, and so they had only an imaginary law which occasioned their offence. Nor doth the apostolical canon concern any other meats offered to idols than those which were eaten in the idol-temple: for sure the apostle, who was a part of that council, would not here freely allow what the whole college of apostles thought necessary even for the gentile converts to abstain from. This scandal therefore of the weak Jews was plainly scandalum acceptum, non datum, "received, but not given;" for they had no reason at all to believe that the law of Moses was ever given to, or was in force among, the gentiles, and much less that their Jewish canons could be so.

[15] Ver. 15. Εἰ λυπεῖται, If thy brother be grieved.] The Greek imports such sorrow as puts a man in danger of his life, and therefore, in the metaphorical sense, such sorrow as endangered his Christian life. So Job xxxi. 39, "If I have caused the owners thereof to lose their life:" εἰ ψυχὴν ἐλύπησα, "If I have grieved his soul," say the LXX. הפחתי, "If I have caused his life to expire, or break out" (see Dr. Hammond on the place).

Note also here, that the apostle plainly doth suppose that he, for whom Christ died, might perish (see the note on 1 Cor. viii. 11).

[16] Ver. 16. Ἀγαθόν, Your good.] Τὴν πίστιν καλεῖ, "He calleth our faith our good," say all the Greek commentators, and that very appositely; for the Jews blasphemed and fell off from Christianity upon this account.

[17] Ver. 17. Καὶ χαρὰ ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, And joy in the Holy Ghost.] This cannot here signify delight to do good, or rejoicing in unanimity, for the phrase hath no such sense in scripture, but always signifies an inward joy arising from abstain) whereby thy [18] brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

22 Hast thou (then) faith? (or, a persuasion that all meats are clean, and lawfully may be eaten?) have it to thyself before God (and satisfy thyself with that). [19] Happy is he that condemneth not himself (by acting uncharitably) in that thing which he alloweth.

23 And he that [20] doubteth (Gr. that puts a difference between meats) is damned if he eat (against his conscience, making that difference), because he eateth not of faith (but against his own persuasion): for [21] whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

the consolations of the Holy Ghost; as when the apostle saith, the Thessalonians "received the word with much affection, and with joy in the Holy Ghost," 1 Thess. i. 6, and when Luke informs us, the churches had peace, "and, walking in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied," Acts ix. 31.

[18] Ver. 21. Προσκόπτει, ἢ σκανδαλίζεται, ἢ ἀσθενεῖ, Stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.] I have shown what it is to be made weak, note on ver. 1, what it is to stumble, note on ver. 13. To offend or scandalize a weak brother, is also to be an occasion of his ruin, by causing him to fall off from the faith, or to be prejudiced against it, as will appear from a brief view of the places where the phrase is used. So Matt. v. 29, 30, "If thy right eye, or hand, σκανδαλίζει σε, offend thee," i. e. if it lead thee to hell and to perdition, cut it off. So xi. 6, "Blessed is he who is not offended with me;" i. e. who is not by the meanness of my present circumstances, or by the doctrine I am sent to preach, diverted from believing in me. So xiii. 21, "When persecution comes, the stony ground εὐθὺς σκανδαλίζεται, is presently offended." So ver. 57, xv. 11, Mark vi. 3, Luke vii. 23. The Jews were scandalized at Christ; i. e. they were diverted from owning him as their Messiah, either by reason of his words, or the meanness of his original, and his appearance in the world. So were the multitude, and some of his disciples, scandalized at his discourse about eating his flesh, John xvi. 60, 61. So doth our Lord admonish his disciples not to be scandalized at the persecutions they should suffer, John xvi. 1. So he foretells that many, who had once believed in him, would be scandalized, when tribulations should abound, Matt. xxiv. 10. So he tells his own disciples, that they would be "scandalized" at his sufferings, Matt. xxvi. 31. And so both Peter and the rest of them were offended, or "scandalized," their faith in him failing for a season, Luke xxiv. 21. So are we to understand those words, "Woe to him that offends," or scandalizeth, "one of these little ones," as appears from the reason following, ver. 14, "It is not the will of your heavenly Father, that one of these little ones should perish." So I have shown the word is used, 1 Cor. viii. 13. And so it may be well interpreted, when the apostle saith, 2 Cor. xi. 29, "Who is offended," i. e. in danger to fall off from the Christian faith, "and I burn not" with a fervent zeal for his recovery? (see Examen Millii.)

[19] Ver. 22. Μακάριος ὁ μὴ κρίνων ἑαυτὸν, Happy is he that condemneth not himself, &c.] i. e. He is comparatively a happy man, that hath this firm persuasion of the lawfulness of eating any thing that is set before him, without asking any question about it for conscience' sake; for he createth no trouble or condemnation to himself about these matters, nor is he troublesome to others by his niceness, or scrupulosity; whereas he that puts a difference betwixt meats, is not only troublesome to others with whom he doth converse, but condemns himself, as oft as he is tempted to eat of that which his conscience doth not allow of (see Examen Millii).

[20] Ver. 23. Ὁ διακρινόμενος, He that doubteth.] He that discerneth, and puts a difference between meats lawful and unlawful; this is the import of this word elsewhere. So Matt. xvi. 3, "You know how διακρίνειν, to discern the face of the heavens;" Acts x. 28; xi. 12, "Go with them, μηδὲν διακρινόμενος, making no difference" betwixt the gentiles and the Jews, the circumcised and the uncircumcised, not counting them unclean any longer, as Peter doth himself interpret it, ver. 28. And again, Acts xv. 9, οὐδὲν διέκρινε, "He put no difference betwixt them and us, purifying their hearts by faith;" 1 Cor. iv. 7, Τίς σε διακρινει; "Who put the difference betwixt thee and others?" xi. 29, μὴ διακρίνων, "Not discerning the Lord's body," or not discriminating it from other meats. So Jude 22, "Of some have compassion, διακρινόμενοι, making a difference."

[21] Πᾶν δὲ ὃ οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως, Whatever is not of faith.] i. e. With a due persuasion of the lawfulness of the action; for that is the faith spoken of in the foregoing verse, when the apostle saith, "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself;" and that is the faith which stands opposed to doubting in this verse; and to this faith alone agree the preceding words, He that makes a discrimination between meats lawful and unlawful, and yet eats of them without discrimination, is condemned by his own conscience, if he eats, because he eateth not of faith, or with persuasion of the lawfulness of eating what he doth partake of.

CHAPTER XV.

1 We then that are strong (and rightly understand our Christian liberty and duty) ought to bear the infirmities of the weak (being careful to forbear the doing that which doth scandalize and hurt the souls of them who have not this knowledge), and not to (do things because they) please ourselves (when our weak brother is thus injured by them).

2 Let (therefore) every one of us (rather choose to) please his neighbour for his good to (the) [1] edification (of him in his Christian faith).

3 For even Christ (whose example we are called to imitate) pleased not himself (i. e. and indulged not so to his own pleasure, ease, and quiet, as to neglect the glory of God, or the good of others); but (willingly bore with the infirmities, and sustained the reproaches of men), [2] as it is written (of him, Ps. lxix. 9), The

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XV.

[1] Ver. 2. Πρὸς οἰκοδομὴν, To edification.] Edification, in the scriptures, sometimes signifies our increase in the knowledge of our Christian duty; in which sense it is seven times used, 1 Cor. xiv. 3, 4, 5. 12. 16. 26. 29, Eph. iv. 29, especially in that knowledge which tends to our advancement in piety; and therefore is called οἰκοδομὴ Θεοῦ, "the edification of God," 1 Tim. i. 4. Sometimes our growth, or confirmation in the faith, Jude 20. Sometimes it refers to the whole body, which is called Θεοῦ οἰκοδομὴ, "the building of God," 1 Cor. iii. 2, Eph. ii. 21, iv. 12. And then the body is edified, (1.) By the mutual love of its members; in which sense, saith the apostle, "charity edifieth," 1 Cor. viii. 1, and this is οἰκοδομὴ ἐν ἀγάπῃ, "edification in love," Eph. iv. 16. (2.) By the strict union of the members to, and their peaceable conversation with, one another; and this is styled, οἰκοδομὴ εἰς τὸν ἕνα, "the edifying the church into one," 1 Thess. v. 11. And thus we are bid to "follow after things which make for peace, and τὰ τῆς οἰκοδομῆς τῆς εἰς ἀλλήλους, the edification of one of us unto another," xiv. 19. Now the edification, which consists in knowledge of our Christian duty, cannot be here understood; because our forbearance of that which scandalizes our brother tends not to the information of his understanding, but, as it is an act of charity, it tends to the edification of the body in love; as it is the avoiding that which may scandalize the weak, and so induce him to stumble at, and fall off from Christianity, it tends to his edification in the faith; and as it is receiving the weak into fellowship and communion, notwithstanding his different conceptions from us, it tends to the edifying the body in union and peace.

[2] Ver. 3. Καθὼς γέγραπται, As it is written.] That this reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me (i. e. he was afflicted for them, his zeal for the glory of God, and the good of souls, caused him patiently to endure the contradiction of sinners, Heb. xii. 2, 3, to bear the cross they laid, and despise the shame they cast upon him; which sure is more than to abstain from a little meat on the account of others.

4 Nor ought we to think ourselves unconcerned in what was said so long before by David of others,) For (this and) whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience (in bearing the like censures, reproaches, and infirmities of others) and (through the) comfort of the scriptures (promising a reward to that patience) might have hope (of being rewarded for it).

5 Now the God of patience and consolation (who works this patience in us, and gives this consolation to us) grant you to be likeminded one toward another (i. e. to have a like concern for others as for yourselves) according to (the example of) Christ Jesus:

6 That ye (thus bearing with the infirmities of the weak, and thus receiving one another into communion) may [3] with one mind and one mouth (in your assemblies) glorify (and worship) God, even the [4] Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (or the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ).

7 Wherefore receive ye one another (Jew and gentile, into mutual love and fellowship, without contention about the things in which your judgments differ), as Christ also received us (both reconciling both to God in one body on the cross, and to one another, Col. i. 20, Eph. ii. 14) to the glory of God (which will be much promoted by this union).

8 (Is he hath received us, λέγω δὲ,) Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision (or the Jews) for (the establishment of) the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers (of that nation, and so he showed his love and mercy towards them):

9 And (he was also the Saviour of the gentiles) that the Gentiles (also) might glorify God for his mercy (to them); as it is written (Ps. xviii. 49), For this cause I [5] will confess to thee (i. e. praise and celebrate thee) among the Gentiles (or ἐν ἔθνεσι, with the gentiles), and (will) sing unto thy name.

10 And again he (the same David) saith (Ps. lxvii. 4), Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people.

11 And again (Ps. cxvii. 1), Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people.

12 And again, [6] Esaias saith (xi. 1. 10), There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles trust.

13 Now (may) the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace (the fruits of hope) in believing (those things), that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost (witnessing to your spirits that ye are the sons of God, viii. 16, 17, and shedding abroad the sense of his love in your hearts, v. 5, and so sealing you up to the day of redemption, Eph. iv. 30).

14 And (this, I pray, not doubting the assistance of this good Spirit with you, for) I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled (by the Spirit) with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another.

15 Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort (Gr. ἀπὸ μέρους, as to the Gentile part of you, see note on 2 Cor. ii. 5), as putting you in mind (of the favour of God to you gentiles, and your duty to him), because of the grace that is given to me of God (i. e. because of the apostolical office by him committed to me: see note on Rom. i. 5), 16 That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, [7] ministering the gospel of God (i. e. exercising myself in the offices of the gospel, as the priest in the legal services), that the offering up of the Gentiles (by me) might be acceptable, being sanctified (not with salt, or any other libamen, but) by (the effusion of) the Holy Ghost (upon them).

17 (And this I have so effectually performed by his grace, that) I have therefore whereof I may glory through (the assistance of) Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to (my service of) God (in this gospel.

18 And here I shall only mention what I myself, by the assistance of his grace, have done:) For [8] I will not psalm was undoubtedly spoken of the Messiah, we learn from ver. 22, applied to Christ, John xix. 28, 29, and from the former part of the verse cited here, viz. "The zeal of thine house hath consumed me," applied to Christ, John ii. 17. And the Jews themselves say, that the things contained in this psalm shall be accomplished "in the days of David," or "in the days of the Messiah;"* and that which is said in the close of the psalm, that "God will save Zion," &c., "that men may dwell therein, and have it in possession," shall be accomplished בימי המשיח "in the days of the Messiah," the rabbins own.†

[3] Ver. 6. Ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἐν ἑνὶ στόματι, With one mind and mouth.] i. e. Not only praising God with the same words in your doxologies, but also joining in those praises with a mind full of Christian love, and sense of the divine goodness.

[4] Τὸν Θεὸν καὶ πατέρα, &c. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.] So 2 Cor. i. 3, xi. 31, Eph. i. 3, Col. i. 3, 1 Pet. i. 3, Rev. i. 6. 12. On which words the descant of the fathers‡ is to this effect, "That the first person of the sacred Trinity is the God of Jesus Christ, in respect of his manhood, his Father in respect of his divinity, or as he is the Word." Or the words may be rendered thus: "God who is," or "The God that is," or "God, to wit, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," for the Hebrew ו, and so the Greek καὶ, signifies sometimes id est (Noldius, Partic. Hebr. p. 180, 181); sometimes nempè, to wit (p. 207), and sometimes qui est, who is (p. 315).

[5] Ver. 9. Ἐξομολογήσομαι, I will confess unto thee.] The very next words, "Great deliverances giveth he unto his king, and showeth mercy to David, לִמְשִׁיחוֹ, his Messiah," or Anointed, are by the Jews* interpreted of the Messiah, that is, Christ, and so the preceding words are doubtless fitly applied to him.

[6] Ver. 12. Ἡσαΐας λέγει, Esaias saith.] The Chaldee paraphrast interprets the first verse of the Messiah; and R. Chanini proves from the tenth verse, that "King Messiah is not to come, but to give precepts to the nations of the world."†

[7] Ver. 16. Ἱερουργοῦντα τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, Ministering the gospel.] Here is a plain allusion to the Jewish sacrifices, offered by the priest, and sanctified or made acceptable and savoury by the libamen offered with it; for he compares himself in the preaching of the gospel to the priest, sacris operanti, conversant about his sacrifice, to prepare and fit it to be offered. The gentiles, dedicated by him to the service of God, are his sacrifice, or oblation; the Holy Spirit is the libamen poured on this sacrifice, by which they are sanctified, and rendered εὐπρόσδεκτα, "acceptable to God" (see Numb. xv. 3. 10).

[8] Ver. 18. Οὐ γὰρ τολμήσω λαλεῖν τι, For I will not dare to speak any thing of what Christ hath not wrought by me.] The critics here tell us, that they take off the force of the apostle's words who render them "I dare not," because that intimates the apostle had a mind to do so, but fear withheld dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not (but only of those which he hath) wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed, 19 (Viz. That he hath assisted me in preaching the gospel) [9]Through mighty (Gr. ἐν δυνάμει, with the power of) signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20 Yea, so have I strived to preach the gospel, (as to do it) not where Christ was named (i. e. preached by others before me), lest I should build upon another man's foundation:

21 But (my preaching hath been) as it is written (Isa. lii. 15), To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand.

22 For which cause also (wherefore, by going from one region to another to preach the gospel,) I have been much hindered from coming to you.

23 But now having no more place (s) in these parts (unacquainted with the gospel), and having a great desire these many years to come unto you;

24 Whensoever I take my (intended) journey into Spain, [10] I will (by God's assistance) come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled (i. e. satisfied) with your company.

25 But now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto (the necessities of) the saints (there).

26 For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem.

27 It hath pleased them verily (I say); and (with good reason, seeing) their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things (receiving the gospel from Judea), their duty is also (in gratitude) to minister unto them in carnal things.

28 When therefore I have performed this (charitable office), and have sealed (and secured) to them this fruit (of the gentiles' liberality), I will come by you into Spain.

29 And I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ (or with a full impartment of spiritual gifts to you: see note on i. 11).

30 Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love (which is the fruit) of the Spirit, that ye [11] strive together with me in your prayers to God for me;

31 That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa; and that my service which I have for (my brethren in) Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints (there, though it come from the churches of the gentiles);

32 That I may come unto you with (the greater) joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed.

33 Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen.

him; they therefore would have the words rendered here, and Jude 9, οὐκ ἐτόλμησε, "Michael, contending with the devil, durst not bring against him a railing accusation;" Non sustineo, "I suffer not myself," and "He suffered not himself:" but our translation may be justified, by a like expression of the same apostle in the same case, οὐ καὶ τολμῶμεν ἐγκρῖναι ἢ συγκρῖναι ἑαυτούς τισι, "We dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some who commend themselves," 2 Cor. x. 12. And this, doubtless, he saith not to intimate that he and Timothy had a mind to do that themselves, which there he represents as folly in others; but only to intimate that he did not think it fit and prudent so to do, and therefore durst not do it, and this sense the word well bears, 1 Cor. vi. 15, Jude 9.

[9] Ver. 19. Ἐν δυνάμει σημείων, ἐν δυνάμει Πνεύματος,] i. e. Confirming the gospel by outward miracles, and by the inward distributions of the Holy Ghost. See the difference between them, note on Heb. ii. 4.

[10] Ver. 24. Ἐλεύσομαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς, I will come to you, &c.] Here is an evidence that Paul, in purposes of this nature, was not assisted by the Holy Ghost, they being purposes which by the providence of God he was hindered from fulfilling. It is also evident from i. 10, 11, and from this, and from the twenty-eighth verse, that Paul writ this epistle while he was at liberty, and before Christ had told him he must "testify of him at Rome," Acts xxiii. 11, and before he was constrained to appeal to Cæsar, Acts xxv. 11; for in this epistle he speaks still of his journey to Rome, and from thence to Spain, as of a voluntary undertaking; hoping then that the unbelieving Jews would not have given him that disturbance, when he went up to Jerusalem with his alms gathered for his nation, which afterward he found they did, ver. 27 (see Examen Millii).

[11] Ver. 30. Ἐν ταῖς προσευχαῖς, In your prayers for me.] "If Paul," saith Esthius, "might desire the prayers of the Romans, why might not the Romans desire the prayers of Paul?" I answer they might desire his prayers, as he did theirs, by an epistle directed to him to pray for them; he adds, "If they might desire his prayers whilst living, why not when dead and reigning with Christ?" I answer, because then they could direct no epistle to him, or any other way acquaint him with their mind. Hence Elijah, being to be taken up into heaven, speaks to Elisha thus, "Ask what I shall do for thee before I am taken away from thee," 2 Kings ii. 9. Note also, that we say not that such desires of the saints departed are injurious to the intercession of Christ: but that they are idolatrous, implying that creatures are omniscient, omnipresent, and have the knowledge of the heart.

CHAPTER XVI.

1 I COMMEND unto you (r care) [1] Phebe our sister (in the faith), which is a servant of (or, one that ministers to) the church which is at Cenchrea (or the assembly of Christians at the haven of Corinth):

2 That ye receive her in the Lord (i. e. for the Lord's sake, or as one that belongs to him, Matt. x. 42), as becometh saints (i. e. Christians), and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you: for she hath been a succourer of many, and [2] of myself also.

3 Greet [3] Priscilla and Aquila my helpers in (the work of) Christ Jesus:

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XVI.

[1] Ver. 1. Φοίβην τὴν ἀδελφὴν ἡμῶν, Phebe our sister.] This Phebe was a deaconess, chosen to that office according to the apostolical prescription, 1 Tim. v. 10. See Origen and Chrysostom.

[2] Ver. 2. Καὶ αὐτοῦ ἐμοῦ, And of myself also.] Hence some infer that she was not a deaconess, but one that ministered to the apostles, in the preaching, of her substance; but Paul had none such to minister to him, 1 Cor. ix. 5. 15, and this made one condition of a deaconess, 1 Tim. v. 10; προστασίαν τὴν φιλοξενίαν καὶ κηδεμονίαν καλεῖ, "He saith, She hath been a succourer of many, by reason of her care of, and hospitality towards them." Theodoret.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἀσπάσασθε Πρίσκιλλαν, Greet Priscilla.] Priscilla seems to be named first here, and 2 Tim. iv. 19, as

4 Who have for my life laid down their own necks (i. e. exposed themselves to the hazard of their own lives): unto whom not only I give thanks (for my own preservation), but also all the churches of the Gentiles (for preservation of their apostle).

5 Likewise greet the [4] church that is in their house (i. e. their Christian family). Salute my well-beloved Epenetus, who is the [5] firstfruits of Achaia unto Christ.

6 Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour on us.

7 Salute Andronicus and Junia, [6] my kinsmen, and my fellowprisoners, who are of [7] note among the apostles, who also were in Christ (that is converted to the Christian faith) before me.

8 Greet Amplias my beloved in the Lord.

9 Salute Urbane, our helper in (the gospel of) Christ, and Stachys my beloved.

10 Salute Apelles [8] approved in Christ (by the sincerity of his faith, and the integrity of his life).

Salute them which are (in Christ) of Aristobulus' household.

11 Salute Herodion my kinsman. Greet them that be of the household of Narcissus, [9] which are in the Lord.

12 Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord ('s service). Salute the beloved Persis, which laboured much in the Lord.

13 Salute Rufus [10] chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine (she being one who showed the affection of a mother to me also).

14 Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, and the brethren which are with them.

15 Salute Philologus, and Julia, Nereus, and his sister, and Olympas, and [11] all the saints which are with them.

being first converted, say interpreters; but she is named last, Acts xviii. 2. 26, 1 Cor. xvi. 19, and therefore the gloss saith, "She is here placed first, there being in Christ Jesus neither male nor female."

[4] Ver. 5. Καὶ τὴν κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίαν, And the church in their house.] They were so zealous in the faith, say Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, ὥστε τὸν οἶκον αὐτῶν πάντας πιστοὺς ποιῆσαι, τούτους καὶ ἐκκλησίαν ὠνόμασεν, "that they converted their whole families to the Christian profession of it, for such families he calls the church." See this proved, note on 1 Cor. xvi. 19.

[5] Ἀπαρχὴ τῆς Ἀχαΐας, The first-fruits of Achaia.] So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, the Syriac and Arabic versions; but the Alexandrian copy, the Ethiopic, the Vulgar, and almost all the Latin commentators read, τῆς Ἀσίας, "the first-fruits of Asia Minor." So doth Origen on this place, and Hom. 11 on Numbers, f. 109, D and G, and Jerome on Ezek. xliii. f. 241, 1. And this reading is to be preferred before the other, because the same apostle saith expressly, that Stephanas "was the first-fruits of Achaia," 1 Cor. xvi. 15; that is, he was first converted to the faith there, and Epenetus in Asia Minor, for so the phrase, "the first-fruits," is used by St. Clemens.*

[6] Ver. 7. Τοὺς συγγενεῖς μου, My kinsmen.] So Paul styles all the Jews, Rom. ix. 3. Καὶ συναιχμαλώτους, "And fellow-prisoners." Before Paul went to Rome he was, ἐν φυλακαῖς περισσοτέρως, "in prisons often," 2 Cor. xi. 23, ἐπτάκις εἴσατο φορίσας, "bearing his chain seven times," saith Clemens,† and so might well have many fellow-prisoners.

[7] Ἐπισήμους ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, Of note among the apostles.] That is, say some, men highly esteemed by them; men eminent, say Chrysostom and Theodoret, not only among the teachers, but the apostles of the churches. For they who are co-workers with the apostles in planting of the churches are styled ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν, "apostles of the churches," 2 Cor. viii. 23, Phil. ii. 25. In which sense Barnabas in scripture is called the apostle, Acts xiv. 14, and Philip the deacon by the ancients; see Coteler. Not. in Constit. Apost. p. 262.

[8] Ver. 10. Δόκιμον, Approved.] By suffering patiently great tribulations, saith Origen: for "tribulation worketh patience, and patience ἐοκιμὴν, experience" of our sincere affection to him for whose sake we suffer them, Rom. v. 4. But because all the Greek scholiasts say it signifies τοὺς ἀπλοϊστέρους, τοὺς εὐήθεις, τοὺς βραδεῖς τὴν νόησιν, "men simple, foolish, and slow of understanding," and because the word often bears this sense in the book of Proverbs, as when the wise man says ἄκακος, "The simple believeth every word," xiv. 15; when he calls upon the "simple to hear wisdom," viii. 5, and promises to "give subtlety to the simple," i. 4; and when he adds, xxi. 11, "When a scorner is punished, the simple is made wise,"—this exposition, being more pertinent to the words, may be preferred before the other.

[9] Ver. 11. Τοὺς ὄντας ἐν Κυρίῳ, Which are in the Lord.] From these two verses is confirmed our observation, that when the whole family was converted, the apostle writes to the church in such a house; when not, the salutation is directed to as many as were in the Lord in that family, according to the descant of Origen* on the place.

[10] Ver. 13. Τὸν ἐκλεκτὸν ἐν Κυρίῳ, Chosen in the Lord.] One of great excellency in Christianity, as we say, "A choice man:" so the word ἐκλεκτὸς, often signifies; Ps. lxxviii. 31, "They smote down τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς, the chosen men that were of Israel:" so ἐκλεκτὰ μνημεῖα, are "choice sepulchres," Gen. xxiii. 6; ἐκλεκτὰ τῶν δώρων, "choice gifts," Deut. xii. 11; and ἄνδρες ἐκλεκτοὶ, "choice men," Judg. xx. 11 (see Acts xv. 25, 26).

[11] Ver. 15. Πάντας τοὺς ἁγίους, All the saints.] Note here, that saints and Christian brethren are all one.

[12] Ver. 16. Ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ, With a holy kiss.] Of the kiss of charity, let it be observed,

(1.) That it was used at the end of the prayer before the celebration of the sacrament. So Justin Martyr† saith expressly, ἀλλήλους φιλήματι ἀσπαζόμεθα παυσάμενοι τῶν εὐχῶν, "Prayers being ended, we salute one another with a holy kiss, and then the bread and cup are brought to the president." (2.) That this seems to have been done by the men apart, and the women apart, as their‡ separate places in the church or synagogue seemed to require. So the Apostolical Institutions say,§ "These things being done, let the men apart, and the women apart, salute one another with a kiss in the Lord." Though Origen‖ seems to make this practice proper to the men only.

[13] Ver. 17. Σκοπεῖν τοὺς τὰς διχοστασίας καὶ τὰ σκάνδαλα ποιοῦντας, Mark them that cause divisions and scandals.] By "scandals" the Greek scholiasts understand heresies, whereas, through the whole New Testament this word seems rather to import such actions as give occasion to others to stumble at, and fall off from the Christian faith (see note on Matt. xviii. 6, Rom. xiv. 13). Esthius here notes, (1.) That unwritten traditions may be hence proved, because the apostle saith, "Mark them that cause offences contrary, not to the scriptures, but to the doctrine they had received." But to make this argument of any force, he must prove that the doctrine they had received was not contained in the scriptures either then, or after written. (2.) The apostle plainly speaks here of doctrines received from the mouths of the apostles by those very men to whom he writ; and when he hath once proved the unwritten traditions of the church of Rome to be such, we shall be ready to receive them. (3.) He adds, that "this place makes for a diligent inquisition after heretics," as if Paul was setting up an inquisition here: whereas the word σκοπεῖν doth only signify to mark, or to look to them, as Luke xi. 35, 2 Cor. iv. 18, Gal. vi. 1, Phil. ii. 4. Nor doth he exhort the Romans to observe them, in order to the apprehending or punishing, but, as he himself notes, in order to the declining of them. (4.) He observes truly, that the apostle here insinuates, that even the vulgar people may from some general principles discern the true doctrine, and that which was delivered by the apostles, from that which was false, and was not so delivered; but this was only then to be done by comparing that which was thus delivered from the mouth of the apostles, who preached it by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, and confirmed their doctrine by miracles, with that which was delivered besides, or in opposition to it, and was not so confirmed; and this can only now be done by them, by comparing all pretenders to the apostles' doctrine with those scriptures which they indited by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and confirmed by miracles.

[14] Ver. 18. Οἱ γὰρ τοιοῦτοι, They that are such.] That is, the Gnostics, saith Dr. Hammond, to whom indeed these characters do well agree. But Theodoret saith thus, τοὺς κακοὺς τοῦ νόμου συνηγόρους διὰ τούτων αἰνίττεται, "By these words he strikes at the evil defenders of the law," or those who preached up circumcision and the observance of the law as necessary to the salvation of the gentiles; τοὺς ἐξ Ἰουδαίων αἰνίττεται, "He means the Jews," say Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, "for he still taxes them with the love of their bellies." And certain it is, that these men caused divisions and separations from others, as unclean, and not fit to be conversed with (Acts xi. 3, Gal. ii. 12, 13), and scandal, "subverting the souls of the gentiles" (Acts xv. 24), "evacuating the gospel of Christ" (Gal. ii. 21), and causing men to "fall from grace" (Gal. v. 2. 4); that they did this ἐν λόγῳ κολακείας, "by flattering words" (1 Thess. ii. 5), and that in this "they served not Christ, but their own bellies" (Phil. iii. 19), doing these things "for filthy lucre's sake" (Tit. i. 10, 11); whence it appears there is no necessity of referring these words to the Gnostics, or deserting the opinions of the ancients, as touching the persons here intended (see also Examen Millii).

[15] Ἀκακῶν, Of the simple.] Ἄκακος, in the Septuagint, answers to the Hebrew תם, "the upright," Job viii. 20, Ps. xxv. 21, Prov. xiii. 5, and ἀκακία to תמים, "integrity," Job xxvii. 5, xxxi. 6, Ps. vii. 9, xxvi. 1. 11, xxxvi. 39, xl. 13, xxxiii. 13, c. 3, and so here it seems to signify men of upright and honest hearts.

[16] Ver. 20. Τὸν Σατανᾶν, Satan.] By "Satan" we may understand those persecuting Jews and Judaizers, who are styled the "messengers" and "ministers of Satan," 2 Cor. xi. 15, xii. 17, their persecutions being ascribed to Satan, who animates and provokes them to them, 1 Thess. iii. 5, Rev. ii. 9, 10. And then God's bruising him under their feet, must signify his taking away their power thus to deceive and persecute, by the destruction of Jerusalem, and these impostors with it.

[17] Ver. 25. Τῷ δὲ δυναμένῳ, To him that hath power,] And will to execute that power (see note on xiv. 4).

[18] Κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου, According to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ.] Both these expressions, say the fathers, are of the same import, the gospel which the apostle preached being the same with that which Christ preached whilst he was on earth; and they, after his ascension, preaching in his name, by his authority, and by the assistance of his Spirit, and so delivering his laws and doctrine, not their own.

[19] Χρόνοις αἰωνίοις σεσιγημένου, Kept secret since the world began.] The Greek may signify "from the beginning of ages," the promise of the Messiah being obscurely made, or hinted to Adam from the beginning; though the fathers only render these words ἄνωθεν, "before," as Theodoret, or πάλαι, "of old," as Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact (see the notes on 2 Tim. ii. 2).

[20] Ver. 26. Διὰ γραφῶν προφητικῶν, By the scriptures of the prophets.] They of old foretold of the Messiah, and of the calling of the gentiles; but yet, as to many circumstances, this was still a mystery, till these prophetic sayings were more clearly revealed by the Spirit given to the apostles and prophets, and by the actual accomplishment of what they foretold (see note on Eph. iii. 6).

[21] Ver. 27. Μόνῳ σοφῷ Θεῷ, To the only wise God.] This, as the fathers note, cannot exclude the divine nature of Jesus Christ, who is "the wisdom of the Father," from this title, any more than those words, "who only hath immortality," 1 Tim. vi. 16, exclude Christ from being immortal.

APPENDIX TO CHAP. XI.,

CONTAINING

ON THE

CALLING OF THE JEWS TO THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

To strengthen the argument which I have offered from this chapter for the conversion of the Jewish nation to the Christian faith, let it be noted,

First, That this hath been the constant doctrine of the church of Christ, owned by the Greek and Latin fathers, and by all commentators I have met with on this place. Among the Greek fathers, by St. Chrysostom,* whose words are these: "When the fullness of the gentiles is come, then all Israel shall be saved, at the time of Christ's second coming, and the consummation of all things."—"After the gentiles have received the salutary faith, they also shall receive the faith (saith Theodoret†) when the great Elias shall come and preach it to them." Gennadius‡ descants upon the words of the apostle thus: "They being blinded and excluded from salvation, God translated this salvation to you." And again, "All you being called, and come in, grace shall again receive them all; for this the prophet Isaiah testifies." "Before (saith Photius§) the heathen being disobedient, the Jews were saved." Again, "The Jews becoming disobedient, the gentiles are saved; and the gentiles being saved, the Jews, emulating them, shall also be saved:"—"Because (saith Theophylact¶) the Jews, being then blinded, have not obtained this salvation, that which the apostle speaks of shall happen to them afterward."—"They of the people of Israel who believed not, and for their unbelief were deserted, that God's mercy might be shown to you, shall not be always left in unbelief (saith Origen¶), but when the dispensation of the fullness of the gentiles is completed, they also shall find mercy." And therefore, when Celsus had, as it were, prophesied that the Jews should presently perish, "this (saith Origen) he said, not knowing how present God was formerly with them, and how that, by their sin, salvation came to the gentiles, and their fall brought riches to the world, till the fullness of the gentiles be come in, that after this all Israel, which Celsus understands not, may be saved." In his fifth homily upon Jeremiah, he exhorts the Christian to live so as that he may not receive a bill of divorce,†† "but may enter into the holy inheritance. And Israel may then also enter; for, if the fullness of the gentiles be come in, then all Israel shall be saved, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." In his commentary on St. Matthew he saith (ibid. p. 410, C.), "Those that whipped Christ were whipped, and shall be whipped till the fullness of the gentiles is come in:" and (p. 397, D.) "that they were worthy to be deserted, either till the fullness of the gentiles was come in, or till they had fulfilled the punishment of their sins." Nor is this denied by him in the passage cited from his book against Celsus; for he saith not there, "They shall never be converted to the Christian faith," but that they should never be restored to their own worship or country, that "they had been long since cast out from τῆς σεμνῆς ἁγιστείας καὶ λατρείας, their venerable service and ceremonies, or purgations,‡‡ and we confidently affirm, ὅτι οὐδ' ἐποκατασταθήσονται, that they shall never be restored again to Jerusalem, or the land of promise, which before," saith he, "they were; for then, being captivated, they returned to their own land, and enjoyed their laws as before, which now they shall never be restored to." All the Latin fathers, who have left us any commentaries or notes on this epistle, are plainly of the same mind, as you may see by consulting Hilary the deacon, Primasius, Sedulius, and Haymo, upon the twenty-fifth verse of this chapter. This also many of the fathers do conclude,

First, From those words of the prophet Hosea, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an altar, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king, and shall fear the Lord, and his goodness, in the latter days," iii. 4, 5. Which words Augustine* having produced, to prove that "the carnal Israelites, who now will not believe, shall hereafter do so," he he saith, "Nothing is more manifest than that, by David their king, the prophet here meaneth Jesus Christ, in whom they now believe not."—"This," saith Jerome,† "is the blindness that happened to Israel in part, that the fullness of the gentiles might come in, and all Israel be saved, and after a long time might return and seek the Lord. Some (saith he) do interpret this of the captivity of Babylon; but others (saith he), with us, refer it to a time yet future." Cyril saith, "Here is a manifest declaration of what shall hereafter happen to the adulterous synagogue, and that she should be received again; that Israel‡ should not always be rejected, but, being recalled and converted to the faith, should own Christ according to the flesh to be the king of all, and that this glorious grace should be afforded to her at the end of the world."

Secondly, That in which they universally agree, excepting only Jerome, is, That Elias is to come before the end of the world, to convert the Jews to Christ: and this they gather from those words of Malachi, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the great and terrible day of the Lord; and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children," iv. 5, 6; and those of Christ, "Elias truly shall come first, and shall restore all things," Matt. xvii. 11. "We know (saith Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. p. 268, 269. 306) that Elias shall come before the Lord's second advent, and that then the Jews shall know him whom they have dishonoured." Origen says§ that "by those words of Malachi it seemeth to appear, that Elias shall come before Christ, and by his sacred words, and the dispositions they shall work in their souls, shall prepare them for the coming of Christ." Theodoret paraphraseth the words of Malachi thus: "Lest at my second coming, finding you all in unbelief, I should subject you to eternal punishment, Elias shall come first, and teach you of my advent, and shall prevail upon you, O Jews, without doubting, to join yourselves to the churches of the gentiles, and to be made one."‖ Yea, even St. Jerome, upon these words of St. Matthew, "Elias indeed shall come, and restore all things," descants thus:¶ "He who is to come in the body at our Lord's second advent, came now by John in virtue and the Spirit." And in his comment on the third of Habakkuk, ver. 17, having cited those words of Christ spoken of the barren fig-tree, "Let no fruit grow on thee for ever," Matt. xxi. 19, he bids us* "diligently consider, that he saith not for ever and ever, but only, in seculum, for that age; and when that age is past, and the fullness of the gentiles is come in, then shall the fig-tree bring forth her fruits, and all Israel shall be saved." So generally did this doctrine obtain among the ancients.

Moreover, as this doctrine hath the suffrage of all the ancient fathers, and commentators do thus generally agree in exposition of this chapter, so is it easy to confirm it, by showing the absurdity of other expositions, and the plain inconsistence of them both with truth and with the words of the apostle. For,

First, The words of the apostle cannot be expounded, as Dr. Lightfoot† and others do interpret them, of the spiritual Israel, i. e. of all those persons, whether Jew or gentile, which belong to God's election. For, (1.) the text speaks of that which was a mystery to the believing gentiles, i. e. a secret not obvious to their understanding. Now that God's elect, whether Jew or gentile, should be saved, could be no mystery, but the first article of Christian faith; and so of this the apostle could not say, "I would not have you ignorant, lest you should be wise in your own conceit;" especially since the apostle had before said of the believing Jews, "There is now an election of grace," ver. 5; and, ver. 7, "The election hath obtained."

Secondly, The Jews and Israelites here mentioned are manifestly distinguished from the elect of Israel by this character, that they were the blinded Israel, ver. 7, who lay under a spiritual slumber, ver. 8, whose eyes were blinded that they saw not, ver. 10, who had stumbled at the stumbling-stone, ver. 11; they are that Israel, whose casting away was the riches of the world, whose diminution was their fullness, ver. 12; they are Israel "according to the flesh," ver. 14, the branches broken off for unbelief, ver. 17. 19, 20, they "who believed not," ver. 23. 30—32, and who were enemies to the gospel for the gentiles' sake, ver. 29; this is the Israel of whom the apostle here asserts, "They shall be saved," of this blinded, this unbelieving, this Israel cut off, these branches broken from their own olive-tree, these enemies to the converted gentiles; as there hath been, saith the apostle, a diminution, so shall there be a fullness; as there hath been a casting them off, so shall there be a reception of them; as there hath been a breaking them off from their own olive-tree, so shall there be an inserting of them into it again, ver. 24; as there hath been a time of their unbelief, and so of severity, ver. 22, and of wrath to them, Rom. ix. 22, 1 Thess. ii. 16, so shall there be a time of mercy, ver. 31, 32. Now since the unbelief, the diminution, the rejecting, the breaking the branches off, must necessarily be understood of Israel according to the flesh, of the natural branches of the stock of Abraham, ver. 22. 24, beloved for the fathers' sake, ver. 28, of the seed of Jacob, whose sins were not yet taken away, ver. 26, if you understand the fullness, the reception, the ingrafting of them, the salvation here mentioned of the spiritual Israel, and of the elect opposed to Israel that was blinded, ver. 7, the antithesis is wholly lost; since then the diminution and the fullness, the rejection and reception, the breaking off and the insertion, the severity and the mercy, will not relate to the same persons. Again, "Blindness in part hath happened to Israel," saith the apostle, "till the fullness of the gentiles shall come in, and then all Israel shall be saved;" now certainly the blindness happened to Israel according to the flesh, and must not the antithesis require that the salvation should belong to the same Israel? It happened not to the elect, for "the election," saith the apostle, "hath obtained, and the rest were blinded," and therefore the salvation cannot respect them only.

Moreover, to whom did this blindness happen? Was it not to the national church and body of the Jews? to them to whom our Saviour had said, "Whilst you have the light, believe in the light, lest darkness come upon you?" John xii. 35. Is it not of the children of Israel that the apostle saith, "They could not see to the end of that which was to be abolished," 2 Cor. iii. 13, 14, "but their minds are blinded, for until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away?" Was it not that very people who "had eyes, and saw not; ears, and heard not; whose heart was waxed gross, their ears dull, and their eyes closed?" Isa. vi. 9, Acts xxviii. 26, 27, ver. 8. 10, and from whose eyes were "hid the things which belonged to their peace, because they knew not the time of their visitation?" Luke xix. 42. 44. To whom belonged this ἀποβολή, "rejection," or casting off? Doth it not respect the generality of that church and nation? Doth not our Saviour say of them, "The children of the kingdom shall be cast out into utter darkness," Matt. viii. 12, that "their house should be left unto them desolate," Matt. xxiii. 38, that "the kingdom of God should be taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof?" Matt. xxi. 41. Who were the branches broken off, are they not all the unbelieving Jews? (ver. 20,) i. e. the bulk and body of that church and nation. Doth not our Saviour tell them, that their vineyard should be let out to other husbandmen? Matt. xxi. 41; are not they that barren tree which was to be hewn down? Luke xiii. 7. 9; and must not then the recovery of them from this blindness, the receiving of them again, the ingrafting them into their own olive-tree, respect, not some few straggling converts of them only, but the chief bulk or body of that nation?

Thirdly, It is easy to observe two questions in this chapter; the first is this, λέγω οὖν, μὴ ἀπώσατο, &c., "I say then, Hath God cast off his people?" ver. 1, to which the answer is, "God hath not cast off his people whom he foreknew," or the "remnant according to the election of grace," ver. 5. 7, but only the obdurate Jew, ver. 8—10. The second is this, λέγω οὖν, μὴ ἔπταισαν ἵνα πέσωσι; I say then, Have these unbelieving Jews, who stumbled at the stumbling-stone, ix. 32, 33, "stumbled, that they should fall" entirely, so as that they should never rise again? And to this the apostle answers in the negative, from ver. 11 to the 25th, and proves it from ver. 25 to the 32d. It is therefore evident, that his discourse, from ver. 11 to the 32d, respects not the spiritual Israel, i. e. the gentile converts, nor the elect of Israel, but the obdurate, blinded nation, which God hath then cast off. And,

Fourthly, Here is evidently a time prefixed for this conversion of the Jews, viz. "when the fulfilling of the gentiles is come in;" here is a blindness to continue on them till that time: whilst blindness doth continue on them, their salvation is not to be expected, and when they shall be saved that blindness, of necessity, must cease: but to the spiritual Israel, or the elect converted at all times, nothing of this can be applied, for their conversion is not limited to the time of the coming in of the fullness of the gentiles, but they are converted in every age, and at all times.

Secondly, The opinion of the reverend Dr. Hammond is to this effect:* 1. "That it is not necessary that this should still belong to any yet future return of the Jews, in a visible and remarkable manner, the circumstances of the context applying it to the first times, wherein the epistle was writ.

2. † "That the fullness of the Jews, mentioned ver. 12, is their being added to the church, their coming in, and being gathered, and laying hold of the faith, being provoked so to do by seeing the gentiles believe, and so filling up the vacuities, as it were, which were formerly in the church, by their standing out impertinently; and the fullness of the gentiles is the gentiles coming into the church, receiving the faith, they then becoming one part of the visible church, as the Jews another.

3. "That the mystery‡ here mentioned is this, that a great part of the Jews are now become blind, and that that is made use of by God, that by occasion of that the gospel may (by departing awhile from them) be preached to, and received by, the generality of the gentiles, and they compacted into Christian churches; and this in very mercy to those Jews, that they, by seeing the gentiles believe, might at length be provoked to do so too, by way of emulation (ver. 11. 31).

5. "That the addition of† Jewish believers shall be matter of confirmation of the faith to the gentiles, and a means to bring them all to receive it, to convert the gentiles over all the world.

6. "As for the truth of that, that as yet many more Jews should repent and receive the gospel, that, saith he, has been demonstrated by the event; (1.) When the Jews saw Christ's predictions, Matt. xxiv., manifestly fulfilled in the Roman armies sitting down before the city, for then many turned Christians, and went out of the city, and were delivered from the following evils. And,

(2.) "After that, when the temple and city were destroyed, and they brought into subjection by the Romans, then many were humbled, and turned Christians. And,

(3.) "After that also, in Justin Martyr's days, every day there were some that came in to be Christ's disciples. Now to these things I

Answer First, That whereas this reverend person saith, the circumstances of the context apply this conversion of the Jews to the times in which this epistle was writ, i. e. about the year of Christ 56, it seems extremely evident, both from the circumstances of the context, and from many other scriptures, that nothing could more unfitly be assigned as the time of the conversion of the then hardened and rejected Jews than this. For,

1. In the ninth chapter of this epistle, the apostle calls our Lord Christ, the Holy Ghost, and his own conscience to witness, that he had "great heaviness, and continual sorrow in his heart," on the account of the infidelity of his Jewish brethren, the spiritual slumber and blindness which then was upon them, and their rejection by God, ver. 1—3. And, ver. 22, he plainly represents them as "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction," and only reserved, as Pharaoh was of old, for a more illustrious ruin, in which God's vengeance on them, and the causes of it, should be conspicuously seen. And, ver. 27, he proceeds to show, from the predictions of the prophets, that only a little remnant of them should be saved; a remnant, like to those seven thousand men reserved in the ten tribes of Israel, when the whole visible body of them had revolted to Baal: and, ver. 31, speaking of them in general, he saith, "Israel hath not attained to justification, because they sought it not of faith, but stumbled at" the Messiah, even at that Jesus who is "the end of the law for justification, to every one that believeth," x. 4, he being to them "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence."

In the tenth chapter he declares that they had "not submitted to the righteousness which was of God through faith," ver. 2, 3, and from ver. 16 to the end of that chapter, he proves that the preaching of the gospel to the gentiles, and the incredulity of the Jews, was a thing long ago foretold in the prophetic writings. In this chapter, he begins with the inquiry to which his former discourse, and the general infidelity of that people, had given occasion, viz. "Hath God entirely cast off his people?" and answers it by saying that as in the time of Elias, in that general revolt of the ten tribes, God still "reserved seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal, οὕτως καὶ ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ, so in this season also" he had reserved a like "remnant according to the election of grace," ver. 5, confessing, notwithstanding, touching the body of that church and people, that "Israel had not attained to that righteousness" it sought for, but was, excepting this election only, wholly blinded; that God had "given them up to a spirit of slumber," and "blinded their eyes;" had "broken them off" for their infidelity, and had shown his "severity" upon them. Wherefore the times, when this epistle was written, being the times of the apostle's "heaviness," and his "continual sorrow" for their rejection; the times when they are represented by him as "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction;" when the prophets had foretold their incredulity; when "Israel had not attained to justification, but had stumbled at" the Messiah; when they were "ignorant of the righteousness of God," and had not submitted to it; when to that very day they were blinded, and given up to a spiritual slumber; is it possible that these should be the very times assigned by the apostle for the ceasing of their blindness, and that so generally, that it might be truly said all Israel were then saved, and God had mercy on them all?

The same apostle, anno Christi 49, speaks to them of that nation thus: "It was necessary that the word of God should be first spoken to you; but since you thrust it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we turn (from you) to the gentiles," Acts xiii. 46. In his First Epistle to the Thessalonians, written A. D. 51, he declares of the Jews, that they "killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and they persecuted the apostles; and they pleased not God, and were contrary to all men," 1 Thess. ii. 14—16, "forbidding us to speak to the gentiles, that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always, for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost." "That is," saith Dr. Hammond, "by this they do so fill up the measure of their sins, that the wrath of God to the utter destruction of them is now come out upon them, already denounced, and, within a very little while, most certain to overtake them." In his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, written before that to the Romans, though perhaps in the same year, he saith that even then their minds were blinded, and the veil still remained upon them. And when he came to Rome, about three years after the writing this epistle, and preached to some of the chief of them residing in that city, he declares that these words of Isaiah were fulfilled upon them, Acts xxviii. 23, viz. "Hearing you shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing you shall see, and not perceive: for the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and they have closed their eyes; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and be converted, and I should heal them." Concluding thus, "Be it known therefore to you, that the salvation of God is sent to the gentiles, and they will hear it." Now after they had thus "put away the gospel from them, and judged themselves unworthy of eternal life," and the apostles had thus turned from them to the gentiles; after the "wrath was thus determined to come upon them, εἰς τέλος, to the end," that is, say all the ancient commentators, not as in the times of the judges, for twenty or forty years, or, as in the time of their captivity, for seventy years, but for many generations; after their minds were thus blinded, their eyes thus shut, their hearts thus hardened, can we expect this blindness suddenly should cease, and this wrath presently give place to mercy and salvation?

Secondly, That "many of the Jews turned Christians, when they saw Christ's prediction, Matt. xxiv., fulfilled in the Roman army sitting down before that city, and went out of the city with the Christians, and so were delivered from the following evils," is also said, without all ground or testimony of writers of those times. Epiphanius,* who lived in Palestine, and Eusebius,† who was born and educated there, give us an accurate relation of this matter, and carefully inform us, that οἱ μαθηταὶ, "the disciples of Christ, οἱ ἐν Χριστῷ πεπιστευκότες, they that believed in Christ," being admonished by an angel, or by an oracle, so to do, "left Jerusalem," and went to Pella, "where they were preserved;" but of one convert of the Jews then made they say not a word. How unlikely then it is that the same Epiphanius, who so particulary relates the conversion of one single Aquila from Judaism to Christianity, when they returned to Jerusalem after the ruin of it, and his revolt again to Judaism, should never speak one word of these supposed converts before their departure!

Moreover, this was the time when there happened a great apostasy of the Jewish converts, according to our Lord's prediction, that, "because iniquity should then abound, the love of many should wax cold," Matt. xxiv. 12. And therefore the Epistle to the Hebrews written in the ninth, the Epistle of James writ also in the ninth, and the Epistle of Peter writ in the tenth year of Nero, all near this very time, are very full of exhortations to them that they would not be double-minded, wavering, or unstable in the faith, James i. 6—8; that they would not count "that fiery trial, which was come to try them, a strange thing," 1 Pet. iv. 12; that they would patiently, and with long-suffering endure it, as knowing "they were happy who did thus endure," James i. 12, v. 8. 10, 11, 1 Pet. iii. 13, 14, v. 9, 10. The Epistle to the Hebrews is full of exhortations to them, to see to it that there be not in them "an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God," Heb. iii. 12, that they "hold the beginning of their confidence firm to the end," ver. 14, to "fear, lest, a promise being made of entering into rest, they should fall short of it through unbelief," iv. 1. 11, there being no renewing them to repentance, who, after such miraculous evidences of the truth, apostatized, vi. 6, and "no more sacrifice for sin" for them, x. 25, that they would not "cast away their confidence," God having said, xii. 35. 38, "If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him;" and that they would "diligently look to it, lest any man failed of the grace of God," xii. 15. These, saith our Saviour, "are the times of vengeance," and of "wrath upon that people," Luke xxi. 22, 23, the times when, "the things belonging to their peace being hid from their eyes," their "house was to be left unto them desolate," Luke xix. 42—44. And could the times of the apostasy, even of the converted Jews, be the times of the salvation of the unbelieving Jews? Was it to be expected they should then, more than ever, see "the things belonging to their peace," when they were hidden from their eyes? or could the times of wrath and "vengeance upon that people," when the avenger came out of Zion, to punish the iniquity of Zion with the sorest judgments, be the very times when "the Deliverer came out of Zion to turn away iniquity from Jacob?"

Thirdly, Whereas it is added, that "after that, when the temple and city were destroyed, and they brought into subjection by the Romans, then many were humbled, and turned Christians; and that after that, even in Justin Martyr's days, every day there were some who came in to be Christ's disciples:" I answer,

1. That as for their conversion when the temple and city were destroyed, I cannot find one word in church history concerning it, but much to the contrary: for, (1.) Epiphanius speaks particularly of the return of the Christians to Jerusalem after the ruin of it, and of the miracles they then wrought, and yet he mentions only one Aquila, a Jew, converted to the Christian faith; adding that he soon after renounced the faith, and turned to his former Judaism. And Justin Martyr* observes, in express contradiction to the doctor, that "after their country was destroyed, and their city laid waste, they repented not, but proceeded still in their execrations of Christ, and of all that believed in him." And Tertullian† adds, that, "seeing from the time of Tiberius to Vespasian they repented not, their land was made desolate, and their cities burnt with fire." And indeed this was the very time when wrath came actually upon them to the uttermost; when this barren tree was hewn down, and cast into the fire, Luke xiii. 7. 9; when their house was left desolate, because they would not be gathered; when all the righteous blood, shed by them from Noah to that time, came upon them, and they had filled up the measure of their sins, Matt. xxiii. 35. 37, 38, when the kingdom was wholly taken from them; when the Son of man came to take vengeance on them; and when he sent forth his armies to destroy those murderers, and to burn up their city, because they refused to come unto the marriage-feast, Matt. xxii. 7. And could this be the time of their humiliation and conversion? Was this a fit time to expect the completion of those words of Paul, concerning the sending the deliverer out of Zion, to turn away iniquity from Jacob, and to take away their sins, and to show mercy to them, in such a signal manner, that all Israel should be saved!

To proceed to the history of them in the following times: Justin Martyr in his Apology, writ in the year of the Lord 140, saith of the Jews in all places, That they were ‡"as great enemies to the Christians in all places as the heathens were, and as ready to torment and kill them, when they could do it;" and "that this was evident from the last Jewish war, in which their captain Barchochebas commanded only the Christians to be tormented, if they refused to deny and to blaspheme the Lord Jesus Christ." Now this carries down the hatred of the Jews against Christians, and their impenitency, till after the times both of Trajan and Hadrian. Some years after this, he writ his dialogue with Trypho; and there he informs us that the Jews* still continued "to curse those who believed in Jesus, and to lay violent hands upon them when they could do it;" that "even then their hand was high to do wickedness, they still hating and killing Christians as oft as it was in their power."

But we are told that this very Justin Martyr saith that "every day there were some (of them) who came in to be Christ's disciples."

I answer, That what Justin Martyr there saith, relates not at all to any Jewish converts, but to the gentiles coming in from the way of deceit to the faith of Christ; and as he had told the emperors in his Apology, p. 45, B, that the "consummation of the world was deferred, διὰ τὸ σπέρμα τῶν Χριστιανῶν, for the seed of Christians, which was then springing up:" so he tells Trypho, p. 256, D, that the day of judgment, of which he had before spoken, and of which the Psalm he there citeth treats, was †"deferred by God, because he knew that some would come daily in to be Christ's disciples, and would quit the way of deceit." Now that this cannot be spoken of the Jews is evident, because "wrath was come upon them to the uttermost," as Justin Martyr often intimates, not saying that God had not brought wrath and judgment upon them; but only that he had not brought the general judgment on the world for this cause. He goes on, and says that "every one of those, who thus believed, received gifts from Christ as they were worthy:" and this he proves, because it was prophesied that ‡"after our Lord's ascent to heaven, he should lead us captive from our error, and should give us gifts;" where the word πλάνη, used ordinarily of the gentiles deceived by Satan, and especially the word ἡμᾶς, ὡς, show that the Martyr speaks not of the Jews, but gentile converts; and so it follows, "Therefore we gentiles, who have received these gifts, show you Jews to be fools," &c.; so that the good doctor was utterly mistaken in applying this passage to the Jews, as others led by his authority have done.

From this time to the days of Constantine, the period assigned by Mr. Calvert for the conversion mentioned by Paul, the fathers generally represent them as a nation whose "ears were shut, and their hearts hardened,"§ declaring that the "scripture had clearly foretold they should be disinherited, and fall off from the grace of God."‖ Origen¶ testifies, that

"God had turned his providence from the Jews to the gentiles; that they were wholly deserted, and retained nothing of what before was venerable among them, nor any footsteps of the divince presence with them; that after the crucifixion of our Lord they were perfectly deserted, and not to be converted till the end of the world." Tertullian* saith, "that from the time that they crucified their Lord, God had taken from them the prophet, wise man, and the Holy Spirit, and had left them destitute of his grace;" and that "only at his second coming, he should be received by them who had thus rejected him." And this seems most agreeable to our Lord's predictions, that "the kingdom of God should be taken from them, and given to another nation that would bring forth the fruit of it;" that he would "miserably destroy those husbandmen, who should render him the fruits in their season," Matt. xxi. 41. 43, that "none of them who were bidden and refused, should taste of his supper," Luke xiv. 24, that "many should come from the east and west, and should sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom should be cast out into utter darkness," Matt. viii. 11, 12, that "they who were first (i. e. the Jews) should be the last," and they who were "the last (i. e. the gentiles) should be first;" for that this is spoken of the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the gentiles, is evident from these words of Luke xiii. 26—30, "Then shall ye (Jews) begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence you are, depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out. And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last." Now if we do consider that "wrath was come upon" this nation, εἰς τέλος, "to the end," can we imagine either that this kingdom taken from them, this vineyard let out to other husbandmen, these children of the kingdom cast out into outer darkness, should suddenly receive again this kingdom, be restored to this vineyard, or admitted to the light of the gospel? or that all Israel should be saved, or iniquity should be taken away from Jacob, whilst that nation lay under these dreadful judgments? or that when our Lord hath so solemnly foretold there should be "wrath upon this people," and "they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the gentiles, until the time of the gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke xxi. 23, 24), this wrath should not continue on them whilst they were captives in all nations, and Jerusalem was trodden down?

Here, I confess, the reverend doctor (on Luke xxi. 23) hath a peculiar notion, "That the treading down of Jerusalem by the gentiles, is not particularly their victory over it by Titus, but their consequent possessing it, and even till Hadrian's rebuilding a part of it, and calling it by his own name Ælia, and inhabiting it by gentiles——upon the doing this," saith he, "it followed, that as all the (unbelieving) Jews were utterly banished the city, so the believing Jews returned thither again from their dispersions, and inhabited it again, and joined, and made one congregation, one church with the gentiles, which had then, till that time, received the faith also, and till then continued a distinct church from the Jews: by which it appears how punctually this prediction, in our notion, was fulfilled, that Jerusalem should be inhabited by the gentiles, all the Jews in a manner excluded, till the time that the gospel had been freely preached to the gentiles, and by them in some eminent manner been received; and then it should be reinhabited by the Jews again, i. e. the Christian Jews, who, being wrought on by emulation of the gentiles, were now, many of them, brought to receive the faith. In his note on the two witnesses, Rev. xi. 2, he makes them to be the two bishops of the church in Jerusalem, one of the Jewish, the other of the gentile converts; which state of that church continued, saith he, till the time of Marcus, a gentile bishop of that church, i. e. from after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus till that time." But here again are many things delivered, not only without all suffrage of history, but in perfect opposition to the histories of those times. For,

First, Eusebius and Sulpitius Severus do inform us, that, till the time of Hadrian,* all the bishops and priests of Jerusalem were only of the circumcision. Here therefore is no room for his two bishops, one of the Jewish, the other of the gentile converts, till the time of Marcus.

Secondly, They also do inform us that all the Christians then at Jerusalem were of the circumcision, and so not of the gentiles; for Sulpitius observes, that the edict of Hadrian† (for banishing all the Jews from Jerusalem) "happened for the advantage of the Christian faith, because, till then, they almost all joined the observation of the law to the faith of Christ: the Lord so ordering it, that, by this means, the servitude of that law might be removed from the church." Eusebius also saith, that the whole "church of Jerusalem‡ consisted of the faithful Hebrews, who, from the times of the apostles, had continued there till the siege of Bitter, in the eighteenth year of Hadrian:" so that here is no room for his supposed gentile converts to be governed by a bishop of the gentiles.

Thirdly, They also do expressly say, not only that the unbelieving Jews, but that all the Jews in general, were by this edict banished both from Jerusalem and from the region round about it. "He placed a band of soldiers which should banish all the Jews from Jerusalem," saith Sulpitius; and this he did, quia Christiani ex Judæis potissimùm putabantur, "because the Christians were thought to have their rise chiefly from the Jews." Eusebius saith that τὸ πᾶν ἔθνος, "the whole nation was banished from Jerusalem, and the country round about, and not permitted to set one foot in it. And then adds, that §"the city being after this manner emptied of the Jews, and wholly cleared of its inhabitants, and made up of aliens flowing in thither, it was made a Roman city and colony, and, in honour of the emperor, was named Ælia." The same is said by him in his Evangelical demonstrations,‖ and by Tertullian,¶ that "not one Jew was permitted to stay there." Eusebius also adds, that τῆς αὐτόθι ἐκκλησίας ἐξ ἐθνῶν συγκροτηθείσης, "the church there consisting only of the gentiles, Marcus was the first bishop of it." So that here is no place for the doctor's supposed church, consisting both of Jews and gentiles, or for the inhabiting of it by the Christian Jews, and much less for his feigned "many of them brought now to receive the faith by emulation of the gentiles." In a word, Epiphanius saith that Hadrian the emperor, travelling to Jerusalem, found there only, τὴν ἐκκλησίαν μικρὰν, "one little church," and seven synagogues, standing like cottages; and was this likely to be the seat of two great bishops? So that I find nothing agreeable to the truth of history, in any thing which this reverend person saith upon this subject, and much less any thing confirmed either by scripture or antiquity.

What hath been thus discoursed is abundantly sufficient to confute the exposition of this reverend and learned person, as being not agreeable to matter of fact; for when was there any such conversion made of the Jews at the times assigned by him, which can in any probability of construction answer to the phrase used by the apostle, that by it "all Israel shall be saved;" "ungodliness should be turned away from Jacob;" God should bless them by "taking away their sins;" that they who now were blinded should "have the veil taken away from before their eyes;" they, who now were diminished, should have again their fullness; and they, who now were cast off, should be again received? This could not happen in the very times when this epistle was at first indited: for though it be true that James mentions "many thousands" or "myriads" of Jewish converts, "all zealous of the law," Acts xxi. 20, yet were they all converted at or before the time of writing this epistle, and so belonged only to "the remnant according to the election of grace," here mentioned, not to the residue that were blinded, of whose conversion the apostle here speaks from ver. 12 to 32. Nor could their conversion and salvation be a mystery to be then revealed to the gentiles. That no such conversion after the blindness mentioned in this chapter happened to them, upon their seeing "the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place," or soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, hath been already shown; and that Justin Martyr saith nothing of any such remarkable conversion of them hath been also proved.

That there might be some conversion of them in the reign of Trajan, is by some argued from the words of Eusebius; "that Justus,* then bishop of Jerusalem, was one of the many myriads or thousands of the circumcision which then had believed." Yet is this testimony of no force, as to this matter; for, (1.) grammarians well know that μύρια and μυριάδες, when put indefinitely, do only signify, many: now if the πόσαι μυριάδες, the "many myriads," mentioned by James, hindered not, but that the Jewish converts might be only a "little remnant," in respect to the blinded Jews, this may be as true of the ὅσαι μυριάδες, the "so many myriads" of Eusebius; especially if we consider that most of them might be the very persons mentioned by James, he carefully informing us that the whole church of Jerusalem, under her fifteen bishops of Jerusalem, of which this Justus was the eleventh, was made up of "believers who had continued from the apostles' time till the wars and siege under Hadrian;" and speaking of these persons, not as men believing then, but as πεπιστευκότες, "men who had before that time embraced the Christian faith." And hence Rufinus† makes no mention of these supposed myriads, but only saith, "that Justus, being one of those of the circumcision who had embraced the faith of Christ, was made their bishop." In a word, this very Eusebius concurring so exactly with the sentiments of all other fathers, that the Jews were then rejected, and lay under a curse, and proving from this very apostle, and from the words contained in the beginning of this very chapter, that they should generally fall and be rejected for their unbelief, σπανίων ἐξ αὐτῶν εἰς τὸν σωτῆρα καὶ Κύριον ἡμῶν πιστευσάντων, "a very few of them only believing;"‡ and that "after the coming in of all nations to the Christian faith, they did not yet see or understand;"§ he cannot be supposed to mention any thing which answers to the conversion of the Jews intended in this chapter, but must, with us, refer that to that glorious time when the prophecies‖ shall more fully (saith he) be fulfilled; i. e. the time when the fullness mentioned by the apostle shall come in. This being therefore all that hath been pleaded for the remarkable conversion of the Jews, after the writing this epistle; and this all being almost nothing, and far from bearing any correspondence to the comprehensive words of the apostle on that subject; I conclude that no conversion of this nature happened to them, between the writing this epistle and the times of Constantine.

And whereas it is said that this conversion should be wrought in them by way of emulation, and that they should lay hold of the faith, being provoked so to do by seeing the gentiles believe, it is confessed that the apostle represents this a fit means to work this emulation in them; but it is as certain that it hath not yet had the designed effect upon them, they being so far from being provoked to embrace the Christian faith, by seeing the gentiles admitted to it, that this was to them the great stumbling-block, and they were "enemies to the gospel for their sakes," ver. 28, they being prejudiced against it, because the gentiles were admitted to the blessing of it without circumcision, and observance of the law of Moses: see note on Gal. iii. 4, vi. 12. This is that prejudice of the Judaizing Christians which the apostle labours to remove in most of his epistles, but more especially in that to the Galatians; and as for the unbelieving Jews, they could not endure to hear of any to be sent for the converting of the gentiles, Acts xxii. 21, 22, but they persecuted the apostles upon this account, "forbidding them to preach to the gentiles that they might be saved," 1 Thess. ii. 16. And the same enmity to the Christians seems to continue to this day among them upon the same accounts.

Wherefore there having been as yet, so far as we are able to discern, no such remarkable conversion of the Jews, since the inditing this epistle, and no such happy emulation of the converted gentiles, as did provoke them to embrace the Christian faith, this could not be, as here the doctor doth suggest, a confirmation of faith to the gentiles, and much less a means to bring them all to receive it, or to convert the gentiles over all the world. And what records and histories make the least mention of any such conversion of the gentile world, on the account of the remarkable conversion of the Jews after the writing this epistle? When came in such a fullness of the unbelieving Jews, as was the riches of the world? ver. 12, or such a reception of them to the Christian faith, as was unto them life from the dead? ver. 15. Or how can these assertions be reconciled to the words of the apostle? For, if the coming in of the fullness of the gentiles be their receiving the faith in those times, then the partial blindness of the Jews must cease in those times also; for "blindness," saith the apostle, "hath happened to the Jews in part," and that blindness is to continue only "till the fullness of the gentiles shall come in:" if then the blindness of the Jews is not yet ceased, but they have generally continued, even from the time of writing this epistle, to this very moment, in as much blindness and obduracy as they then lay under, and as much branches broken off as now they are, it follows, that the fullness of the gentiles, mentioned by the apostle, is not yet come in.

Lastly, The mystery mentioned ver. 25 cannot be this, that, by occasion of the infidelity of the Jews, the gospel was preached to, and received of the gentiles; for of this the apostle introduceth the believing gentiles speaking thus, ver. 19, "Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in," &c. This therefore could not be to them a mystery. Nor could it be this, viz. that this was done in mercy to the Jews, viz. that they, by seeing the gentiles believe, might at length be provoked to do so too. For of this the apostle had spoken twice, declaring it to be foretold by Moses, saying, "I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people," x. 19. And in this chapter, saying, "Through their fall salvation is come to the gentiles, to provoke them to jealousy," ver. 11. It remains then, as the apostle and the primitive church from him declare, that it be this, that when the time for the fullness, i. e. for the conversion of the still heathen gentiles is come in, then shall the blindness of the Jews be removed, and so "all Israel shall be saved;" and then "all nations shall flow in unto them," and their reception shall be to the gentiles "as life from the dead."

I think I have said what is sufficient to show these words cannot admit the sense imposed upon them by the reverend Dr. Hammond; I proceed now more largely to discuss the proper import of that phrase, "The fullness of the gentiles shall come in." This is by some interpreted thus, Blindness hath happened to the Jews, till the full number of the gentiles, which God shall call, be completed. But this sense is contrary to the express words of the apostle, who declares there shall be a greater and more glorious conversion of the gentiles than that which happened by occasion of their fall, that their fullness should be much more the riches of the gentiles than their fall was, ver. 12, and that their coming in should be unto the gentiles "as life unto the dead," and should much more enrich them than their casting off, ver. 15.

Note therefore, that there is a double fullness of the gentiles mentioned in the holy scriptures:

First, That which is spoken of ver. 12, in these words, "If the diminution of them was the fullness of the gentiles;" and this consisted in the preaching of the gospel to all nations, and the imparting the glad tidings of salvation to them, and was, in a great measure, to be accomplished before the destruction of Jerusalem, and the ruin of that church and nation, according to our Lord's prediction, in these words, "The gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come," Matt. xxiv. 14, Mark xiii. 10.

Secondly, There is to be another fullness of the gentiles by a more glorious conversion of them, and coming in of those nations which have not hitherto embraced the gospel, or have relapsed into heathenism or Mahometism, to be effected when this rejection of the Jews shall cease, and God shall send the "Deliverer out of Zion, to turn away iniquity from Jacob:" and of this only can we understand those words of the apostle, ver. 12, "If the fall of the Jews hath been (already) the riches of the (gentile) world, and the diminution of them the riches of the gentiles, how much more shall their fullness," i. e. the time of their conversion, be the increase and fullness of the same gentiles? And, ver. 15, "If the casting away of them be reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving them again be (to the same world), but even as life, from the dead?" And ver. 25, "Blindness in part hath happened to the Jews, till the fullness of the gentiles shall come in." This blindness therefore still continuing upon them, as much as ever, another fullness of the gentiles is to be expected, when it entirely shall be removed from them, and so "all Israel shall be saved."

Secondly, Jerusalem is yet trodden down of the nations, and the Jews are yet captives in all nations, whereas the captivity and the treading down of Jerusalem is to cease when the times of the gentiles are fulfilled; according to those words of Christ concerning the destruction of the Jews, "They shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be carried captive into all nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down, till the times of the gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke xxi. 24); i. e. till the times when they shall have a plenary conversion by the coming in of the Jews, and shall no more lord it over them, as now they do, but serve them, and "flow in unto them." And to this purpose let it be noted,

First, That, if we consult ancient prophecies concerning the vast extent of our Saviour's kingdom over all nations, we shall find reason to believe they had not yet had their full accomplishment upon them; for he hath not yet had the "uttermost parts of the earth for his possession" (Ps. ii. 8); God hath not yet made "all people, nations, and languages, to serve him," and "all dominions to obey him" (Dan. vii. 4. 27); he hath not yet "filled the whole earth," or "broke in pieces and consumed all other kingdoms" (Dan. ii. 34, 35). That seems not yet fulfilled which was foretold by Micah, that "the Lord should be king over all the earth" (Micah v. 4), and by Zechariah, that "there should be but one Lord, and his name one" (Zech. xiv. 9); and by David, that "all kings shall fall down before him, and all nations serve him;" that "all the ends of the earth should remember, and turn to the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations worship before him" (Ps. lxxii. 8). These, and sundry other such-like prophecies there are, which yet were never accomplished according to the full import of them. For, as Brerewood observes,* "If we divide the known regions of the world into thirty equal parts, the Christians' part is (only) as five, the Mahometans' as six, the idolaters' as nineteen;" whence we have reason to conclude, That there is yet a time to come, before the consummation of all things, in which our Saviour will yet once more display the victorious banner of his cross; and, like a mighty man of war, march on, conquering and to conquer, till he hath confounded or converted his enemies, and finally consummated his victories in a glorious triumph over all the powers of the earth, and made "all nations, tongues, and languages, to serve him."

Secondly, That there is still to be a glorious conversion of the Jewish nation, as it seems evident from the words of the apostle here, who speaketh of a time when the partial blindness which then had happened to the Jews, and still continues upon them, should cease; when God would "turn away ungodliness from Jacob," and "take away (the punishment of) their sins," which yet he hath not done; when not a little remnant only, as at our Lord's first advent, but "all Israel shall be saved;" when that Israel, whose minds were then, and still are blinded by the veil that is upon them, shall have that veil taken away by their turning to the Lord. So also from those prophecies of the Old Testament, which promise to that nation such kindness, favour, and salvation, as either hath not been at all as yet, or but imperfectly fulfilled; as when he promiseth to bless her with such blessings as never should be taken from her, and to show mercy to her, so as never to forsake her more. To this effect are these expressions: "As I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so I have sworn that I would not be wroth with thee nor rebuke thee (any more); for the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee," Isa. liv. 9, 10. "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and to them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord; my Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, from henceforth and for ever," Isa. lix. 20, 21. "I will make thee an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise. The sun shall be no more thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thy everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended," Isa. lx. 15. 18—20. "Everlasting joy shall be unto them, and I will make an everlasting covenant with them," Isa. lxi. 7, 8. "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken, neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate, but thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah, and thy land Beulah; for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married," Isa. lxii. 4. 12. "I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people; and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying," Isa. lxv. 19. "For as the new heavens and new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain," Isa. lxvi. 22. "And I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear me for ever, for the good of them, and of their children after them. And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them to do them good, but I will put my fear in their hearts, and they shall not depart from me," Jer. xxxii. 39, 40. "And they shall be no more a prey to the heathen, neither shall the beasts of the land devour them; but they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid. And I will raise up for them a plant of renown, and they shall be no more consumed with hunger in the land, neither bear the shame of the heathen any more," Ezek. xxxiv. 28, 29. "And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt, and they shall dwell therein, even they and their children and their children's children for ever; and my servant David shall be their prince for ever. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people," Ezek. xxxvii. 25—27. "I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there: neither will I hide my face any more from them," Ezek. xxxix. 28, 29. "And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land, which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God," Amos ix. 15.

Now it seems very evident, that scarcely any of these things can be applied to the return of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon. For, since that time, his kindness hath departed from them, and his covenant of peace hath been removed for above one thousand six hundred years; violence hath been heard in their land, wasting and destruction within their borders, and their land hath been made desolate; the days of wrath, of mourning, and of weeping, have been long upon them; their sun hath been, according to our Lord's prediction, darkened, and their moon hath not given her light; their sanctuary and tabernacle have been consumed, and they have been a prey to the heathen; they have long since ceased to be his people, and he to be their God.

Nor can we reasonably confine these promises to that little remnant which believed in the times of the apostles, for they were never gathered out of all lands, nor did they inherit the land for ever, but were banished thence, as well as the unbelieving Jews, by Hadrian; they can in no propriety of speech be styled "the house of Israel," the "whole house of Israel." Nothing, indeed, seems more unlikely, than that the time of the casting them off, the breaking of the branches, the leaving them under a spiritual slumber, the taking the kingdom from them, and casting them out into utter darkness, should be the time of the completion of these glorious promises; and that this sense cannot accord with the discourse of our apostle here, hath been already shown.

Nor, Thirdly, Can we apply these promises to the believing gentiles; for sure they could not be "a prey to the heathens," or "bear their shame," or be the people whom God hath led into captivity, and after gathered into their own land, and so planted there as never to be plucked up again; the promise could not be made to them, that they should "suck the breasts and eat the riches of the gentiles."

Fourthly, I have already shown from scripture prophecies, that, after this conversion, the nations generally "shall flow into them, and walk in their light," and so their fullness (which signifies not their incorporation into another church, but as the opposite words, their fall, their diminution, their rejection, require, and as the apostle doth himself interpret it, their reception to the Christian faith, and so into the favour of God) shall be the riches of the gentiles, and "as life from the dead" to them: then the gentiles "shall come to their light, and kings to the brightness of their rising; and nations that have not known them shall run in unto them, because God hath glorified them. Then," saith God, "I will gather all nations and tongues, and they shall come and see my glory," Isa. lv. 5, lvi., lxvi. 18. 22. Then "all nations shall turn, and fear the Lord truly," saith Tobit, xiii. 10, 11. And this I conceive to be that fullness of the gentiles of which the apostle here speaketh.

FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

§. 1. That this was an epistle written by Paul the apostle, as is asserted, i. 1, was never doubted in the church of God; but whether this was the first epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, hath been a matter of dispute; because he saith in it, "I have written to you in an epistle," (v. 9), which seemeth plainly to relate to some epistle formerly by him writ to them: for this, saith Pseud-Ambrosius, was spoken de præteritâ epistolâ quam ante hanc, quæ prima dicitur, scripserat. But, as I have observed in the note upon that verse, no fathers ever ascribed to St. Paul more than fourteen epistles, including that to the Hebrews. Eusebius never mentions any third epistle to the Corinthians, amongst the true, controverted, or spurious writings which pass under his name: no Christian writer ever cited any thing from this supposed epistle: all the Greek scholiasts declare the apostle speaketh in those words, not of another, but of this very epistle, which is sufficient to justify the version I have given of those words, "I had written," or "was writing in this epistle." Moreover, his supposed epistle to Laodicea is cited as a book exploded by Jerome;* his epistles to Seneca are in like manner cited by Jerome and Austin;† the Acts of Paul are cited and rejected by Origen and Eusebius,* but none of them makes any mention of more than two epistles to the church of Corinth.

§. 2. That this epistle was written by Paul whilst he was at Ephesus, and before he went thence to Macedonia, is clear from the very words of this epistle: for xvi. 8, he saith, "I will tarry still at Ephesus till pentecost;" and adds, ver. 19, "The churches of Asia" (of which Ephesus was the metropolis) "salute you; Aquila and Priscilla salute you, with the church which is in their house." Now that they dwelt at Ephesus we read Acts xviii. 25. That it was writ before he went thence into Macedonia, these words inform us, xvi. 5, "I will come to you when I pass through Macedonia; for I do pass through Macedonia." It is therefore generally agreed, that it was written in the fifty-seventh, as Dr. Pearson, or in the fifty-fifth year of Christ, as Dr. Lightfoot hath it. As also may be probably concluded thus: In the ninth year of Claudius, saith Orosius, in the tenth, say others, in the twelfth, saith Dr. Pearson, the Jews were banished from Rome, and St. Paul, coming into Corinth, finds Aquila and Priscilla newly come from thence to Corinth, upon that occasion (Acts xviii. 2): he stays there a year and a half (ver. 11), that is, till the eleventh of Claudius, at Ephesus three years (Acts xx. 31); and at the close of these three years he writes this epistle. If then you begin this banishment of the Jews from Rome, as Valesius doth, in the tenth of Claudius, these five years that Paul continued at Corinth and Ephesus will end in the first of Nero, A. D. 55: if, with Dr. Pearson, you begin them only at the twelth of Claudius, they will end in the third of Nero, A. D. 57.

§. 3. That the persons to whom it was written were chiefly gentiles, is evident from these words, "Ye know that ye were gentiles, carried away to these dumb idols, even as ye were led" (xii. 2): that it was also written to the Jewish converts then at Corinth, Esthius conjectures, because he saith (x. 1) that "all our fathers were under the cloud." But it is not necessary that should relate to their fathers according to the flesh, but only to the preceding church of God called before them out of Egypt, and partaking of like privileges with them: for the apostle declares, that "not they who are the children of the flesh are counted for the seed, but they who are the children of the promise" (Rom. ix. 8); and that the promise belonged not only to the seed according to the law, but "according to the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all," Rom. iv. 16 (see Gal. iii. 14. 29, iv. 28).

§. 4. The occasions of writing this epistle we may best learn from the ancients, and from the epistle itself.

First, then, The ancients inform us of this city, that "Corinth was full of rhetoricians* and philosophers, and that they gave occasion to most of those miscarriages which the apostle reprehends in this epistle."

Secondly, That there were† "Judaizers crept in among them, who magnified themselves, and debased the apostle as a great boaster, but of little worth, styling him an apostate from the law, and commanding the observation of it to them.

Thirdly, They add, that the "city of Corinth was very rich,‡ and that some of them chose themselves teachers out of the rich, as being most able to support them, as others did out of the philosophers, as being most able to teach them more than the apostle could do."

Fourthly, They say, that "the Corinthians sent questions to Paul,§ concerning marriage and virginity, by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, by whom the apostle more fully was informed of the state of their church; and therefore sent his answer to them concerning these several heads."

And, suitable to these things mentioned by the ancients, we find,

First, That the apostle spends the latter part of the first chapter, from ver. 20 to the end, in showing the vanity of the wisdom which the philosophers pretended to, in comparison to the wisdom discovered by the gospel preached by the apostles. And, chapter the second, he shows the impossibility of knowing or assenting to the things delivered by the gospel, by those who, depending on philosophy and human reason, rejected what was taught purely by revelation, and consequently the necessity of admitting that revelation of the Spirit they challenged to themselves, that the doctrine of the gospel might be made known to the world. And against both the rhetoricians and philosophers, he shows the necessity of preaching the gospel, "not in the words of human wisdom," i. 17—19, ii. 1, iii. 18, 19. 28, iv. 20.

Secondly, Because on the account of those philosophers and rhetoricians, as well as of the Judaizers, they broke out into parties and factions, he reminds them of those factions, beseeching them carefully to avoid them, i. 10, as tending to the dividing of Christ's body, ver. 13, and as indications that they were "yet carnal," iii. 4, pursuing this under his own name, and that of Apollos, through the whole third chapter; showing that they ought not to glory in men, or be puffed up for one against another, whatever were their gifts or eloquence, but give the glory of their labours unto God alone (see iv. 8).

Thirdly, Because they, who declared they were of Cephas, seem to be those Judaizers who looked on the apostle as unfaithful in his office, for rejecting the circumcision and the law, he declares that he found no occasion thus to charge himself, nor was he much concerned for their censures of him in that kind, iv. 4, 5, showing, by his sufferings, how great an evidence he had given of his fidelity in the discharge of his office, from ver. 9 to the 14th, and that he had begotten them to that faith in which they ought to stand, and follow his example, from ver. 14 to the 17th: and because, he having sent Timothy to them, they imagined he either durst not or would not come to them himself, he declares he would both come and use his apostolical authority amongst them, and try the power of them who were thus puffed up against him by reason of their human wisdom.

Fourthly, Because one of these eloquent persons had been guilty of a very heinous crime, he commands them to punish him by removing him from their society, and delivering him up to Satan. And,

Fifthly, Because being rich and wealthy (iv. 8), they were unwilling to part with their wealth, and therefore went to law, for preservation of it, before heathen judges, to the scandal of Christianity, he reprehends this vice in them, ch. vi. from ver. 1 to the 10th; and having said all this by way of preface, he begins, ch. vii., to return his answer to the questions they had sent unto him.

§. 5. There is one farther observation useful for, and worthy to be pondered by, the licentious persons of our age, that because fornication and lasciviousness were vices to which the heathens were generally addicted, and their philosophers, and perhaps some heretics, viz. the Nicolaitans, which were amongst them, maintained this was a thing indifferent, therefore the apostle, both in the Epistles to the Corinthians, and to most other churches, is very copious in showing the destructive nature of this sin. It is to be observed, that Corinth was, above all other cities, even to a proverb, infamous for fornication and lasciviousness, so that Κορινθία γυνή, "a Corinthian woman," is, in the language of the ancients, a whorish woman, according to the proverb Οὐ Κορινθία ἔοικας χοιροπωλήσειν,† Ut Corinthia videris corpore quæstum factura: and Κορινθιάζειν, Κορινθιάζεσθαι, is ἑταιρεύειν, scortationibus indulgere (Hesych. Phavor.). There was, saith Strabo,‡ in it a temple dedicated to Venus, which πλείους ἢ χιλίας ἱεροδούλους ἐκέκτητο ἑταίρας. These vices also reigned in Galatia, the worshippers of "the mother of the gods;" in Ephesus (see note on Eph. v. 5), Thessalonica, Crete (Athenæus, lib. xii. p. 527, A. 528, C.), and generally in all heathen nations. Hence the apostle is so frequent and express in his condemning this vice:

First, As a sin contrary to nature, as being against our own body (1 Cor. vi. 18): a sin of unrighteousness, to which God gave them up for their idolatry (Rom. i. 28); and a sin, which they who committed, were "given up to a reprobate mind," and knew they did things worthy of death (ver. 29. 32); a sin contrary to the moral law, or to the law of nature; for he declares that law was given for the condemning fornicators (1 Tim. i. 10).

Secondly, As a sin contrary to the Christian faith, and inconsistent with it. "Know ye not," saith he, "that your bodies are the members of Christ; shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot? God forbid!" (1 Cor. vi. 15.) And again, "But fornication, and all uncleanness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints" (Eph. v. 3); "for God hath not called us to uncleanness, but unto holiness. He therefore that despiseth this his call, despiseth not man but God, who also hath given us of his Spirit" (1 Thess. iv. 7, 8). Hence he declares it to be contrary to the sound doctrine of the gospel (1 Tim. i. 10, 11), and forbids Christians to eat with any brother who is a fornicator (1 Cor. v. 11).

Thirdly, As being a sin which will exclude the fornicator from the kingdom of God. "Be not deceived," saith he, "no fornicator shall inherit the kingdom of God" (Gal. vi. 10, 11). To the Galatians he speaks thus, "The works of the flesh are manifest; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness: of which I tell you again, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (Gal. v. 19—21). To the Ephesians thus, "This know ye, that no fornicator, nor unclean person, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, or of God" (John v. 5). They, saith John, shall be excluded from the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxii. 15.)

Fourthly, As that which will assuredly expose them to the wrath of God. For thus he speaks to the Colossians; "Mortify your earthly members, fornication and uncleanness; for which things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience" (Col. iii. 5, 6). To the Ephesians thus, "Be not deceived with vain words, for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience" (Eph. v. 6).

Fifthly, As that which will subject them to eternal punishment. For "whoremongers and adulterers κρινεῖ ὁ Θεός, God will adjudge to condemnation" (Heb. xiii. 4): the portion of the whoremonger shall be assigned him "in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone" (Rev. xxi. 8).

§. 6. And this is all that I at first intended by way of preface to this epistle. But finding that the doctrine of the resurrection of the same body which dieth, is now either questioned, or thought unnecessary to be believed, though anciently the very heathens looked upon it as a fundamental doctrine of Christianity, and the ground of their most raised hopes; and upon this account they burnt the very bones of Christian martyrs, and reduced them to ashes, and then threw those ashes into the river Rhodanus, or Rhone, that so they might defeat "the hope of a resurrection, which enabled the Christians to suffer death with alacrity, and to endure all kinds of torments for their religion;"* which sure had been a vain attempt had not the Christian doctrine promised, as the foundation of their hopes, the resurrection of the same body thus consumed, but only of some other body in its stead; and seeing the fifteenth chapter of this epistle is the seat of that controversy—I shall therefore endeavour briefly to evince two things:—

1. That it was certainly the received doctrine of the professors of the Christian faith.

2. That it is truly grounded on the scriptures, and therefore ought to be owned as an article of Christian faith. And,

1. That it was certainly the ancient and received doctrine of the orthodox professors of the Christian faith, is evident,

First, From the second epistle of Clemens Romanus,† writ in the first century; for there he doth expressly caution Christians against the denial of this article, in these words,—"Let none of you say that this same flesh shall not be judged, for as you were called in the flesh, so shall you come in the flesh to judgment, and in this very flesh shall you receive your reward." And in his First Epistle, to prove that God will raise them from the dead, who have served him in holiness, he cites those words from Job xix. 25, 26, ἀναστήσεις τὴν σάρκά μου ταύτην, "Thou wilt raise up this my flesh, which hath suffered all these things."

Secondly, From Irenæus,* who in the second century makes this one article of faith of the whole church received from the apostles, and kept, taught, and delivered in all places with the greatest care and uniformity; viz. that Christ will come from heaven in glory, ἀναστῆσαι πᾶσαν σάρκα πάσης ἀνθρωπότητος, "to raise up all flesh of all mankind." Tertullian,† in the third century, producing the Christian's creed as the rule of faith, which came from Christ, and was by his companions handed down to the church, "the institution of Christ, which all nations ought to believe," makes this one article of it, that "Christ will come to judge the quick and dead;" factâ utriusque partis resuscitatione cum carnis restitutione, or per carnis resurrectionem, "by raising and restoring of their flesh." Accordingly, the article of "the resurrection of the flesh;" or, as the Aquileian Symbol hath it, hujus carnis, "of this flesh;" or, as other confessions have it, "of their bodies," hath been received in all Christian churches. And they have been condemned as heretics from the beginning of the second century, who denied σαρκὸς ἀνάστασιν,‡ "the resurrection of the flesh; et carnis salutem et regenerationem ejus, dicentes non eam capacem esse incorruptibilitatis,§ "the life and reproduction of the flesh, saying, it was incapable of incorruption;" as did the Valentinians,‖ the Basilidians, and the Marcionites, say the fathers.

§. 7. I proceed, secondly, to show, that this doctrine of the primitive Christians is truly grounded on the scriptures, and therefore ought to be received and owned as an article of Christian faith. This I prove,

1. From all those places which speak of the resurrection of the body; these places I shall produce, for their sakes who "do not remember, in any place of the New Testament, any such expression as the resurrection of the body;" v. g. "He that raised Jesus from the dead, ζωοποιήσει καὶ, shall also make alive your mortal bodies" (Rom. viii. 11); that is, he shall raise them from the dead: for that ζωοποιεῖν and ἐγείρειν, to quicken and raise up, are, with relation to this matter, words of the same import, we learn from these words: "As the Father, ἐγείρει τοὺς νεκροὺς, καὶ ζωοποιεῖ, raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, so the Son ζωοποιεῖ quickeneth whom he will" (John v. 21). Again, saith the apostle, "How are the dead raised up?" i. e. the bodies of the dead; it follows, καὶ ποίῳ σώματι, "and with what kind of bodies do they come" forth of the grave? (1 Cor. xv. 35.) So ver. 44, It is sown a natural body, it is raised σῶμα πνευματικόν, "a spiritual body." And still more evidently, τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο, "this corruptible (body) must put on incorruption, καὶ τὸ θνητὸν τοῦτο, and this mortal (body) must put on immortality" (ver. 53). "So when this corruptible (body) shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal (body) put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." If any one likes not my addition of σῶμα, body, to the pronoun and adjective, four times here mentioned, I desire him to find out, if he can, another substantive; if he cannot, he must confess the resurrection of the body is here mentioned four times: for the apostle argues thus, "The dead shall be raised up, δεῖ γὰρ, for this corruptible (body) must put on incorruption;" and when this is done, then death, which only happens to this corruptible mortal body, "shall be swallowed up in victory."

It is said, that "he who reads with attention this discourse of Paul, where he speaks of the resurrection, will see that he plainly distinguisheth between the dead that shall be raised, and the bodies of the dead; for it is νεκροὶ, πάντες οἱ, which are the nominative cases to ἐγείρονται, ζωοποιηθήσονται, ἐγερθήσονται, all along, and not σώματα, bodies, which one may in reason think would somewhere or other have been expressed, if all this had been said to propose it as an article of faith, that the same bodies shall be raised." The same manner of speaking the Spirit of God observes all through the New Testament, where it is said, "raise the dead," "quicken" or "make alive the dead," the "resurrection of the dead," Matt. xxii. 27. 52, John v. 28, 29, Rom. iv. 17, 2 Cor. i. 9, 1 Thess. iv. 16.

Ans. I hope the instances produced already are sufficient to confute this observation; I shall, therefore, go on farther to observe and prove, that the resurrection of the dead is by the apostle used with plain relation to the bodies of the dead: so that he even proves the resurrection of the dead, because the body is raised, and so doth not "plainly distinguish betwixt the dead that shall be raised, and the bodies of the dead." This is evident enough from what I have observed already, that the apostle proves οἱ νεκροὶ ἐγερθήσονται, "the dead shall be raised," because "the corruptible body must put on incorruption," &c. But it is still more evident from these words: "So is also ἀνάστασις τῶν νεκρῶν, the resurrection of the dead; for it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption," ver. 42, 43, where I desire to know what is the nominative case to ἐγείρεται, "it is raised," used three times here? If it be σῶμα, body, I have sufficiently confuted this criticism; it be not, why doth the apostle so expound it in the immediate ensuing words, "It is sown a natural body, ἐγείρεται σῶμα πνευματικόν, it is raised a spiritual body?"

I add, that this appears almost from all the places cited, that the οἱ νεκροὶ, and the πάντες ἀποθνήσκοντες, "the dead," and "the all dying," hath relation to the body only, which, being that alone which is by death bereft of life, must be that only which, in propriety of speech, is said to die. Thus, when it is said, "These very words, urged for the resurrection of the same body, run thus, πάντες οἱ ἐν τοῖς μνημείοις, 'All that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good εἰς ἀνάστασιν ζωῆς, to the resurrection of life, but they that have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation:'" and is then added, "Would not a well-meaning searcher be apt to think, that if the thing here intended by our Saviour were to teach and propose it as an article of faith, necessary to be believed by every one, that the very same bodies of the dead should be raised, the words should rather have been πάντα τὰ σώματα τὰ ἐν τοῖς μνημείοις, i. e. 'all the bodies that are in the graves,' rather than 'all who are in their graves;' which must denote persons, and not precisely bodies?"

To this I answer, (1.) that the words πάντες οἱ ἐν τοῖς μνημείοις, i. e. "all that are in the graves," and πάντα τὰ σώματα τὰ ἐν τοῖς μνημείοις, "all the bodies that are in the graves," are plainly words of the same import. For what is laid down in the graves or sepulchres? is it not σώματα τῶν κεκοιμημένων "the bodies of them that sleep" only? (Matt. xxvii. 52,) and must it not then be those bodies that come forth of them? May we not discern, in the passage now cited, how the Holy Ghost passes immediately from the bodies of the saints that slept, to their persons, saying, "The bodies of the saints that slept arose, καὶ ἐξελθόντες ἐκ τῶν μνημείων, and they, coming out of their graves after his resurrection, went into the holy city, and appeared unto many?" (ver. 53.)

(2.) When God said to Adam, what was also true of his posterity, "In sorrow shalt thou eat thy bread, until thou return to the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. iii. 19); and the psalmist, of man in general, "His breath (or spirit) goeth forth; he returneth to his earth" (Ps. cxlvi. 5): will any one be tempted, from these personal demonstrative pronouns, thou and he, to say that these words must denote the persons, and not precisely the bodies of men? and thence infer, that the whole person of Adam was taken out of the earth, and was but dust, and that the whole person of man "returneth to his earth?" If not, why is it argued that the like pronoun οἱ, they, must here denote persons, and not precisely bodies? Are we not told that the word person stands for a thinking intelligent being, that has reason and reflection, and can consider itself as itself? And can they who are in their graves do this? If so, surely they are not dead in them, but buried alive: if they cannot, why must these words οἱ ἐν τοῖς μνημείοις denote persons?

But it is said, that, "according to this interpretation of these words of our Saviour, no other substance being raised but what hears his voice; and no other substance hearing his voice, but what, being called, comes out of the grave; and no other substance coming out of the grave, but what was in the grave, any one must conclude that the soul, unless it be in the grave, will make no part of the person that is raised."

Ans. To this I answer, that any one may reasonably hence conclude, that the soul makes no raised part of him that is raised, or that it is not called, or raised out of the grave, as the body is; but by what logic can we hence conclude it makes no part of the raised person? For instance, we profess in our creed to believe that "Jesus Christ died, and rose again," i. e. from the grave: and saith Peter, "This Jesus hath God raised up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was impossible he should be holden of it" (Acts ii. 24. 32): now because nothing can be raised from the dead but that which died, nothing can be raised from the grave but what was laid in it; shall we hence infer, that the soul of the Lord Jesus, or his spirit (which he commended into his Father's hands, and which went to paradise), unless it died, and was in the grave, could make no part of the person which was dead, and was raised from the dead, and out of the grave? When our Lord says (ver. 28, 29), "They that were in the graves shall come forth to the resurrection of life;" and (ver. 25), "The dead shall live:" what can live again but that which was dead? What can have a resurrection to life, but that which had no life; and was not that the body only? Yea, are not these things said in pursuance of what went before: "As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth (or gives life to) them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." Now what can be raised from the dead, but that which was dead? What can be quickened, or have life given to it, but that which had no life? If then that were the body only, must not the raising of the dead and quickening them import only the raising and quickening of the body, although this be performed completely by the union of the soul to the raised body?

Secondly, That, in our Saviour's discourse against the sadducees, περὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως τῶν νεκρῶν, "touching the resurrection of the dead," he also speaks of raising that which was dead, i. e. the body, is evident from this, that he saith of them who partake of that resurrection, οὐκ ἔτι ἀποθανεῖν δύνανται, "They can die no more" (Matt. xxii., Mark xii., Luke xx. 35, 36), which can be only spoken of that body which died before.

Thirdly, We read of God τοῦ ζωοποιοῦντος τοὺς νεκροὺς "quickening the dead" (Rom. iv. 7). Now what doth he quicken, but what was dead? What doth he give life to, but that which ceased to have life, that is, the body?

Fourthly, Paul saith, "We had in ourselves the sentence of death, that we might not trust in ourselves, but in God, τῷ ἐγείροντι τοὺς νεκρούς, who raiseth the dead" (2 Cor. i. 9). Now what was this "sentence of death?" Did Paul and his Christian companions believe the whole man should be killed by their persecutors? or, as their Lord had taught them, that they "could kill the body," but "could not kill the soul?" (Matt. x. 26.) Doth he not say in their names, that that which "perished," or was corrupted, was only ὁ ἔξω ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος, "our outward man" (2 Cor. iv. 16), in opposition to the "inward man?" That, whilst they lived, they were "at home in the body," and that at death they did ἐκδημῆσαι ἐκ τοῦ σώματος, "dwell out of the body" (2 Cor. iv. 16), or, as to the soul, were absent from it? And must not then "the sentence of death," they had in themselves, be only this, that their bodies might die by the hands of persecutors; that their outward man might perish by them? And must not then their trust in God, "that raiseth the dead," relate to his raising their dead bodies?

Fifthly, The dead in Christ that shall be raised (1 Thess. iv. 16), are they that sleep (ver. 13. 15), that is, that "sleep in the dust" (Dan. xii. 2): now is it not τὰ σώματα, "the bodies of the saints" that thus sleep (Matt. xxvii. 52), and must not then the apostle speak of them only? Is not this spoken to comfort the Thessalonians, "concerning them that were asleep?" (ver. 13. 18;) and were they troubled for the souls of them that slept in Jesus? (ver. 14;) or doth the apostle say any thing to comfort them, but that which relates to the body only? And will it not hence follow that what he there saith, touching the resurrection of the dead, concerneth their dead bodies only?—Thus have I shown that all the places here cited, as speaking of the resurrection of the dead, refer to the resurrection of the bodies.

§. 8. But farther, had not the scripture so expressly spoken of raising our mortal bodies, of raising that "a spiritual body" which was "sown a natural body," and proved "the dead shall be raised," because "this corruptible shall put on incorruption;" and could it not be proved, that raising of the dead, and of the bodies of the dead, were in import the same, this article might be established from other passages of scripture, speaking the same thing in effect; as, v. g.

First, "We who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, groan within ourselves, expecting υἱοθεσίαν the sonship, even the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 23). Now what is this redemption τοῦ σώματος ἡμῶν, "of our body," but the delivery of it "from the bondage of corruption?" (ver. 21.) What did they "groan" for? It was, saith the same apostle, "that mortality might be swallowed up of life" (2 Cor. v. 4, 5), which only is to be done "when this mortal body shall put on immortality," saith the same apostle; this therefore was to be done to accomplish "the redemption of the body" spoken of: and is not then the redemption, and the resurrection of the body, in effect the same?

Secondly, "We expect that Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ from heaven, who shall change τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμων, our vile body into the likeness of his glorious body" (Phil. iii. 20, 21). The body therefore to be changed is σῶμα ἡμῶν, "our body," "the body of our humiliation," so styled, as Methodius saith, because ταπεινοῦται ἀπὸ σφάλματος, "it is humbled and made mortal by the fall;" or, as Irenæus (lib. v. cap. 13), quòd et humiliatur cadens in terram, "because it is humbled by falling into the earth." This body is therefore to be thus changed when our Lord cometh down from heaven, that is, at the resurrection of it; for "the Lord shall descend from heaven, and the dead in Christ shall rise first" (1 Thess. iv. 16). Is it not therefore manifest from these words, that our "vile mortal bodies," fallen into the earth, or laid in it, shall be raised, and by or at the resurrection, shall be "changed into the likeness of Christ's glorious body?"

Now hence I argue for the resurrection of the same body thus: If the scripture teacheth that there shall be a "quickening," by raising up "our mortal bodies," a "redemption," by the resurrection of our bodies, a "changing" of our bodies, at and by the resurrection, "into the likeness of Christ's glorious body," it seems sufficiently to say, there shall be a resurrection of the same body which before was mortal, and change by it, of the same body which was vile, or humble; and a redemption by it from corruption, of the same body which was formerly "in bondage to corruption;" for all this must be said of the same body, or not of the same body: if of the same body, then the same body must be raised; if not of the same body, then of another: and how then is it said of our body? How are these other bodies, τὰ θνητὰ σώματα ὑμῶν, "your mortal bodies" (Rom. viii. 11); the redemption of them, "the redemption τοῦ σώματος ἡμῶν" the change of them, "the change τοῦ σώματος ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν, of our mortal vile bodies?"

Secondly, When the apostle saith,* "this corruptible," "this mortal body," does he mean this body of ours, or does he not? If he does mean this mortal, corruptible body of ours, then he asserts of that, that it shall be raised immortal and incorruptible; if he does not mean it of ours, he must mean it of some other body than ours, and how then is that "raised a spiritual body," which was "sown a natural body?" How doth "this mortal put on immortality?" How are we concerned in the resurrection of another body? Or what assurance doth it give us, that we shall rise from the dead, seeing, when any of us departs this life, it is our body that dies, and not another's? Yea, why then doth he say, "The dead shall rise, and we," that are living, "shall be changed?"—"We shall all be changed;" i. e. "our vile bodies shall be changed into the likeness of Christ's glorious body?" our mortal bodies into immortal; our natural bodies shall be changed by being raised spiritual bodies. Let any man try his utmost skill, and see if he can find any nominative case to σπείρεται, "it is sown," used here four times, but σῶμα, body, or understand this of any other body than ours: seeing then the same word is the nominative case to ἐγείρεται, "it is raised," which was so to σπείρεται, "it is sown," the apostle must be supposed to say, this body of ours is raised in incorruption.

§. 9. Arg. 2. To proceed to other scriptures of like import: "All that are in their graves shall come forth," saith Christ, ἐκπορεύσονται ἐκ τῶν μνημείων, "they shall come out of the graves in which they were" (John v. 28, 29). Shall they come forth with the same body which was laid in the grave, or with another? If with the same, then the same body must be raised; if with another, how came these graves to be called their graves, and how are the dead, and they that are in the graves, raised out of them, and not another?

Again, when it is said, "The sea gave up the dead, ἐν αὐτῇ in it, and death and hades, (the place of the dead,) gave up the dead in them" (Rev. xx. 13): did they give up the same bodies which were laid down in them, or some others? The first is the thing contended for: if they gave up some others, how did they give up the dead that were laid down in them?

To say that "a greater part of these dead bodies possibly may have undergone variety of changes, and entered into other concretions, even in the bodies of other men," is to me no objection against the raising of the same body, if God hath engaged so to do; for then, as he is able, so is his providence concerned to prevent the entering of one body so into the concretion of another, as to hinder it from being the same body when raised, as it was when laid down in the sea, or grave; and I know "what he hath promised he is able to perform."

Lastly, Even the phrase "the resurrection of the dead,"* and especially the resurrection ἐκ νεκρῶν, "from the dead," used Col. i. 18, Rev. i. 15, where Christ is styled "the firstborn of those that arise from the dead," proves this. For the proper notion of a resurrection consists in this, that it is a substantial change, by which that which was before, and died, or was corrupted, is reproduced the same thing again. I call it a change of that which died, or was corrupted, disjunctively, because in the resurrection of our Lord, and of Lazarus, and others whom he raised from the dead, the body was not corrupted. Hence it follows,

(1.) That the soul, which is immortal and incorruptible, cannot be said to rise again, resurrection implying a reproduction; whereas that which, after it was, never ceased to be what it was, cannot be reproduced; and so the resurrection of the dead† can only signify the resurrection of the bodies of the dead, with the reunion of them to those souls to which they were before united, which makes this resurrection advance into a resurrection of life. And seeing that which never fell cannot be said to be raised up, that which did never die cannot be restored from death; men cannot properly be said to rise again from the dead, but in respect to that part, or that state, which had fallen and was dead. And as for a man to be born at first signifies the production and union of the essential parts of an individual man, his body and his soul: so to be born again, or born from the dead, implies the restitution and reunion of his body and his soul; a man only by that becoming the same entire person which he was before. Seeing therefore it is acknowledged, that "the same persons shall be raised," yea, that "there can be nothing plainer than that in the scripture it is revealed, that the same persons shall be raised, and appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, to answer for what they have done in the body;" and the same person cannot be raised without the raising of his body to be united to his soul, much less be raised from the dead, without raising that of him which was dead, which only was his own, and not another body, which before was not part of him: it follows that, if the same person be raised from the dead, that of them which was dead, or their own bodies, must be raised; and so the meaning of the scripture, when it saith, the same persons shall be raised, must be this, that their bodies, separated from their souls by death, shall be raised from the dead.

Moreover, by saying that the resurrection is only of that which died, or was corrupted, it appears, that I, with the ancients, only assert the resurrection of that body which died or was corrupted, and am not in the least concerned for any changes that it underwent before; and so the scripture forces me to speak, when it styles the resurrection, the quickening of the dead; the vivification of our mortal bodies; the raising of those bodies which were sown in corruption; the coming forth of them which were in their graves; the awakening of them that sleep in the dust of the earth; and saith that then the sea, and hades, shall give up their dead, allowing a resurrection only to them that shall then be dead, and saying only of them that shall be found alive "They shall be changed." And if this only be the true sense of the scripture in this matter, and this only the resurrection there intended, it cannot be concerned in the least in what the philosophers say touching the change the body undergoes whilst living, though I am far from thinking, that, to the raising the same bodies, it can be requisite that these bodies should be made up wholly of the same particles, which were once vitally united to their souls in their former life, without the mixture of any other particle of matter: for were this necessary to the same living body, we could not have the same bodies for a day; and if it be not necessary to make the body continue still the same while we live, it cannot be necessary to make the raised body the same with that which died.

That which here seems to me of greatest moment to be considered is this, that the dead being raised that they may be "judged according to their works" (Rev. xx. 12), and "that every one may receive τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος, the things done by the body," as the instrument of the soul, it is only requisite that the dying body, which is to be raised to the "resurrection of condemnation," should be then united to a soul, sentenced hereafter to condemnation for the evils done whilst in the body, and by the body as its instrument, and not repented of, and reformed, before its separation from the body. And, that the body should be raised to "the resurrection of life," it is only requisite that, some time or other before its death, it should have been united to a soul that truly repented of all its past sins, and did, from thenceforward, do that which was "lawful and right" whilst they were thus united: now seeing this is the state of all bodies which arise to "the resurrection of life," or "of condemnation," it is only necessary to this last resurrection that it should be the raising the bodies of men dying in their sins, as in my hypothesis it is, and that the bodies, raised to the resurrection of life, should be the bodies of men dying in the favour of God; it is therefore only necessary their dying bodies should arise. And now the argument arising from these scriptures, which teach that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, and so of their dead bodies, "that every one may receive according to what he hath done in (or by) the body," will run thus:

Either the body is to be raised, and reunited to the soul, to receive rewards and punishments with it, or to be the instrument by which the soul shall be rewarded or punished; or it is not: if not to any of these ends, why is it raised at all? why do good men, by the direction of the Holy Spirit, "expect the resurrection of the body?" or why is it propounded as their great encouragement, to be "steadfast, immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord?" (1 Cor. xv. 58, 1 Thess. iv. 18,) and as a comfort to them that mourn for the dead? Why are the wicked to be "punished with everlasting fire," or said to "go away" after the resurrection "into eternal punishment?" (Matt. xxv. 41. 46.) Or why doth our Saviour require us, "not to fear them who can kill the body, but can do no more," in comparison of him who can "destroy both soul and body in hell-fire?" (Matt. x. 28,) and say that "it is better one of thy members perish, than that thy whole body should be cast into hell-fire?" (Matt. v. 29, 30). If it be to be raised for these ends, it is necessary the same body should be raised which sinned with, or was the instrument of the soul in doing good or evil, it being absurd to think, that one body should sin, and another should be punished for it; or that one body should suffer, and another should be crowned for it: and, for any thing I can discern to the contrary, we might as well appear before Christ's judgment-seat without any body at all, as without that which we deposited. Let it now be remembered, that the body, in which the impenitent is to suffer, is only the same body which was laid down in the grave, and then the arguments usually offered to invalidate his suffering in his own body, or in the same body in which he sinned, will be almost as strong to excuse a murderer from suffering in his body for a murder committed twenty years ago, as to the purposes they are used in this case: nay, I have met with nothing said in this affair, which does not prove as strongly that the body of our blessed Lord, born of the Virgin Mary, after he had sucked and digested that milk into chyle, was not the same body which was born of the Virgin, as not having all the same individual particles, and then, when he grew in stature, he grew into another body, and so into a body which came not from the loins of Abraham, and was not "of the seed of David according to the flesh;" and that, when the Jews destroyed his body, they destroyed not that body of which he spake, when he said, "Destroy this body," because the body they destroyed had by perspiration lost, and by nutrition gained, many particles.

§. 10. I come now to answer the objections against this article; viz.

"The appellation the apostle bestows on him that enters into this inquiry, Whether the dead shall have the same bodies or no? seems not much to encourage him in that inquiry; nor will he, by the remainder of Paul's answer, find the determination of the apostle to be much in favour of the very same body, unless the being told, that the body sown is not the body that shall be; that the body raised is as different from that which was laid down as the flesh of a man is from the flesh of beasts, fishes, and birds; or as the sun, moon, and stars, are different from one another; or as different as a corruptible, weak, natural, mortal body is from an incorruptible, powerful, spiritual, immortal body; and, lastly, as a body that is flesh and blood is from a body that is not flesh and blood; for flesh and blood cannot (says Paul, in this very place) inherit the kingdom of God; unless, I say, all this, which is contained in St. Paul's words, can be supposed to be the way to deliver this as an article of faith, which is required to be believed of every one."

Now to this I answer:

First, That it seems to me a great mistake, to say the apostle in that appellation, "Thou fool," reflects upon him that inquires, Whether the same body which was dead shall be raised or no? He had already entirely dispatched that question against those philosophers who said there is no resurrection* (ver. 12), and that the resurrection of the body was a thing impossible (ver. 15). He begins the inquiry, not about the truth of the resurrection, but about the manner in which it shall be made, and the qualities which the raised bodies should have, asking the question of philosophers,† ποίῳ σώματι, with what kind of bodies, or with what qualified bodies do they come? For they conceiving that the body was the prison of the soul, and that it was her punishment to be tied to it, thought we could not be truly happy, till, by death, we were delivered from it; they therefore judged it an unjust and an unworthy thing for God to raise these bodies to be united to the souls of good men; and therefore Celsus saith, "The hope of the resurrection of the flesh is the hope of worms, a filthy and abominable thing, and so a thing which God neither will nor can do" (see all this proved from their own words, in the note upon this verse). Now to this objection the apostle returns a full and satisfactory answer, by showing the happy change which will then pass upon the raised body, and the excellent qualities it shall then have, and which were wanting to it, whilst it was on earth.*

Secondly, When the apostle adds, ver. 37, "That which thou sowest (when thou sowest it) is not that body which shall be (again produced), but bare (or naked) grain;" it is evident he speaketh there not of the body of man, but of the body "of wheat, or of some other grain," and is there still pursuing the same question, "With what kind of bodies do they come?" answering, as it was common with the Jews to do, by this very similitude, to a like question among them, viz. Whether the body should arise naked, or clothed upon?† and therefore saith, "Thou sowest not the body which shall be," i. e. a body clothed with a shell, as in peas, beans, and lentils; or with a hull, or chaff, as in wheat, rye, barley: but γυμνὸν κόκκον, "naked grain," whereas God raiseth it up clothed: and so, saith he, will it be with our bodies at the resurrection; they will not be raised γυμνὰ "naked," but ἐνδυσάμενα, "clothed upon," for "this corruptible body must put on incorruption" (2 Cor. v. 2—4). This being then the whole intendment of this similitude, it ought not to be urged any farther.

Thirdly, The same is evidently the apostle's purpose in the following verses, which in sense run thus:

Ver. 39. "(And as) all flesh is not the same (manner or kind of) flesh, but there is one kind of flesh of men, another (kind of) flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds:

Ver. 40. "(And as there is a like difference in the qualities of bodies, for) there are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another:

Ver. 41. "(And as in the celestial bodies) there is one glory of the sun, and another of the moon, and another of the stars (among themselves); for one star differeth from another star in glory:

Ver. 42. "So also is (it, as to) the resurrection of the dead (the body raised being in qualities much different from the body we now have, for) it is sown in corruption (frail, mortal, subject to putrefaction,) it is raised in incorruption," &c. Now from the words thus paraphrased, let it be noted;

First, That the apostle says not, that the body raised is as different from that which is laid down, as the flesh of man is from the flesh of beasts, fishes, and birds; or, as the sun, moon, and stars, are different from one another; but only as the flesh of men differs in quality from that of beasts, fishes, and birds, and as the sun, moon, and stars, differ in their glorious qualities from one another; so do our raised bodies differ in quality from those earthly bodies we at present have; as is evident from the ensuing words, in which he mentions this difference betwixt them in qualities. Note,

Secondly, That in the instances of flesh of man and beasts, and of celestial and terrestrial bodies, and of celestial bodies among themselves, here used by the apostle, there is not only a difference as to qualities, but also as to the subject-matter, that being in them only specifically, but not numerically the same; whereas it is not so as to our bodies sown and raised, they differing only as to the qualities from the body sown, but not as to the subject-matter, it being "this corruptible body" which "must put on incorruption." As therefore the different qualities of divers souls, good and bad, learned and unlearned, made glorious and miserable, infer a difference in substance, because the subject of those qualities is not the same; but when the same soul becomes virtuous and learned, all this new ornament of grace and knowledge, and even its advancement to a state of perfect happiness and glory, makes it not cease to be the same soul still: so it is here as to the difference of glorious qualities, the raised body hath above the body sown. I therefore,

Thirdly, Grant that the raised body is as different from the earthly body we at present have, as a corruptible, weak, natural, mortal body is from an incorruptible, powerful, spiritual, immortal body; but then the subject of these different qualities being still the same, this difference hinders not its being the same body still, since otherwise Christ's body, being also raised an incorruptible, powerful, immortal body, could not be the same with that in which he suffered, and if his body is still the same that suffered, and was raised from the dead, then a like change of our vile bodies will not hinder their being still the same.

But it is still objected, that "the body raised is as different from the bodies we at present have, and lay down in the grave, as a body, that is flesh and blood, is from a body that is not flesh and blood; for 'flesh and blood,' (saith St. Paul) 'cannot inherit the kingdom.'"

Ans. To this I answer, (1.) ab absurdo, that if even this hinder the body raised from being the same body, our Saviour cannot now have the same body with that which he suffered in, or which was raised from the dead; for doubtless he is entered into, and doth inherit, the kingdom of God: if therefore "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and the body which hath not flesh and blood cannot be the same body with that which hath flesh and blood; our Saviour's glorified body cannot be the same body which was raised from the dead, or in which he suffered.

Secondly, I answer, that flesh and blood do, in the scripture language, denote the weakness and the frailty of that which is compounded of them, as when it is said, "We wrestle not with flesh and blood," i. e. weak frail men, Eph. vi. 12 (see Matt. xvi. 17, Gal. i. 16, Heb. ii. 14, Ecclus. xiv. 18). And thus it is true, that flesh and blood, that is, such weak frail bodies as they are, which here consist of flesh and blood, unchanged into incorruptible bodies, or unclothed upon with their celestial bodies, which will keep them from mortality, or a possibility of corruption (ver. 48, 49, 2 Cor. v. 1, 2), "cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" and therefore the apostle adds, that "this mortal must put on immortality, this corruptible put on incorruption," and so it shall be changed, as to its qualities: but then I have shown that this change from mortal and corruptible, to an immortal and incorruptible body, hinders not its being still the same body, that is, the same in substance as it was before.

Thirdly, I think it is evident, from the apostle's words, that the bodies of good men, then living, shall have the same qualities with the bodies of them who are raised from the dead, for they also shall "inherit the kingdom of God;" they shall have spiritual, powerful, immortal bodies; their bodies, saith he, "shall be changed; for this corruptible must put on incorruption:" and yet can it be thought that this change shall amount to the destruction of that body they then had, and the production of another body, as it must do, if they cease to have the same body which they had before this change? If it do not, it is hence evident that the body may still be the same body, notwithstanding the great change which shall then pass upon it.

In a word, what the apostle says here, evidently concerns only the bodies of good men, and so gives us no cause to think the bodies of the wicked shall be changed at all; and if the wicked shall be raised with the same bodies to the resurrection of condemnation, why not the good with the same bodies to the resurrection of life?

* Non considerat apostolus in hâc similitudine diversitatem rei, sed qualitatis et conditionis, quod et quæstio requirebat, Quali corpore veniunt? Itaque falluntur, qui, ex his apostoli verbis, corpora non eadem secundùm substantiam resuscitanda esse colligunt: quod qui dicunt, resurrectionem revera tollunt, non enim resurgit nisi id ipsum quod cecidit. CHAPTER I.

1 Paul, called to be an apostle (or the called apostle) of Jesus Christ through the will of God, and Sosthenes our brother,

2 Unto [1] the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints (or, the saints called), [2] with all that in every place [3] call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, [4] (yea) both their's and our's:

3 [5] Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

4 I thank my God always on your behalf, [6] for the grace of God which is given you by (or in) Jesus Christ;

5 That in every thing ye are (or, have been) enriched by him, [7] in all utterance (of tongues), and in all knowledge (of divine mysteries, or, in the gift of prophecy, 1 Cor. xiv.);

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 2. Τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, The church of God.] The "sanctified in Christ Jesus, the saints called," seem here to be words of the same import, denoting such as are called out of the world, and separated from others, through faith in Christ, to be a peculiar people to God, as the Jews were before: all Christians being, by virtue of this calling, "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people" (1 Pet. ii. 9): though many members of the church of Corinth, and of other churches, wanted the inward sanctification of the Holy Spirit. So that the word saints in many places of the Acts and the epistles, is as large as the word Christians, and stands opposed not to the unsound Christians, but to the heathen world; Acts ix. 13. 32. 41, xxvi. 10, 1 Cor. vi. 1, 2 (see here, 1 Cor. xiv. 33, xvi. 1. 15, 2 Cor. viii. 4, ix. 1. 12, xiii. 13).

[2] With all that in every place.] Here it appears that St. Paul's epistles, though occasionally written and directed to particular churches, were designed for the use of all Christians.

[3] Τοῖς ἐπικαλουμένοις ὄνομα Κυρίου, That call upon the name of the Lord Jesus.] This, in the New Testament, is the character of a Christian, that he is one that "calleth on his name," Acts ix. 14. 21, xxii. 16, Rom. x. 12, 13, 2 Tim. ii. 22. And that these words ought not to be rendered passively, viz. "all that are called by the name of Christ," is evident from the Septuagint, who still translate the phrase יקרא בשם, which is active, by ἐπικαλέσεται ἐν ὀνόματι Θεοῦ, or ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου, i. e. "He shall call on the name of the Lord" (see Gen. iv. 26, xii. 8, xiii. 4, xxi. 33, xxv. 25, Ps. lxxix. 6, xcix. 6, cxvi. 4, Isa. lxv. 1, Lam. iii. 55, Zech. xiii. 9). But when the phrase runs thus, יכבד נקרא, that is, "Thy name is called upon," or, "We are called by thy name," it is rendered thus, τὸ ὄνομά σου ἐπικέκληται ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, Duct. xxviii. 10, 1 Kings viii. 43, 2 Chron. vii. 14, Isa. iv. 1, lxiii. 19, Jer. xiv. 9, xv. 16, Dan. ix. 18, 19, Amos ix. 12 (see the note on Acts ix. 2, xxii. 16).

Secondly, We are expressly told that the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch, Acts xi. 26. Now, before this time, we find not only Stephen ἐπικαλούμενον, "calling upon" this name, and saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit" (Acts vii. 59), and Paul bid to wash away his sins, "calling upon the name of the Lord," or ἐπικαλούμενος τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου (Acts xxii. 16), but we find this to have been the character of a disciple, or a convert to the faith of Christ, that he was one that called upon the name of the Lord. Thus Ananias speaks to the Lord Jesus of St. Paul, "He is one who hath received power from the high-priest, to bind τοὺς ἐπικαλουμένους τὸ ὄνομά σου, all that called upon thy name" (Acts ix. 14), and of Paul, converted, it is said, that he had destroyed τοὺς ἐπικαλουμένους τὸ ὄνομα τοῦτο, "them that called upon this name in Jerusalem" (ver. 21).

Thirdly, The reverend Dr. Hammond, who here translates this phrase passively, doth elsewhere translate it actively, the context forcing him so to do. So Rom. x. 13, "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord," i. e. pray and adhere to Christ, "shall be saved;" and, Acts ix. 14, "He hath authority to bind all that call upon thy name," i. e. saith he, that publicly own the worship of Christ (Acts xxii. 16).

[4] Yea, both theirs and ours.] All the Greek interpreters, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, observe, that the words "theirs and ours," are to be connected with the word "Lord," τὸ δὲ αὐτῶν τε καὶ ἡμῶν τῷ Κυρίῳ συνλρμοσαται· and so the sense is this, The Lord, I say, both of me who write, and you to whom I write.

[5] Ver. 3. Χάρις ὑμῖν, &c.] It is unadvisedly said by some, that this is a wish, and not a prayer. The full import of the phrase is, as Peter, 2 Pet. i. 2, and Jude, ver. 2, and Polycarp* do cite it, viz. "Grace and peace be multiplied to you from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." Now, is not this to desire for them grace and peace from God the Father, and consequently to pray for it? Why, therefore, is it not also to desire the same blessings from God the Son? Are they not both the givers of grace and peace to the church? Doth not Christ know all the necessities of his church in this kind? Doth not he who "searcheth the heart and reins" (Rev. ii. 23), know the desires of his servants? And why then should they only wish these things from I know not whom, and not pray to him who is the giver of grace and peace for them? Especially when they have Paul's example for it in these words, "For this thing I besought the Lord (Christ) thrice, and he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee" (2 Cor. xii. 8—10). And again, "The Lord Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who hath loved us, and given us eternal consolation, and good hope through grace, comfort your hearts, and confirm you in every good word and work" (1 Thess. iii. 11, 12, 2 Thess. ii. 16).

[6] Ver. 4. Ἐπὶ τῇ χάριτι τοῦ Θεοῦ, For the grace of God.] Here the context seems to restrain this phrase to the favour of God shown to the Corinthians, in vouchsafing these spiritual gifts, which is a frequent import of this phrase in scripture. So Rom. xii. 6, "Having gifts differing according to the grace (of God) that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith," &c.; Eph. iv. 7, 8, "To every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men;" 1 Pet. iv. 10, "As every one hath received the gift, so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God;" 2 Cor. i. 12, "Not in fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to youward," our preaching to you being not in the words of human wisdom, but "in demonstration of the Spirit, and in power" (1 Cor. ii. 4). Thus, to "sing with grace in the heart" (Eph. v. 19, Col. iii. 16), is, say the ancients,† to sing, "using the spiritual gift" vouchsafed to them by the Holy Ghost: which interpretation is confirmed from the spiritual psalms, hymns, and songs, there mentioned (see 1 Cor. xiv. 15, Eph. vi. 18). And this is very suitable to the language of the Jews, who, when the Hebrew mentions חן "grace," do render it, "the Spirit of prophecy:" so Ps. xlv. 2, "Grace is poured into thy lips," Datus est Spiritus prophetiæ in labiis tuis, saith the Chaldee.

[7] Ver. 5. Ἐν παντὶ λόγῳ.] Esthius saith, this ought not to be interpreted of the gift of tongues, because λόγος in scripture never bears that sense. But (1.) it is certain, from ver. 7, that it is χάρισμα, "a gift;" and it is joined with faith and knowledge, which are gifts, 2 Cor. viii. 7, and cannot well be referred to any other gift vouchsafed then to the church. And (2.) the γνῶσις relating to prophecy, or the knowledge of mysteries, was usually attended with the gift of tongues (see Acts xix. 6): and though we find not the word λόγος ab-

6 [8] Even as (by these gifts) the testimony (we gave) of (or, doctrine concerning) Christ was confirmed in you (or, established among you):

7 [9] So that ye come behind (the other churches) in no gift; waiting for the coming (or revelation) of our Lord Jesus Christ:

8 [10] Who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 (For) God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship (or communion) of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord (i. e. That God, by whom ye are called, is faithful to perform his part, in preserving you blameless to that day, or to confer upon you the promised inheritance).

10 Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing (owning and teaching the same doctrine which you have received, 1 Cor. xi. 2, xv. 1, Rom. xvi. 17, in love and unity), and that there be no divisions (or schisms) among you; but that ye be perfectly joined [11] together in the same mind and in the same judgment (in the same belief, and in the same kind affections, one towards another).

11 For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you.

12 Now this I say (or mean by charging you with these contentions), that every one of you saith, (one) [12] I am (a follower) of Paul; and (another,) I of Apollos; and (a third,) I of Cephas; and (a fourth,) I [13] of Christ.

solutely put in this sense, yet λόγος σοφίας, "the word of wisdom," and λόγος γνώσεως, "the word of knowledge," are reckoned among spiritual gifts, 1 Cor. xii. 8. All this, indeed, with Mr. Le Clerc, passes for "mere niceties;" and he saith, it is "more natural to understand by λόγος the knowledge of religion," though that, as he confesses, "is the import of the following word γνῶσις, knowledge:" so that, according to this exposition, the apostle thanks God here, and 2 Cor. viii. 7, commends them for "abounding in the knowledge, and in the knowledge of religion." Besides, the knowledge of religion cannot be called grace in the sense given of that phrase, ver. 4, nor was the testimony of Christ confirmed to the Corinthians (ver. 6), by that, but by the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

[8] Ver. 6. Καθὼς, Even as.] This particle signifies sometimes when, as Acts vii. 17, καθὼς δὲ ἤγγιζεν ὁ χρόνος, "But when the time drew nigh."

[9] Ver. 7, 8.] From these two verses it is to be observed, first, that the Corinthians were abundantly replenished with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, the gifts of tongues and knowledge (ver. 5), that they "came behind the other churches in no gift" (ver. 7).

Secondly, That they obtained these gifts by Jesus Christ, and through faith in him (ver. 4).

Thirdly, That by these, the doctrine of Christ, the testimony of the apostles concerning him, that he was "raised from the dead, and become the author of salvation to them that believe," was confirmed to them (ver. 6).

Fourthly, That by these gifts, and by this earnest of the Spirit, they had encouragement to expect, or wait for, the second coming of the Lord.

[10] Ver. 8. Βεβαιώσει ὑμᾶς, Who shall also confirm you to the end, &c.] These words are by the ancients thus interpreted, viz. Who, in that day of the Lord Jesus which you expect, will confirm you for ever blameless. And this is suitable to his prayer, that Christians may be "unblameable in the day of the Lord," Phil. i. 9, 10, 1 Thess. iii. 12, 13, v. 23, for, say they, God is faithful who hath promised to them that obey the gospel υἱοθεσίαν, "the adoption, that is, the redemption of the body" (Rom. viii. 23), or, that they shall be partakers of that kingdom and glory to which he hath called them, 1 Thess. ii. 12. Others thus, He will do all that is requisite on his part, quod suarum est partium,* to render you unblameable to the end; so that you shall not fail of it through any want of divine grace necessary to that end, or any unfaithfulness on God's part to his promise, who hath already reconciled you to himself, through the death of Christ, "to present you holy and unblameable, and unreprovable in his sight; if you continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel," Col. i. 21—23 (see Phil. i. 6, Heb. iii. 6. 14). That the apostle speaks not here of any promise of perseverance made to the elect only among the Corinthians, is evident, (1.) because he plainly speaks to the whole body of the church, "to the church of God which was in Corinth, to all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."

* Grotius.

And (2.) he speaks not only of their being preserved from falling away finally; but of their being preserved "unblameable," whereas it is certain, the elect are not always so preserved.

[11] Ver. 10. Ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ νοΐ, That ye be perfectly joined in the same mind and judgment.] *This can be no farther the matter of an exhortation than it is in our power to obey it; seeing then it is not in any man's power to change his settled judgment, or to think otherwise upon our entreaty, because our exhortation gives no conviction to the understanding, it follows that this exhortation must only be to do what was in the power of the Corinthians; viz. (1.) to prevail with them to lay aside their strife, envy, and divisions (1 Cor. iii. 3), and the sad consequents of them, "debate, wrath, backbiting, whispering, swelling, tumult" (2 Cor. xii. 20), and to this the reason of this exhortation leads, "Be of one mind, and judgment, for I hear there be contentions among you" (ver. 11). And (2.) to engage them unanimously to own the doctrine they had received, and he had preached to them (1 Cor. xv. 1), which, if they were so minded, might easily be done, since they so lately had received it, the heads of it were so few (1 Cor. xv. 3), and it was so easy for them to consult the apostles in their doubtings of the sense of what he had delivered. But at this distance of time from the first discovery of the Christian faith, and after it is become a system of very many, and those disputable opinions, for the truth of which we have now no apostle, no living and infallible judge of controversies, to consult, if it be not sufficient to preserve unity in the church, that men heartily believe all the articles of the apostles' creed, which are plainly delivered in scripture, and live peaceably and quietly together, "following after peace and charity with all that call upon the Lord Jesus out of a pure heart" (2 Tim. ii. 22), and avoiding any separations from their brethren, where nothing sinful is enjoined to be believed, or done, to hold communion with them, I doubt there will be little union in the church of God.

[12] Ver. 12. Ἐγὼ εἰμι Παύλου, I am of Paul, &c.] Of the gentile part of the church of Corinth, some preferred Paul, as being their spiritual father, who "in Christ Jesus had begotten them through the gospel" (1 Cor. iv. 14, 15): others preferred Apollos, as being "an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures" (Acts xviii. 24): the Jewish Christians preferring Peter as the chief apostle of the circumcision out of the territories of Judea. That this is here said, not by a fiction of names or persons, under which the apostle taxed the heads of the sects among the Corinthians; but that they really divided upon these accounts is evident, first, from Paul's thanking God that he baptized so few of them, lest they should have occasion to say he baptized in his own name, and so made disciples to himself; secondly, from these words, "Let no man glory in men; for all are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas" (iii. 21, 22).

same Christ preached to you by us all? or is his body divided? 2 Cor. xi. 4:) was Paul (or any other but Christ Jesus) crucified for you (that you should be baptized into their death, as Christians are into the death of Christ)? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul? (so as to be called the disciples of Paul.)

14 I thank God (whose providence so ordered it) that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius;

15 Lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name.

16 And I baptized also the household of Stephanas: besides, [14] I know not whether I baptized any other.

17 For [15] Christ (when he called me) sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel (to the gentiles: and that) not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ (i. e. the doctrine of Christ crucified) should be made of none effect (by that means).

18 For the preaching of the cross (or, of a crucified Jesus, in this plain manner,) is (only) to them that perish (by rejecting it, because not attended with this human wisdom,) foolishness; but unto us which are saved (by it) it is (evidently) the power of God; (we embracing this faith, because it is confirmed by demonstrations of the Spirit and power, ii. 4.

19 Whereas the preaching of it, in the words of human wisdom, would render it of none effect;) For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent (Isa. xxix. 14, as he hath already done: for)

20 [16] Where is (now the wisdom of) the wise (philosophers among the gentiles)? where is (the wisdom of) the scribe (the interpreter of the law, or teacher of traditions among the Jews)? where is the disputer of this world (or the searcher into the secrets of nature, or into the sense of the scripture)? hath not God (by this dispensation) made (or declared to be) foolish the wisdom of this world?

21 [17] For (to begin with the philosophers) [18] after that in the wisdom of God (discernible in his works of creation and providence,) the world by (all its) wisdom knew not (the true) God, (so as to glorify him as God, and to be thankful to him for his blessings, Rom. i. 21,) it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching (as they think fit to style it) to save them that believe (in a crucified Jesus, thus preached to them.

ites, that they pleaded for the circumcision of Christians, from the example of Christ, who was circumcised, because the disciple was to be as his Master; and so the import of these words may be this, Others say, I am for the circumcision of the gentiles, that they may be like Christ.

[14] Ver. 16. Οὐκ οἶδα, I know not.] Therefore his inspiration, or divine assistance in writing his epistles, did not reach to an information in such things as these, but only to direct him in all the truth he was to teach unto the churches (see xvi. 7, 1 Pet. v. 12).

[15] Ver. 17. Οὐ γὰρ ἀπέστειλέ με Χριστὸς βαπτίζειν, Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach, &c.] i. e. When he appeared himself, and after sent Ananias to him, he expressly sent him to preach to the gentiles (Acts xxii. 21), and (xxvi. 16, 17) to bear his name before the gentiles (Acts ix. 15): but, in that threefold rehearsal of his commission, there is no mention made of his being sent to baptize; nor was it needful, after the general commission given to Christ's apostles for that end (Matt. xxviii. 19): that was not, say the Greek expositors, his great business; for* "to baptize is easy to any who is admitted to sacred orders;" but to preach the gospel requires a divine revelation, and great assistance of the power of God. Hence Peter himself preaches to Cornelius and his kinsmen, but commands them to be baptized by others (Acts x. 48); and this gospel he sent me to preach, "not with the wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect:" men not ascribing the prevailing of it to the power of God, but to the persuasion of human wisdom; God not approving (ver. 19), and therefore not assisting the preaching of the gospel in that way. Ἴσως γὰρ, εἰ κάλλος καὶ ὑπερβολὴν φράσεως, ὡς τὰ παρ' Ἕλλησι θαυμαζόμενα, εἶχεν ἡ γραφὴ, ὑπενόησεν ἂν τις οὐ τὴν ἀλήθειαν κεκρατηκέναι τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἐμφαινομένην ἀκολουθίαν, καὶ τὸ τῆς φράσεως κάλλος ἐψυχαγωγηκέναι τοὺς ἀκροωμένους. Hath not God discovered their wisdom to be but folly, in comparison of this way which he hath chosen to bring men to the knowledge of himself? The "disputer of this world" is by Jerome rendered, Causarum naturalium scrutator, Com. in Gal. iii., and so the naturalists are styled by the Jews חכמי החקר,† sapientes scrutationis, "the searchers into the secrets of nature;" though I conceive the apostle here doth rather understand, the midrashim, or the disputers in the Jewish schools and academies, touching their traditions. That the σοφὸς, i. e. the wise man, mentioned here, refers not to the chacmim, or wise men of the Jews, but to the philosophers among the gentiles, is evident; for that "the wisdom of the wise" (ver. 19), is the wisdom of the heathen world, appears from ver. 21, where it is said, "The world through wisdom knew not God," which is true only of the gentiles, not of the Jews. It is therefore reasonable to conceive "the wise," in the twentieth verse, should signify the same persons: so doth Paul interpret "the wise" in these words, "I am a debtor to the Greek, and to the barbarian; to the wise, and to the unwise" (Rom. i. 14). So Chrysostom, Theodoret,* Œcumenius, Theophylact, upon the place, saying that by "the wise" the apostle understands the man adorned with the verbosity and eloquence of the Greeks. I have not been solicitous to show the agreement of the words of St. Paul here with those of Isaiah, xxxiii. 18, because I find not that Paul intendeth here to cite them.

[17] Ver. 21.] Here two things are to be learned, (1.) That from the creation, beauty, order, and grandeur of the world, and the direction of all things in it to an end, and the fitting them with parts and instruments adapted best to the obtaining that end, it might be known that the Creator of the world was God alone, and so was only "to be glorified as God," Ps. xix. 1, 2, civ. 24, cxxxvi. 5, Jer. x. 12, li. 15, Rom. i. 19, 20. (2.) That the gospel was sent into the world that they, who did not know the true God acceptably by the true light of nature, might do it by the light of that revelation, which made such a bright and glorious manifestation of the power, wisdom, justice, and goodness of God, which they whom Satan had not blinded must discern (2 Cor. iv. 4).

[18] Ver. 21. Ἐπειδὴ γὰρ, Ver. 22. ἐπειδὴ καὶ.] The argument here seems to lie thus: The wise men among the Greeks, the scribe or interpreter of scripture among the Jews, are by this dispensation convinced of folly, and insufficiency to give men the knowledge of saving truth; ἐπειδὴ γὰρ, for, since the world by all its wisdom could not obtain the right knowledge of God, he by this dispensation hath given this saving knowledge to believers. And ἐπειδὴ καὶ, seeing also the unbelieving Jews for confirmation of this doctrine "require a sign, and the Greeks seek after (human) wisdom," it is on that account a scandal to those Jews, and in the estimation of the unbelieving Greeks is "foolishness:" yet is he and his doctrine, to the believing Greeks, "Christ the wisdom of God," they seeing in it wisdom sufficient to engage them to believe this doctrine; and, to the believing Jews "the power of God," they being convinced of its truth by the signs wrought in confirmation of it: and with the Jews require [19] a sign, and the Greeks seek after (profound) wisdom (to induce them to believe):

23 But (or, nevertheless) we preach Christ crucified, (though his crucifixion be) [20] unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and [21] unto the Greeks foolishness;

24 (For this he is to infidels only:) But unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, (he is) Christ the power of God (in the signs and wonders which are wrought by faith in Christ for confirmation of this doctrine, and so he gives the sign the Jews require), and the wisdom of God, (in the manifold and divine wisdom discovered in this dispensation for the saving lost man, ver. 30, and so answers the Greeks' request for wisdom.

25 I say, the power and the wisdom of God:) Because the foolishness of God (i. e. the way of God, which is esteemed foolishness by the Greeks) is wiser than (all the wisdom of) men (and much to be preferred before it); and the weakness of God (i. e. that way of propagating man's salvation, which is weak in their eyes) is stronger than (the power of) men: (for the weapons of our warfare are mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds, and confounding all the strength, policy, and wisdom of the world opposed against it, 2 Cor. x. 3, 4.)

26 For ye see (Gr. look upon) your calling, brethren, (and you will discern) how (agreeably to these things the divine wisdom hath so ordered it,) that [22] not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are (either) called (by, or made use of to propagate, the gospel):

27 But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world (that simple way of instructing mankind which they call foolishness, and those unlearned apostles whom they represent as fools,) to confound the wise (philosophers, so that they shall not be able to gainsay or resist the wisdom with which they speak, Luke xxi. 15, Acts vi. 10); and God hath chosen the weak things of the world (unarmed fishermen, tent-makers, assisted with no human force,) to confound the things which are mighty; (to break through all the opposition that the kings and rulers of the world do make against them, to pull down the strong holds, cast down the reasonings, level the heights of the philosophers, who do exalt themselves against the knowledge of Christ, 2 Cor. x. 4, 5;)

28 And (he hath chosen the) base things of the world, [23] and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not (i. e. the gentiles who are esteemed base, and looked upon as nothing by the Jews), to bring to nought (Gr. to abolish) things that are: (to become God's church and people, and so to cause the Jewish church and economy to cease, Rom. xi. 15. 17, Phil. iii. 3:)

29 That no flesh should (have cause to) glory in his presence (either of their wisdom, birth, or privileges.

30 Not you who are advanced to this happy state;) But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is great reason do they so esteem it, for what the unbelieving Greeks deem foolishness, hath more of sound reason in it than all the wisdom of the Greeks, or those who are accounted wise men by the Jews, have shown; they who by them are deemed fools having discovered that "wisdom of God in a mystery," which they with all their wisdom never knew, and that which they style weakness is attended with such a visible power of God, as enables it, without human power or wisdom, to prevail over all the strength and wisdom which Jew or gentile can oppose against it.

[19] Σημεῖον, A sign.] From heaven, such as was that of Moses, giving them "bread from heaven" (John vi. 30, 31), that in the time of Joshua, when the sun stood still (x. 13), or of Elijah, who brought down fire from heaven to consume the offering (1 Kings xviii. 38), and to consume the captains and their fifties (2 Kings i. 10. 12, Luke ix. 54); the Son of man being to "come in the clouds of heaven," as he did at the destruction of Jerusalem (Dan. vii. 13, Matt. xxiv. 30), and to give "signs from heaven" (Joel ii. 30), as he did at the day of pentecost (Acts ii. 2), and as God did by a voice from heaven at our Saviour's baptism (Matt. iii. 17), at his transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 5), and at his preaching (John xii. 28, 29).

[20] Ver. 23. Ἰουδαίοις μὲν σκάνδαλον, Unto the Jews a stumbling-block.] "Your Jesus," saith Trypho, "having by this fallen under the extremest curse of the law of God, we cannot sufficiently admire how you can expect any good from God, who place your hopes in a man that was crucified," ἐπ' ἄνθρωπον σταυρωθέντα (Dial. cum Just. p. 227. 249. 317). And again, "We doubt of your Christ, who was so ignominiously crucified; for our law styles every one that is crucified, accursed." Hence, by way of ignominy, they still call our Saviour talui,* suspensum, "one hanged upon the tree."

[21] To the Greeks foolishness.] "They count us mad," saith Justin Martyr,† "that after the immutable and eternal God, the Father of all things, we give the second place ἀνθρώπῳ σταυρωθέντι, to a man that was crucified."—"It is wicked and abominable," saith Celsus.‡—"The wise men of the world insult over us," saith St. Austin,§ "and ask, Where is your understanding, who worship him for a God who was crucified?" So M. Felix, p. 9, Arnob. lib. i. p. 20, Lact. lib. iv. cap. 16, Euseb. lib. iii. de Vitâ Const. cap. 1.

[22] Ver. 26. Οὐ πολλοὶ σοφοί, Not many wise.] This seems to be spoken in a direct opposition to that celebrated maxim of the Jews, that "prophecy resides not but upon a wise, a strong, and a rich man."

[23] Ver. 28. Καὶ τὰ μὴ ὄντα, &c.] To confirm the explication of these words given in the paraphrase, let it be noted,

First, That the apostle in this chapter often speaks conjunctly of the Jew and gentile, interweaving them together in his discourse: so ver. 20, he speaks of the wise men of the Greeks, and then of the scribes among the Jews; ver. 22, of the Jews requiring signs, and the Greeks wisdom; of Christ crucified being "to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the gentiles foolishness." So here, ver. 27, he seems to speak of the gospel, preached by the apostles in a plain familiar way, and by them deemed weakness, and styled foolishness, as confounding all the wisdom and the power of the Greeks; and ver. 28, of the gentile church succeeding and abolishing that of the Jews. Note therefore,

Secondly, That the Jews looked upon themselves as the only εὐγενεῖς, persons of true nobility, as being of the stock of Abraham. "Even the poorest Israelite," saith R. Akibah, "is to be looked upon as a gentleman, as being the son of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." But the gentiles they horribly despised, as the base people of the earth, not fit to be conversed with by them, they being in their law styled οὐκ ἔθνος, "not a nation," λαὸς ὁ τεχθησόμενος, "a people that shall be born" (Ps. xxii. 31), ὁ κτιζόμενος, "that shall be created in the generation to come" (Ps. cii. 19), and so yet had no being (Deut. xxxi. 21), οὐ λαός, "not a people" (Hos. i. 10). And it being said by the prophet, that "all the heathens are as nothing, and were accounted as nothing" (Isa. xl. 17), they still accounted them as such. Hence Mordecai is introduced as praying thus: "Lord, give not thy sceptre, τοῖς μὴ οὖσι, to them that are not" (Esth. iv. 11): and Esdras speaking to God thus, "As for the people which also came of Adam, thou hast said they are nothing, but like unto spittle, and hast likened the abundance of them to a drop that falleth from a vessel. And now, O Lord, these heathens, who have ever been reputed as nothing, have begun to be lords over us" (2 Esd. vi. 56, 57). Thus Abraham is said to be the father of the gentiles, "before that God who calleth things* which are not as if they were" (Rom. iv. 17):

and Clemens Romanus* saith of the gentiles, "He called us who were not, and would that of no being we should have a being." So fitly are the gentiles represented here by τὰ μὴ ὄντα, τὰ ἀγενῆ, τὰ ἐξουθενημένα, the things base, accounted as nothing, and the things which are not (see also 1 Cor. vi. 4). And this is the ancient exposition of Origen, who speaking of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the gentiles, and God's provoking the Jews "to jealousy by them that were not a nation," he confirms this from these words,† "God hath chosen the base things of the world, and the things which are not, that he might abolish the things which were before, that Israel according to the flesh might not glory before God."

[24] Ver. 30. Σοφία, &c. Wisdom.] As being the author of that evangelical wisdom which far excels the wisdom of the philosopher and scribe, and even that legal constitution which is called the wisdom of the Jews, Deut. iv. 6. The author of justification, as procuring for us that remission of sins which the law could not give (Gal. ii. 21, iii. 21). The author of sanctification, as procuring for and working in us, not only an external and relative holiness, as was that of the Jews, but ὁσιότητα τῆς ἀληθείας, "true and eternal holiness" (Eph. iv. 24), wrought in us by the Holy Spirit. The author of redemption, not from the Egyptian bondage or Babylonish captivity, but from the servitude of Satan, the dominion of sin and death, and "from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, or the redemption of the body" (Rom. viii. 21. 23). They who say Christ is made our righteousness, by his righteousness imputed to us, have the same reason to say also that he is made our wisdom by his wisdom, and our sanctification by his holiness imputed to us.

[See the discourse concerning the imputation of Christ's perfect righteousness, or obedience to the law, to us, for righteousness, or justification, at the end of this epistle.]

CHAPTER II.

1 And I, brethren, (have acted suitably to what I told you, that Christ sent me not to preach the gospel with wisdom of words, 1 Cor. i. 17, for) when I came to you, (I) came not with excellency of speech or of (human) wisdom, declaring unto you [1] the testimony of God.

2 For I determined [2] not to know any thing among you (i. e. to discover any other knowledge to you), save (that of) Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

3 And I was with you [3] in weakness, and [4] in fear, and in much trembling (or, in much fear and trembling).

4 And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but [5] in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: (the power of God confirming what I preached with signs and wonders, Rom. xv. 19, 2 Cor. xii. 12:)

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ Θεοῦ, The testimony of God.] This is the reading of Chrysostom, Œcumenius, Theophylact, who intimate not in the least that they knew any copies which read μυστήριον. The testimony of the apostles concerning the Messiah, or the Son of God, his death, his resurrection, and exaltation to be a prince and saviour, is called the testimony of God, 1 John v. 9, because God testified to the truth of these doctrines "by signs, and wonders, and divers miracles, and distributions of the Holy Ghost" (Heb. ii. 4).

[2] Ver. 2. Οὐ εἰδέναι τι, Not to know any thing.] To act as one who knew nothing, τῆς ἔξω σοφίας, of the eloquence and wisdom of the Greeks, but only to give you the knowledge of a crucified Saviour, which was to them foolishness (i. 23). So Chrysostom.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ, In weakness.] Of the body, and of speech, "his bodily presence being weak (and mean), and his speech contemptible" (2 Cor. x. 10). This infirmity of flesh rendering him despicable in the eyes of others (Gal. iv. 13, 14).

[4] Ἐν φόβῳ καὶ ἐν τρόμῳ, In fear and trembling.] By reason of the violent opposition which he found from the Jews, which made so deep impression on him when he was at Corinth, that Christ saw fit to appear to him, and encourage him, by saying, "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace, for I am with thee" (Acts xviii. 6. 9).

[5] Ver. 4. Ἐν ἀποδείξει Πνεύματος, In demonstration of the Spirit.] This is, saith Origen,* by demonstration of the truth of what I said concerning Christ out of the prophets, who spake by the Spirit, and comparing spiritual things revealed to us with spiritual things revealed to them (ver. 13); reasoning with the Jews out of the scripture, as Paul's manner was (Acts xvii. 2): "and saying no other things but those which Moses and the prophets said should come, that Christ should suffer, and that he should rise from the dead, and should show light to the gentiles" (Acts xxvi. 22, 23).

Others, as Chrysostom,* Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, understand by this phrase the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost; only it must be noted against Mr. Le Clerc, that neither the word Πνεῦμα is to be restrained to the gift of tongues, but comprehends all the internal gifts of the Holy Ghost; nor must the word δύναμις, "power," be restrained to healing diseases, but comprehend all the external gifts shown upon others, as casting out devils, raising the dead, &c.

[6] Ver. 6. Ἐν τοῖς τελείοις, Among them that are perfect.] i. e. Fully instructed in the principles of the Christian faith that this is the sense of the word "perfect" here, appears from the opposition of those that are perfect to the "babes in Christ;" as in those words, "You have need that one teach you which be the first principles of the oracles of God, and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong drink; for every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness. Therefore, leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on to perfection" (Heb. v. 12, 13, vi. 1), εἰς τὴν τελειότητα. Thus to the question of the young man, "What lack I yet?" Christ answereth, εἰ θέλεις τέλειος εἶναι, "If thou wilt be perfect," i. e. fully instructed in the conditions of life required by the gospel, tors), that come to nought (and are to be abolished):

7 But we [7] speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even [8] the hidden wisdom, which God ordained [9] before the world (to be revealed in due time) unto our glory (i. e. to be the means of our happiness and glory):

8 Which [10] none of the princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.

9 But (God hath dealt with us) as it is written, (Isa. lxiv. 4,) [11] Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.

10 But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep (and mysterious) things of God.

11 (And as it is among men, so it is here in reference to these things:) For what man knoweth the (secret) things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the (secret) things of God knoweth no man (Gr. none), but the [12] Spirit of God (which is in him).

12 Now we have received, not the spirit of the world (which suggests worldly wisdom), but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.

13 Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; [13] comparing spiritual things with spiritual.

14 But [14] the natural man (who acteth only on the principles of human reason, and of worldly wisdom)

"go sell all, and follow me" (Matt. xix. 21): so Phil. iii. 15, "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect," i. e. fully instructed in our Christian liberty, "mind this" (see 1 Cor. xiii. 10, Col. i. 28). "Strong meat is for them that are perfect" (Heb. v. 14).

[7] Ver. 7. We speak wisdom, ἣν προώρισεν ὁ Θεὸς πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων, which God hath ordained before the world to our glory.] Hence also it seems plain, that God hath appointed his gospel for the salvation of all to whom it is revealed: for though the apostle charged many of the church of Corinth with those things that would exclude them without repentance from this glory, yet he excludes none of them from being by God ordained or appointed to receive glory by it.

[8] Τὴν ἀποκεκρυμμένην, The hidden wisdom.] i. e. Before, not after, the revelation of it; for this mystery, saith the apostle, "God has revealed to us by his Spirit" (v. 10). It is "the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, but now is made manifest to the saints" (Rom. xvi. 25, 26, Eph. i. 9, iii. 3, 4. 9, 10, vi. 19, Col. i. 26, 27, ii. 2, iv. 3, 4.

[9] Πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων, Before the world.] At the beginning of the ages of the world (Gen. iii. 15), and before any of them were completed, or run out. Hence it is styled the mystery concealed in the times of the preceding ages (Rom. xvi. 25), as being "not made known in other ages to the sons of men as now it is" (Eph. iii. 5), but being a mystery hid from those ages (ver. 9). In this sense seemeth it to be, that God hath promised us eternal life, πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, "from ancient generations," ἐξ ἀρχῆς, "from the beginning," saith Photius; and this grace in the promise of it is said to be "given us in Christ," 2 Tim. i. 9, πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, "a long time," saith Dr. Hammond; ἄνωθεν, καὶ ἐξ ἀρχῆς, "from the beginning, or of old," saith Theodoret.

[10] Ver. 8. Οὐδεὶς τῶν ἀρχόντων, None of the princes.] Pilate, or the Jewish rulers, for they only can be said to have "crucified the Lord of glory," they only are the rulers which were to be "abolished" (ver. 6); and they are styled οἱ ἄρχοντες, "princes and rulers," Luke xiv. 1, and xviii. 18, the princes which stood up, and the rulers which took counsel against the Lord, and against his Anointed (Ps. ii. 2, Acts iv. 26). They were the princes who delivered him to be condemned to death, and crucified him, and this they did out of ignorance (Acts iii. 17, xiii. 27).

[11] Ver. 9. Ὀφθαλμὸς οὐκ εἶδε, Eye hath not seen.] These words do not immediately respect the blessings of another world, but are spoken by the prophet of the gospel-state, and the blessings then to be enjoyed by them that love God (Rom. viii. 28). For "all the prophets," say the Jews,* "prophesied only of the days of the Messiah; but as for the world to come," or the state of things then, "(as it is written,) Eye hath not seen, O God, besides thee," where the gloss adds, "The eyes of the prophets could not see these things." Hence the apostle adds in the following verse, "But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit;" whereas our future happiness is not yet revealed, saith John (1 John iii. 2). Yea, the words of Isaiah, lxiv. 4, in their primary sense, may only intimate that no man, by his own sense or reason, or by instruction from others, can discern any other God besides the true God, or know what kindness he will afford them that wait on him. And both the context, and the opposition of these words to the revelation of these things by the Spirit, show the primary intent of the apostle to be this, that no human wisdom, by any thing that may be seen, heard of, or conceived by us, can acquaint us with the things taught by the Holy Spirit, without a revelation.

[12] Ver. 11. Εἰ μὴ τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, But the Spirit of God.] These words accord with those of the book of Wisdom, "Thy counsel who hath known, except thou give wisdom, and send thy Spirit from above, which knoweth and understandeth all things?" (xix. 11:) whence it seems plainly to follow,

First, That the Holy Spirit is omniscient, "as knowing all things, even the deep things of God." "Wisdom is a loving Spirit, and will not acquit a blasphemer of his words; for God is witness of his reins, and a beholder of his heart, and a hearer of his tongue: for the Spirit of the Lord filleth the world, and that which containeth all things hath the knowledge of the voice" (Wisd. i. 6, 7).

Secondly, That the Holy Spirit is with God, and in God, even as intimately as the soul is in the body, according to those words of the book of Wisdom, "She is μετά σου with thee, an assessor of thy throne, and was present with thee when thou madest the world" (Wisd. ix. 4. 9).

[13] Ver. 13. Πνευματικὰ πνευματικοῖς συγκρίνοντες, Comparing spiritual things with spiritual.] "That is," says Mr. Le Clerc, "speaking spiritual things to spiritual men." But where doth συγκρίνω signify to speak, or why doth he limit what is spoken to the spiritual man, since the apostles spake as well to the unbelieving Jew and gentile, as to the spiritual man? And how doth it appear that ἄνθρωπος, man, is here to be understood, because it follows in the next verse, rather than πράγματα, things, which is understood in the immediate foregoing words? The interpretation of the fathers is much more probable, viz. we speak these things in the words taught by the Holy Ghost,* comparing the things which were writ by the Spirit of the Old Testament with what is now revealed to us by the same Spirit, and confirming our doctrines from them. Moreover, from this and the preceding verses, as also from the following, it is exceeding evident that the apostles spake and writ by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as did the prophets of old time, and delivered only those things as from God which God revealed to them by the Holy Spirit; according to those words of Peter, "We preach the gospel to you by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. i. 12).

[14] Ver. 14. Ψυχικὸς ἄνθρωπος, The natural man.] "By natural man," saith Mr. Le Clerc, "is not here meant the man that makes use of nothing but reason; but the man that is wholly devoted and enslaved to earthly things, and entirely taken up with the concernments of this life, like a brute creature. The opposition made here between spiritual and animal things," saith he, "plainly proves what I have said:" whereas there is not a word spoken of ψυχικὰ, "ani-

[15] receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him (as being destitute of his human wisdom, i. 23): [16] neither can he know them (by any study of his own), because they are spiritually discerned (i. e. by scripture prophecies, and by the revelation of the Spirit; and therefore, while he continues to reject this way of knowledge, he cannot receive them).

15 But he that is spiritual (i. e. who hath the revelation of the Spirit) [17] judgeth (or discerneth) all things (relating to this mystery, ver. 7), yet he himself is judged of no man (or discerned by none, who hath no higher principles than that of nature to discern things by).

16 For who (without a revelation) hath known the mind of the Lord, [18] that he may instruct him? (or, mal things" in the whole chapter, but only an opposition between ψυχικὸς, the natural or animal, and πνευματικὸς, spiritual person, whom I shall prove to be a person endued with a spiritual afflatus, and by that confound his notion. That the natural man here is the man who rejects revelation, and admits of no higher principle to judge of things by but philosophy, and demonstration from the principles of natural reason, or, in the words of Porphyry,* τῆς κατὰ τὸν λογισμὸν πειθοῦς εὑρισκομένης, "of persuasion to be found out by a rational deduction," is the express assertion of Theodoret,† Chrysostom,‡ Photius, Œcumenius, and Theophylact,§ upon the place; they therefore thought the word would bear this sense: and evident it is to any one who considers the chain of the apostle's discourse from i. 17 to the end of this chapter, that this must be the sense; for, ver. 17, he begins to declare, he preached the gospel, οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου, "not in wisdom of words," or human wisdom; here, ver. 1, that he did not καθ' ὑπεροχὴν λόγου ἢ σοφίας, "with excellency of speech," or human wisdom; there the persons which reject the gospel are σοφοὶ, "the wise men of the world," ver. 19—21, styled σοφοὶ κατὰ σάρκα, "wise men according to the flesh;" the Greeks that "seek for wisdom," ver. 22, they who esteemed it foolishness are the same Greeks, ver. 23; here it is the ψυχικὸς, "natural man" who "receives it not," and to whom it is "foolishness." Who therefore sees not that the natural man is the same with the wise man, the disputer, the philosopher, the Greek, there? There the gospel rejected by them for want of this wisdom, and accounted foolishness, is indeed "the power of God, and the wisdom of God," ver. 24: here it is "the wisdom of God in a mystery" revealed to the apostles by the Spirit (ver. 7. 10); i. e. the Spirit, not of the world, or of human wisdom, but the Spirit they had received from God, that they might know it (ver. 12); and therefore they delivered it, "not in the words of human wisdom," in which the Greeks gloried, and which they sought for in the gospel, but in words taught them by the Holy Ghost (ver. 13); when then it follows, "But the natural man receives not τὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος, the things of the Spirit," must he not be the man who receives not the things taught by the revelation of the Holy Ghost? The opposition which he bears to the πνευματικὸς, the man who hath this wisdom revealed to him by the Spirit of God, demonstrates this to be the sense.

[15] Οὐ δέχεται, &c. He receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God.] But counts them foolishness (i. 23), when propounded to him, because he doth not see them proved from principles of natural reason by philosophical deductions, which is the wisdom he seeks after (ver. 22). Hence again it is evident he is the Greek, and not the sensual person.

[16] Οὐ δύναται γνῶναι, He cannot know them.] viz. By that wisdom which alone he will be conducted by, because they are spiritually discerned, or by the revelation of the Spirit; for, being mysteries, they are not knowable by human reason, till God is pleased to reveal them (so ver. 9—11. 16).

Note also, That the apostle doth not here discourse of the inability of a heathen to understand the sense of any revelations discovered to him, for how then are they to be discovered to him? but only of his ability to find out, and originally come to the knowledge of them by the mere light of reason; and from the denial of this, he infers the necessity of a supernatural revelation, that the hidden wisdom of God may be made known to the world. Nor doth he say that the natural man cannot understand these revelations when discovered to him, because he wants farther means to do it, but only that he cannot know them before they are discovered by the revelation of the Spirit; and that he will not then receive them, because they are not taught him, as the wisdom of the world is, by deductions from principles of human reason. The Jew, saith he, admits of revelation, and so he only doth "require a sign" to prove this revelation; but the Greek seeks after human wisdom, and because he finds not that in our way of preaching, he will not receive the revelation, though it be confirmed "by demonstration of the Spirit, and of power."

[17] Ver. 15. Ἀνακρίνει, Judgeth all things.] The passive ἀνακρίνεται is rendered "discerned" in the foregoing verse, and so should have been rendered here; and the active, "searcheth" or "discerneth," as Acts xvii. 11, and here, x. 25. 27, and xiv. 24. So Iren. lib. iv. cap. 66. Hic examinat omnes, à nemine autem examinatur.

[18] Ver. 16. Ὃς συμβιβάσει αὐτὸν, That he may instruct him.] Though these words in the prophet Isaiah do certainly refer to God, they lying in the Hebrew thus, "Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord? And (who is) the man as his counsel that made him to know?" (xl. 13, 14,) yet, as they are varied here thus, "Who hath known the mind of the Lord? who will (or can) direct him?" they seem plainly to refer to the spiritual man, and to affirm that he could not be instructed in the mysteries of the gospel by any human wisdom. (1.) Because our knowing of the mind of Christ may enable us to direct others; but not that Lord who affords us this knowledge. (2.) Because this is plainly introduced as a proof that the spiritual man can be judged or discerned by no other person, who is not spiritual, and therefore must respect not God but him.

Πνευματικὸς here, and in other places of this epistle, is not the man who is adorned with the fruits of the good Spirit, much less, as Mr. Le Clerc suggests, the man who "relishes, or is affected with the spiritual doctrines of the gospel;" but* ὁ τῆς τοῦ Πνεύματος χάριτος ἠξιωμένος, "the man who is endued with a spiritual afflatus," and hath those gifts of the Spirit which are styled "the word of wisdom and of knowledge" (xii. 8); for (1.) he is the man who speaks "in demonstration of the Spirit" (ver. 4), "the wisdom of God in a mystery" (ver. 7), "to whom God hath revealed it by the Holy Spirit" (ver. 10), "that he might know the things that are freely given us of God" (ver. 12), and who speaks of them "in words taught by the Holy Ghost" (ver. 13), and who, by this revelation of the Spirit, hath the mind of Christ made known to him (ver. 16), who speaks Πνεύματι Θεοῦ, "by the Spirit of God," and by the Holy Ghost (xii. 3). Such were the prophets in the first age of the church, who by this afflatus performed all sacred offices in the church, before they had stated church-officers among them (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 32). Whence the apostle saith, "If any man be a prophet among you, or spiritual, let him know" (i. e. acknowledge and discern by its spiritual afflatus) "that the things which I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord" (1 Cor. xiv. 37): and to those prophets he writes thus, "Brethren, if any man be overtaken with a fault, you that are spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness" (Gal. vi. 1: see the note there). This is the constant notion of the spiritual man in Irenæus,† who, speaking of

When afterward church-governors were appointed, they seem to have been chosen out of these spiritual men, or to have had for a time, together with their ordination, this gift, which therefore he styles "the gift of truth:" and "from whom," saith he, "the truth is to be learned by others." CHAPTER III.

AND I, brethren, (though I speak the highest wisdom among them that are perfect, yet) could (I) not speak unto you as unto spiritual (persons), but as unto carnal, (by reason of those fruits of the flesh which still abide in you, ver. 3, and your affections to those who are only wise according to the flesh, chap. xxviii., and) even as unto babes in Christ.

2 I have fed you with milk, (the principles of the doctrines of Christ, Heb. v. 12, 13, vi. 1: see 1 Cor. xv. 2, 3,) and not with meat (the higher doctrines of Christianity): for hitherto (or then) [1] ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able.

3 For ye are [2] yet carnal: for whereas there is (yet) among you envying, and strife, and divisions, (which are the works of the flesh, Gal. v. 20, 21,) are ye not carnal, and walk as men (who have little of the Spirit in you? see note on ix. 8).

4 For while one saith (in opposition to each other), I am (the disciple) of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, (not authors of your faith) but (only) ministers by whom ye believed (which faith also they wrought in you), even as the Lord gave (his gifts) to every man (and his blessings on their labours)?

6 I have planted (the gospel among you), Apollos watered (the seed sown); but God (only) gave the increase (of it).

7 So then neither is he that planteth (to be esteemed as) any thing, neither he that watereth; [3] but (the glory of all must be ascribed to) God that giveth the increase.

8 Now he that planteth and he that watereth [4] are one (in the design and ministry): and every man (of them) shall receive his own reward (from that God whose workmen they are) according to his own labour.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2. Οὔπω γὰρ ἠδύνασθε, For yet you could not, add, bear it.] So in the Old Testament לא אוכל is often used, i. e. "I cannot," or "I would not," where endure, or bear it, is understood: so Job xxxi. 23, "By reason of his highness I could not," sup. endure; Ps. ci. 5, "Him that is of any haughty eye and proud look, I cannot;" Isa. i. 13, "The calling of assemblies I cannot," i. e. bear.

[2] Ver. 3. Σαρκικοὶ, Carnal.] This word, being here plainly applied to the works of the flesh, seems to imply that the spiritual man, opposed to him, should signify the man endued with the fruits of the good Spirit, or who "walketh in the Spirit, not fulfilling the lusts of the flesh" (Rom. viii. 1. 4, Gal. v. 16). And thus the Greek interpreters do understand these words; hence noting, that it is possible for men to have great gifts, as the Corinthians had, and yet be carnal. Yet Irenæus* interprets the words thus, that "they were carnal, because the Spirit of the Father did not rest upon them;" i. e. because he, being the Spirit of love and union, would not abide with them when they indulged in envy and divisions, or be unto them a Spirit of instruction; and, according to this interpretation, he must deny them to be spiritual, as the word signifies one who enjoys some spiritual gift, and receives some illumination from him: or as one that is not purely governed by the revelation made by the Spirit, but rather walks κατ' ἄνθρωπον, as a man attending not the dictates of the Spirit, but of human reason, or of his natural inclinations, for that this is the genuine import of that phrase, to "walk as men," see note on Rom. iii. 5, 1 Cor. ix. 8. Whatever be the sense, it must be noted that the apostle doth not here style them carnal, in that worst sense in which the carnal person is represented as one who is "not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be" (Rom. viii. 7, 8), and therefore can do nothing pleasing to God; and as it wholly doth exclude us from any interest in Christ (Gal. v. 24), for he allows them to be "babes in Christ" (ver. 1): but as it imports men, through the too great prevalency of their carnal appetites lusting against the Spirit, still subject to such things as showed some strong remainders of a carnal mind in them.

But one great difficulty remains, scarce observed by any interpreter excepting Crellius, viz. How the same Corinthians could be such "babes in Christ," and have such "need of milk, and not of meat," and yet be "enriched in all utterance and knowledge" (1 Cor. i. 5), and "abound in faith, utterance, and knowledge" (2 Cor. viii. 7).

I answer, that these encomiums must be restrained to some few of them who were their extraordinary church officers, and enjoyed this faith and knowledge for the instruction of the rest; and then, notwithstanding this, it may be true that the apostle could not write to the generality of them as such, but rather as to "babes in Christ." Or (2.) this "faith, utterance, and knowlege," must be restrained to the gift of miracles, of tongues, and the interpretation of them, which might be given for the confirmation of the gospel, and the good of others, to them who were not spiritual in the best sense, but of very small proficiency in the saving fruits of the good Spirit. Hence we find them "puffed up" on the account of these gifts, envying others who had them in a higher measure, and abusing them to vain ostentation and confusion in the church, and not to edification, which things sufficiently evidence they were but "babes in Christ."

[3] Ver. 7. Ἀλλ' ὁ Θεὸς, But God, &c.] Whence it is evident, that there can be no cause why you should run into factions about, or desire to be named from them, who have no excellency but from God, and do nothing but by his assistance.

[4] Ver. 8. Ἕν εἰσιν, Are one.] Κατὰ τὴν διακονίαν, according

* Nondum autem Spiritus patris requiescit super vos propter vestram infirmitatem. Lib. iv. cap. 75.

9 (I say, according to his labour,) For we are labourers together with God (his grace assisting us): ye are [5] God's husbandry, ye are God's building.

10 According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise [6] masterbuilder (assisted by divine wisdom), I have laid the foundation (Jesus Christ, and him crucified, 1 Cor. ii. 2), and another (coming after me) buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

11 For other (true) foundation can no man lay than that (which) is laid (already by me), which is (faith in) Jesus Christ.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones (i. e. sound doctrine, which will bear the trial of fire), wood, hay, stubble (human eloquence and wisdom, legal rites and Judaical traditions, which will be abolished and vanished away);

13 Every man's work shall be made manifest: [7] for the day (of Christ's advent, to destroy the Jewish temple, church, and nation,) shall declare it, because it shall be (Gr. it is) revealed by fire; (i. e. to be attended with great tribulation, Matt. xxiv. 21, πυρώσει πρὸς πειρασμὸν, with burning for trial, 1 Pet. iv. 12;) and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is (whether it be gold or silver, to abide the fire; or hay and stubble, to be consumed by it).

14 If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon (as sound evangelical doctrine will, suffering nothing by, but being confirmed by, the conflagration which shall burn up the Jewish economy), he shall receive a reward, (be approved as a wise builder, and shall be eminently preserved from the evils of that day of trial, Matt. xxiv. 13).

15 If any man's work shall be burned (as theirs must be, who build upon the foundation of legal observances and Judaical rites, for they must perish with that church and temple, which is the foundation of them), he shall suffer (the) loss (of all his labour): but he himself shall be saved; [8] yet so as by fire (i. e. not without great hazard and difficulty, as one snatched out of the fire).

16 (Moreover, to pass from their false doctrines, to the evil effects of them in your divisions:) Know ye not that ye (Christians) are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you (the Christian church, as the Shechinah did in the temple)?

17 If (then) any man [9] defile the temple of God (by dividing that church which is the temple, and in which one and the same Spirit dwells, into parts and fractions), him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, (and therefore not to be profaned by those divisions which render you carnal, 1 Cor. iii. 1. 3,) which temple ye are.

18 (And because you break into these divisions on the account of, or are taught these practices by, the philosophers of this age, men in whom you glory for their eloquence and wisdom;) Let no man deceive himself.

to their ministry, saith Clemens Alexandrinus,* as being God's ministers in this dispensation; or, ἑνότητι τοῦ Πνεύματος, as having both received their different gifts from the same Spirit, it being "one and the same Spirit, who divideth to every man as he will" (1 Cor. xii. 11).

[5] Ver. 9. Θεοῦ γεώργιον, God's husbandry.] This I think is better rendered "God's field," by Chrysostom,† Œcumenius, and Theophylact, who hence infer, that the field is God's; the apostles only, γεωργοὶ αὐτοῦ, his labourers sent forth to labour in it, and enabled by him for that work; and that they ought as a field to be fenced, ἐν τῷ φραγμῷ τῆς ὁμονοίας, with the hedge of concord, and not be divided into parties. Accordingly the word answers to the Hebrew כרם: so Prov. xxiv. 30, "I went by γεώργιον the field of the slothful;" and, xxxi. 16, "The wise woman considereth, γεώργιον, a field, and buyeth it."

[6] Ver. 10. Ἀρχιτέκτων, A master-builder.] So the Jews call their wise men, בנאים, architecti (see Buxtorf. Lex. Talm. p. 318), which the apostle here uses.

[7] Ver. 13. Ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα δηλώσει, For the day will declare it.] Here observe,

First, That a day, absolutely put, doth often signify a day or a time of punishment; so, "They that come after him shall be astonished at his day," Job xviii. 21. "The Lord shall laugh at him, for he seeth that his day is coming," Ps. xxxvii. 13. "Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom, what they did in the day of Jerusalem," Psal. cxxxvii. 7. So "the day of Midian," Isa. ix. 4; "Woe unto them, for their day is come, the time of their visitation," Jer. l. 27.

Secondly, That in like manner the day, here mentioned, is the day of our Lord's coming, to destroy the unbelieving Jews, to burn their temple, and to destroy the Jewish economy, will appear probable from the description of that day, "as a refiner's fire," Mal. iii. 2, 3, iv. 1, 2, Joel ii. 1. 13. 30, 31, and as the fire of an oven, burning up the chaff and stubble; for, "behold the day of the Lord cometh, that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, and all that do wickedly, shall be as stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up."

But whether we understand these words of that day, or any other day of judgment, this is certain, that the apostle cannot be here supposed to speak of the Roman purgatory fire; (1) because the fire the apostle speaks of, as Origen‡ hath noted, is not πῦρ ὑλικὸν καὶ αἰσθητὸν, ἀλλὰ τροπολογικὸν, "fire properly, but metaphorically, so called," as appears from those words, "He shall escape as by fire." (2.) Because this fire is to try "every man's work," Paul's and Apollos's, as well as theirs who built on the foundation hay and stubble; and sure they will not say Paul and Apollos went to purgatory. (3.) This fire shall try every man's work "of what sort it is:" now purgatory fire doth not try every man's works, but punishes them for them.

[8] Ver. 15. Ὡς διὰ πυρὸς, As out of the fire.] To be "saved out of the fire," is a proverbial speech concerning them that escape with great danger out of a calamity; so it is used in the Old Testament, "I have plucked them as a firebrand out of the fire," Amos iv. 11; "Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" Zech. iii. 2. So L. Æmilius, in Livy,* saith, he "escaped the popular flame half burnt." The interpretation of Sir Norton Knatchbull, "He shall be saved, but so as he pass through the fire of persecution with constancy to the faith," accords well with Christ's words, Matt. xxiv. 13, but not with the use of this proverbial expression. Now hence it is evident, that the apostle speaks not of the Gnostics, who denied the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 14. 17), and so believed in vain, and taught that Christ might be denied with the mouth in the time of persecution, and so were then ashamed of him, and also were abominably filthy both in doctrine and manners: for of such the apostles would not say, They should be saved yet, but so as by fire; but, as Jude and Peter do, they are "of old ordained to condemnation; their judgment lingereth not, and their damnation doth not slumber" (Jude 4. 13, 2 Pet. ii. 3).

[9] Ver. 17. Εἴ τις τὸν ναὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ φθείρει, If any man corrupt the temple of God.] I have, in the paraphrase, followed the common interpretation of these words; but the like words used ch. vi. from ver. 15 to 19, by way of dehortation from fornication, and 2 Cor. vi. 16, from communion with heathens in their idolatrous rites and evil practices, and by way of inducement to "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit" (vii. 1), more naturally incline us to refer these verses to the corrupting of the temple of God, by filthiness of the flesh, uncleanness, and fornication, or by filthiness of the spirit, i. e. idolatrous practices; both which the Corinthians did (see the note on 1 Cor. vii. 1): and then the connexion will run thus—I have declared you to be "a building of God" (ver. 9), as being "built up together for a habitation of God

If any man among you seemeth to be [10] wise in (the wisdom and learning of) this world, let him (embrace that gospel and doctrine of Christ, which the world calls foolishness, and so) become a fool (to them), that he may be wise (according to the wisdom of God, 1 Cor. i. 24, 25).

19 For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written (Job v. 13), He taketh the wise in their own craftiness (causing one sect of philosophers to destroy what another established, and so showing the uncertainty and vanity of their pretended wisdom).

20 And again (Ps. xciv. 11), The Lord knoweth the thoughts (and machinations) of the wise, that they are vain.

21 Therefore let no man (so) glory in men (as to be induced by their esteem of them to rend or divide the church, or to indulge those vile practices which corrupt the temple of God). For [11] all things (or persons) are your's (as being appointed for your service);

22 Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas (they have received their apostleship for your sakes), or the world (as being made for you), or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are your's (as being all designed for your good);

23 And ye are (only) Christ's (who is your head); and Christ [12] is God's (or, of God, having, as Mediator, his commission and his power from him, and acting all things to his glory).

through the Spirit" (Eph. ii. 22). If therefore you do not keep this temple of God holy, but corrupt it by "joining the temple of God with idols" (2 Cor. vi. 16), or profane and defile it by uncleanness and fornication, you may expect that these sins, by which God's temple is destroyed, should end in your own ruin and destruction.

[10] Ver. 18. Σοφὸς εἶναι ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ, To be wise in the wisdom of this world.] That the Corinthians were induced to eat things offered to idols in the idol-temples, by men pretending to great knowledge, see viii. 1, 2, that they also introduced among them the doctrine of the lawfulness of fornication, see note on v. 1, vi. 16, vii. 1. And to this sense of the two last verses agree the descants of the ancients, who say the apostle (ver. 17) begins to speak περὶ τοῦ πεπορνευκότος, "of him that had committed fornication" (v. 1), and against them, qui turpitèr viventes corpora sua violando corruperunt, "who by filthy practices had corrupted their bodies, and violated the temple of the Holy Ghost:" these teachers seem to have been of the Nicolaitans, who received their doctrines from the philosophers.

[11] Ver. 21. Πάντα ὑμῶν ἐστιν, All are yours.] The Jews believed that the world was made for them, and that God despised the gentiles, and looked upon them as nothing when he made it (2 Esd. vi. 55. 59). The apostle, on the contrary, affirms the world was made for the gentiles, converted to the Christian faith: and adds, that the apostles had received their gifts and authority for their sakes; that if life were continued to them under continual perils, it was "for their furtherance and joy in the faith" (Phil. i. 15); or if we, saith he, be always given up to death, so that "death worketh in us," it is that "life may work in you" (2 Cor. iv. 11, 12), for "we suffer all things for you" (ver. 15, 2 Tim. ii. 10); that "things present," the pressures they now suffered, and "things to come," the prosperity and adversity they might afterward be subject to, were for their sakes; "for whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation; or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation" (2 Cor. i. 6).

[12] Ver. 23. Χριστὸς δὲ Θεοῦ, And Christ is God's.] Here the Socinians cry out, Vide hic discrimen inter Deum et Christum, "See here the difference betwixt God and Christ."—"Hence it appears," saith Crellius, "that Christ is in nowise God most high, as having another above him, as his head, on whom he depends, and from whom he is here manifestly distinguished."

But the fathers thought not so, who say Christ is of God, ὡς προαιώνιον γέννημα καὶ ὡς αἰτίαν ἔχων τὸν πατέρα, "as being begotten by him before all ages, and having him for his Father, ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγεννημένος κατὰ τὴν θεότητα, as receiving the divine nature from him." Others grant this of Christ as mediator betwixt us and God, in which sense he performing that office as man, or by virtue of his human nature, in which alone he could be a prophet sent from God, or offer up himself to the death for us, or intercede in our behalf, or be "exalted to the right hand of God, to be a prince and a Saviour;" he therefore was exalted thus "to the glory of God the Father," and so depended on him in the exercise of that office (see note on 1 Cor. xi. 3).

CHAPTER IV.

1 (We are yours, I say; yet) Let a man (also) so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God (i. e. of those revelations of the gospel which are styled mysteries, as not being before revealed to the world. See note on ii. 2. 7).

2 Moreover it (chiefly) is required in stewards, that a man (taking that office upon him) be found faithful.

3 But (whether it be thus, or not,) with me it is a very small thing [1] that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self (so as to acquiesce in that judgment).

4 For I know nothing (of unfaithfulness) by myself; [2] yet am I not hereby justified (at God's tribunal): but he that (farther) judgeth me is the Lord.

5 Therefore [3] judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hid-

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 3. Ἵνα ὑφ' ὑμῶν ἀνακριθῶ, That I should be judged of you.] Not that he was unconcerned whether the Corinthians had a good esteem of him or not; the contrary is evident from the whole drift of his epistles, in which he labours to convince them of the truth of his doctrine and of his sincerity in the discharge of his office, and rejoiceth greatly in their affection to him (2 Cor. vi. 13, vii. 14, 15, viii. 24). His meaning only is, that their judgment is little to him in comparison of the final and unerring judgment of the Lord.

[2] Ver. 4. Οὐκ τούτῳ δεδικαίωμαι, Yet am I not thereby justified.] Here also the apostle doth not intend to say that he, and others, could have no good assurance of their present justification and favour with God, from the testimony of an upright conscience, which, saith John, gives "confidence with God" (1 John iii. 21); for then farewell all joy and comfort in this world: he doth himself assure us, that their "rejoicing was this, even the testimony of their conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity they had their conversation in this world" (2 Cor. i. 12): he adviseth all men to approve their actions to themselves, and then (saith he) "they shall have rejoicing in themselves, and not in another" (Gal. vi. 4): his meaning therefore is, that our final justification, or absolution from condemnation, depends not on the judgment which we pass upon ourselves, but upon that which God, the righteous judge, will pass upon us at the last day. Here also note in Paul another sense of justification, as it relates to our absolution from condemnation, and our approbation as righteous at the last day, which will be, saith he, according to our works (2 Cor. v. 10), and our fidelity in execution of the trusts committed to us (ver. 2).

[3] Ver. 5. Μὴ πρὸ καιροῦ τι κρίνετε, Judge nothing before the time.] The apostle doth not here condemn all judgment, den things of darkness, and will [4] make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God.

6 And these things, brethren, [5] I have in a figure transferred to myself (one rude in speech, but not in knowledge, 2 Cor. xi. 6,) and to Apollos (a man of eloquence and wisdom, Acts xviii. 24,) for your sakes; that ye might learn in (the example of) us not to think of (other) men above that which is written (viz. that we are only ministers of Christ, by which ye believed, iii. 5), that no one of you be puffed up for one against another (because of the different gifts vouchsafed to them).

7 For [6] who maketh thee (what doctor soever thou art) to differ from another? and what (gift) hast thou that thou didst not receive (from God)? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it (from him)?

8 Now [7] ye (Corinthians) are full (of secular wisdom), now ye are rich (both in wealth and spiritual gifts, 1 Cor. xiv. 26), ye have reigned as kings (flourishing in the enjoyment of these things in all tranquillity and honour) without (any want of) us: and I would to God ye did reign (indeed, and not in conceit only), that we also (poor, persecuted, and despised apostles,) might reign with you.

9 For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last (i. e. as the last, or the meridian gladiators), as it were (men) [8] appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men.

10 We are (counted as) fools for Christ's sake, but ye (who flourish in your eloquence and wisdom) are (accounted) wise in Christ; we are weak (as to bodily presence, 2 Cor. x. 10, and bodily infirmities, 1 Cor. ii. 3, 2 Cor. xii. 9, and made still weaker by our continual wants and persecutions), but ye are strong (and lusty); ye are honourable (for your gifts and wisdom, which have gotten you a great name and reputation among others), but we are despised (or in disgrace every where).

11 Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwellingplace (or, are in no certain condition);

12 And labour, working with our own hands:

civil or ecclesiastical, of any persons, deeds, or words, or bid us suspend our judgment of things occurring to our senses till the day of judgment; but only forbids our censures of things uncertain, of which no righteous judgment can be passed, because we cannot be certain of the truth of that judgment, and of things which it belongs not to us to judge of. And this appears both from the words and the occasion of them: from the words, for they respect "the hidden things of darkness," and "the counsels of the heart," of which no certain judgment can be passed; from the occasion of them, they passing their censures on Paul (ver. 3), and questioning his fidelity in his office (ver. 2), of whom they had no authority so to judge, nor any occasion so to judge.

[4] Ὃς φανερώσει τὰς βουλὰς τῶν καρδιῶν, Who will make manifest the counsels of the heart.] Hence note, that Jesus Christ must have the knowledge of the secrets of the hearts of all men subject to his judgment, and so must be that God who alone knows the hearts of all men (1 Kings viii. 39), and is alone "the Searcher of all hearts" (1 Chron. xxviii. 9); "to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doing" (Jer. xvii. 10); and therefore Christ expressly ascribes this knowledge to himself, by saying, "All the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and the hearts, and I will give to every one of you according to your works" (Rev. ii. 23).

[5] Ver. 6. Μετεσχημάτισα, I have in a figure transferred.] This seems not to refer, as most interpreters conceive, to what the apostle had said, i. 12, viz. their saying, "I am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I of Cephas," for here is nothing said of Cephas; but it refers to what he had said, iii. 5—8, that Paul and Apollos were only ministers by whom they believed; that therefore neither Paul nor Apollos was to be looked upon as any thing, they doing nothing but by the grace given them by that God, to whom therefore the whole praise was due for the success of all their labours. And this scheme of speech I have used, saith he, touching myself and Apollos, instructing you not to think highly of other doctors among you, who have done less for the promoting your faith than we have done.

[6] Ver. 7. Τίς σε διακρίνει; Who maketh thee to differ?] The apostle manifestly speaking here of those gifts of the Spirit which were immediately infused without human industry, and were dispensed by God and by his Spirit according to his good pleasure (1 Cor. iii. 15, xii. 11); it cannot be hence argued that no man doth any thing to make himself differ from another, in any virtue or pious disposition. For to what purpose are men continually exhorted and stirred up by powerful motives to all Christian duties, and particularly to excel in virtue, if these exhortations and motives are not proposed to engage them to exercise these Christian virtues, to choose the good and refuse the evil? And if one man, upon consideration of these motives, doth choose to live a pious life, whereas another is not by the same motives prevailed on so to do, doth he not differ from another by virtue of that choice? And through the grace of God, by way of excitation, worketh in us thus to will; yet, since our faculties do first deliberate upon and then comply, and choose to do that thing to which this grace excites us; if to consider be to differ from him that does not so, and to comply with and embrace the call of God, be to differ from him who complies not with the same call, it must be certain, that as God's grace preventing and exciting, so my faculties co-operating, tend to make me differ from another, though having also these faculties from God, the action may be well ascribed, and the whole glory of it must be due, to him.

Seeing then no act of virtue and no good habit is produced in us without a frequent and manifold co-operation of our own faculties to the same action and habit, whereas these gifts of tongues, interpretation, and prophecy, were gifts conferred upon Christians in the primitive times, without any such co-operation of their faculties: it cannot, with like reason, be inquired of the former, as it may be of these gifts, "Who made thee to differ" from another in them? And though all ground and even pretence of glorying, by this immediate infusion of these gifts, is evidently excluded; yet the apostles do themselves glory in those good actions which they choose to do (1 Cor. ix. 15, 16, 2 Cor. i. 12, xi. 20); and say to others thus, "Let every man try and approve his own work, and then shall he have καύχημα rejoicing, or glorying in himself" (Gal. vi. 4).

[7] Ver. 8. Κεκορεσμένοι ἐστὲ, ἐπλουτήσατε, Ye are filled, ye are rich.] All the ancient commentators having noted in their prefaces to this epistle, that Corinth* was a city "which abounded in wealth, and was full of rhetoricians, and of philosophers," and that hence arose their disorders, pride, and vain-glory, as well as from their gifts; I thought fit in the paraphrase to take notice of both.

[8] Ver. 9. Ὡς ἐπιθανατίους, As men appointed unto death.] Here the apostle seems to allude to the Roman spectacle, τῆς τῶν θηριομάχων, καὶ μονομαχίας ἀνθρωφόνου, that of the bestiarii† and the gladiators, where in the morning men were brought upon the theatre to fight with wild beasts, and to them was allowed armour to defend themselves, and smite the beasts that did assail them; but in the meridian spectacle were brought forth the gladiators naked, and without any thing to defend them from the sword of the assailant, and he that then escaped was only reserved for slaughter to another day; so that these men might be well called ἐπιθανάτιοι, "men appointed for death:" and this being the last appearance on the theatre for that day, they are said here to be set being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it (or we bear, as weak persons, who know not how to escape, or help ourselves):

13 Being defamed, we intreat: we are made as [9] the filth of the world, and are (as) the offscouring (or refuse) of all things unto this day.

14 (But though I thus speak of your glorying in these things, with the neglect of us, ver. 8,) I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you (to behave yourselves hereafter more like dutiful children towards me).

15 For though ye have ten thousand instructers in Christ, yet have ye [10] not many fathers (indeed, not any besides me): for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel.

16 Wherefore I beseech you, be ye followers of me, (adhering to the doctrine received from me, and walking as I do, and teach, ver. 17.)

17 For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church.

18 Now some (among you) are puffed up, as though (because I have sent Timothy to you) I would not (myself) come to you.

19 But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will, and will know (and examine), not the speech (and eloquence) of them which are puffed up, but the power (and spiritual authority which attends their preaching, whether that be equal to the power God has given us for edification).

forth ἔσχατοι, "the last." Of these two spectacles Seneca* speaks thus: "In the morning men are exposed to lions and to bears; at midday to their spectators; those that kill are exposed to one another; the victor is detained for another slaughter; the conclusion of this fight is death. The former fighting, compared to this, was mercy; here is only butchery: they have nothing to cover them, their whole body is exposed to every stroke," &c. Hence Tertullian† cites these words thus: Puto nos Deus apostolos novissimos elegit velut bestiarios; "I think God hath chosen us apostles last, as men to be exposed to wild beasts."

[9] Ver. 13. Περικαθάρματα, περίψημα.] These words, which we render filth and offscouring, do probably relate to the sacrifices which the heathens used for the lustration of a city. "The Athenians," saith Phavorinus,‡ "nourished some very base and refuse people, and, when any calamity or plague befell them, they sacrificed them for the purgation of the city," and "these they called καθάρματα." And Suidas§ saith, they said of such a man, "Be thou our περίψημα, redemption, or propitiation, and then flung him into the sea as a sacrifice to Neptune." Hence Origen‖ saith, that our Lord, giving up himself for the propitiation of our sins, was made much more than his apostles, περικάθαρμα τοῦ κόσμου, πάντων περίψημα, "the lustration of the world, and peculiar sacrifice of all men."

[10] Ver. 15. Οὐ πολλοὺς πατέρας, Not many fathers.] The masters of tradition among the Jews¶ called them children whom they instructed in their traditions; and the Targum upon Numb. iii. 1, observes, that Nadab and Abihu are called "the sons of Moses," because he had instructed them: for he who teacheth another is, as it were, his father. Thus the disciples of the prophets are called "the sons of the prophets." So Jonathan, "These are the names of the sons of Aaron, the disciples of Moses, and the sons of Israel, who were called by his name:" and so both Irenæus* and Clemens Alexandrinus† do observe that "they were called fathers, who taught and catechised others; and they sons, who were taught by them."

[11] Ver. 20. Οὐ ἐν λόγῳ, ἀλλ' ἐν δυνάμει, Not in word but in power.] It is propagated, saith Theophylact, διὰ σημείων τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ Πνεύματος γινομένων, "by miracles done by the power of the Spirit;" for to convince men of the truth of it, saith Chrysostom, it is not enough to use fine words, but the dead must be raised, the devils cast out, and other mighty wonders must be wrought: by these things the gospel is established.

[12] Ver. 21. Ἐν ῥάβδῳ, With a rod.] That the apostles had power of inflicting corporal punishments on some who did oppose the progress of, or who notoriously offended against, the rules of the gospel, is the opinion of all the ancient commentators, who instance in the death inflicted by St. Peter on Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v. 10), the blindness inflicted by St. Paul on Elymas (xiii. 11), the delivery of Hymenæus and Alexander, and the incestuous person unto Satan (1 Tim. i. 20, 1 Cor. v. 5), ὥστε παιδεῦσαι τὸ σῶμα, "so as to chastise the body of them," saith Theodoret; ἵνα νόσῳ αὐτὸν τήξῃ, "that he might macerate him with some disease," say Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact; and so they interpret these words, "Shall I come unto you with a rod?" that is, ἐν κολάσει, ἐν τιμωρίᾳ, "with punishments and chastisements." And this sense will appear highly probable, if we consider these words of the apostle, "I write unto you, being absent, lest, being present, I should use sharpness, according to the power God hath given me for edification, and not for destruction" (2 Cor. xiii. 10): for, that these words cannot be understood only of the power of excommunication, common to him with others, we may learn from the same words, 2 Cor. x. 8, where the mighty weapons of his warfare, "able to remove every height exalting itself against, and to captivate every mind to, the obedience of Christ, and to avenge all disobedience," being premised, it follows, "For should I boast exceedingly of the power God hath given me for edification, and not for destruction, I should not be ashamed."

CHAPTER V.

1 It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not [1] so much as named among the Gentiles, (viz.) [2] that one should have his father's wife (i. e. his stepmother).

2 And [3] ye are puffed up, and [4] have not rather mourned (for the scandal of this great offence, nor taken care) that he that hath done this deed (so reproachful to the society of Christians) might be taken away (and cast out) from among you (as he ought to be).

3 For I verily, as (being) absent in body, but [5] present (with you, Col. ii. 5,) in (and by the) spirit (exciting me so to do), have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed, (that he ought to be removed from your body, and delivered up to Satan.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. Οὐδὲ ὀνομάζεται, Not named.] i. e. Not countenanced among civilized heathens, but forbidden by their laws; by the laws of the Greeks, say Ocellus Lucanus* and Jamblichus;† and by the Romans, it being, saith Cicero, scelus inauditum, "an unheard-of wickedness," of which the Persians only are accused by Philo,‡ Tertullian,§ Minutius Felix;‖ and therefore this was one of the three great infamies with which the¶ heathens loaded the primitive Christians, that they had incesta convivia among them, and practised the very crime here censured by Paul, and the words ὅλως ἀκούεται, "It is every where heard of," do make it not improbable that this very thing might give the rise to that vile objection against Christianity, especially if the Corinthians had the foundation of this practice from the Jews, from whom the Christians for some time were not distinguished.

[2] Ὥστε γυναῖκά τινα τοῦ πατρὸς ἔχειν, That one should have his father's wife.] Either as his wife, or so as to commit fornication with her. Now this, saith Dr. Lightfoot, was done by them agreeably to the Jewish doctrine concerning proselytes; viz. that they were "as persons new born, and had lost all their kindred they had before:" so that by the law, as the rabbins expounded it, they might marry their mother and sister. And to this Tacitus†† seems to refer in his account of the Jews, when he saith, "All things by them are deemed profane, which to us are sacred, rursùm concessa apud illos quæ nobis incesta, and what we account incestuous is with them lawful;" and that they are first of all taught to contemn the gods, parentes, liberos, fratres vilia habere, and to have no regard to parents, children, and brethren. But considering that Corinth abounded with philosophers, and that Chrysippus‡‡ the Stoic reckons the enjoyment of a mother, sister, or daughter, as things blamed without reason; and that hence the Nicolaitans and Carpocratians§§ had their doctrine of the community of women, not excepting mothers, and daughters, and sisters; I think it probable that this corruption might have had its rise from them, and that, upon one or other of these accounts, they so tamely endured him who had done this infamous thing: yea, they were puffed up, say the Greek interpreters, on account of the eloquence and wisdom of this very man.

[3] Ver. 2. Πεφυσιωμένοι ἐστέ, Ye are puffed up.] Either in your conceit, that you have got such a profound and eloquent teacher; or on the account of some high wisdom which makes you look on these things as indifferent.

It is conjectured that this woman, cohabiting with her son-in-law, had divorced herself from her husband; and true it is, as I have observed, note on vii. 11, that the Attic laws allowed the woman to do this, but then she was first to bring, τῆς ἀπολείψεως γράμματα, the causes why she desired to leave her husband, before the archon, or judge of such matters, and to have his allowance so to do: if this stepmother did not this, she was still her husband's wife; if she did, and the causes she alleged were allowed of by the judge, this freed her from that relation to her former husband, and then he suffered no wrong by this action, as the apostle intimates that he did, by styling him ἀδικηθέντα "the person that had suffered wrong" (2 Cor. vii. 12).

[4] Καὶ οὐχὶ μᾶλλον ἐπενθήσατε, And have not rather mourned.] It was the custom, both of the Jews and Christians, when any one was to be cut off from the church as a dead member, to do it with fasting and humiliation, to show their sympathy with him, and to demonstrate their sorrow for the scandal brought upon the society.

"The school of Pythagoras," saith Origen,* "put coffins in the room of them who deserted the society, looking upon them as dead men; and the Christians lament them who have been guilty of lasciviousness, or any other absurd action, as persons lost and dead to God." And among the Apostolical Constitutions† this is one, "With sorrow and mourning cut off from the church the incurable person; for, saith the apostle, You shall put away from among you the evil person:" and to this custom the apostle seemeth to allude, 2 Cor. ii. 1—3, xii. 21.

[5] Ver. 3. Παρὼν δὲ τῷ πνεύματι, Present in spirit.] That is, say the fathers, not only with mind and consent,‡ but διὰ τῆς Πνεύματος χάριτος, "by the gift of the Spirit," by which I am enabled to discern what is fit to be done in this case; even by the Spirit by which I am enabled, καὶ τὰ πόῤῥωθεν εἰδέναι, "to discern things done at a distance," as Elisha did the actions of Gehazi by his prophetic spirit (2 Kings v. 26). So Chrysostom and Theophylact. And so the phrase seems to be used in these words: "For though I am absent in the flesh, yet I am with you in the Spirit, rejoicing and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith" (Col. ii. 5): since in his absence he could not behold their order, and the steadfastness of their faith by his own spirit, but only by the assistance of the Holy Spirit. So also do they interpret, τοῦ ἐμοῦ πνεύματος, "my spirit" (ver. 4), by "my spiritual gift;" so that the sense of these words, ver. 3, 4, seems to runs thus,—I, by the spirit of discerning, and the authority God hath given me, have already adjudged that this person ought to be delivered up to Satan; and therefore, when you are gathered together in the name of Christ, and have my Spirit, who also presides in your assemblies, and there assists you in the performance of your Christian offices, and have the power of Christ ready to confirm and execute your sentence, do you in his name deliver such a one to Satan.

8 Therefore let us keep the feast, not with (the) old leaven (of our former uncleanness), neither with the (pharisaical) [10] leaven of malice and (deceitful) wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

[6] Ver. 4. Σὺν τῇ δυνάμει, With the power of the Lord Jesus Christ.] The word δύναμις, power, hath still reference to some miraculous and extraordinary power, and is not used, that I know of, concerning any simple act of discipline; as when Christ answers Paul thus, ἡ δύναμίς μου, "My power is perfected in weakness;" and the apostle saith on that account, "Most gladly will I rejoice in my weakness, ἵνα ἡ δύναμις τοῦ Χριστοῦ, that the power of Christ may rest upon me" (2 Cor. xii. 9, 10): i. e. say the ancients, that, in the midst of my manifold infirmities, the power of Christ, enabling me to do all kinds of miracles, may more conspicuously reside in me. This miraculous assistance is by the apostle sometimes called simply, "the power," 1 Cor. ii. 4, iv. 19, 20, xii. 28, 29; sometimes "the power of God," 1 Cor. ii. 5, 6. 14, xviii. 24, 2 Cor. iv. 7, xiii. 4, and sometimes "the power of Christ," as in the place now cited. Now among the powers of Christ, which attended the preaching of the gospel, this was one, of delivering men for their offences up to Satan, to inflict corporal punishments on them for the destruction of the flesh. This power seems to have been peculiar to the apostles, and therefore here Paul prescribes the doing of it, the authority or power of his Spirit being present with them. That this is indeed the import of delivering up to Satan "for the destruction of the flesh," is evident, not only from the concurring exposition of the ancients, who all interpret it of some disease to be inflicted on him by Satan,* but also from the end of that delivery to him, which is, saith the apostle here, "for the destruction of the flesh;" and in the case of Hymenæus and Philetus, "that they might not learn to blaspheme." Now bodily afflictions plainly tend to mortify the flesh, and to awaken men as oft as they came thus from a miraculous power, to consider of their ways, and quit those courses which thus subject them to the hand of God; whereas excommunication hath no apparent tendency to those ends, when no such dreadful issue follows from it, and therefore seems not to be all that is intended by this delivery up to Satan: though, I confesss, the Jews expected some like effect of their excommunication, called cherem, which, saith Buxtorf,† ran in this form of words, Sint super ipsum plagæ magnæ, et fideles, morbi magni, et horribiles: "Let his strokes be great, and his diseases horrible." Moreover, the apostle speaks not of this as a common act of discipline, which every presbyter might exercise, but as of that which required his extraordinary presence in the Spirit, and the power of Christ assisting them; and therefore seems to speak of it as an act which was to be attended with some miraculous effect.

[7] Ver. 6. Οὐ καλὸν τὸ καύχημα ὑμῶν.] Some Latin copies omit the negative οὐ, whence, saith Dr. Mills, this is undoubtedly the true reading; whereas it is retained by all the Greek commentators, and all the versions, by Hilary the deacon, and Cod. Alex., and so undoubtedly ought to be read: that also φύραμα ζυμοῖ, and not ὅλοῖ, is the true reading here, and Gal. v. 2, see proved Examen Millii here.

[8] Ζυμοῖ, Leavens.] i. e. Soureth and corrupteth: so Jerome, Totam massam corrumpit, "It corrupts the whole lump." Thus Plutarch saith* the priest of Jupiter might not touch leaven, because ἡ ζύμη δὲ γέγονεν ἐκ φθορᾶς, αὐτὴ φθείρει τὸ φύραμα μιγνυμένη, "leaven both arises from corruption, and corrupts the mass it is mixed with."

[9] Ver. 7. Ἐκκαθάρατε τὴν παλαιὰν ζύμην, Purge out the old leaven.] Here the apostle speaks of cutting off the incestuous person, according to the metaphor of the Jews, whose saying is, that, "as a little leaven leavens the whole lump, so concupiscence corrupts the whole man;" and that, by the command to abstain from leaven, adultery is forbidden. This impurity he calls the "old leaven" to be purged out, because the Corinthians were infamous for it to a proverb, as Phavorinus,† Hesychius, and Erasmus, show. He alludes also to the command to put away leaven out of their house, in commanding to put away the evil person; and to the paschal feast, in giving this reason why the old leaven should be put away, "because Christ our passover is sacrificed for us;" which being done once for all, we Christians must ever keep the feast, by being always a new lump, pure from hypocrisy, which is "the leaven of the pharisees" (Luke xii. 1), from the leaven of false doctrine, and corrupting of the word of God, which is the leaven of the pharisees and sadducees (Matt. xvi. 6. 12), and from the leaven of wickedness, and wicked men, according to those words of the psalmist, "Deliver me out of the hands of the wicked; and from the hands of the cruel, וחומץ, and the leavened" (Ps. lxxi. 4), i. e. the sour and the angry man, who corrupts and depraves others.

[10] Ver. 8. Μηδὲ ἐν ζύμῃ κακίας, Not with the leaven of that malice,] Which is usually carried on with dissimulation of affection, and concern for piety, and so is pharisaical. Nor with that wickedness which prompts us to deceive another to his hurt. Thus Theophylact here saith, "He is κακὸς, an evil man, who doth evil things; but he is πονηρὸς who doth them with profound subtlety, and deceitful (or hurtful) counsel." Thus πονηροὶ καὶ γόητες, "evil men and deceitful," are joined together as "deceiving and being deceived," 2 Tim. iii. 13. "But with the unleavened bread of sincerity;" which expression seems to allude to the import of the Hebrew מצות, or azyma, which, saith Bochart,‡ signifies panes puros et sinceros, "pure and sincere loaves," from all mixture of leaven. And so this is an exhortation to reject such false apostles, and deceitful workers, as this doctor was, and others in the church of Corinth, who "transformed themselves into the apostles of Christ" (2 Cor. xi. 13), and yet were not ἐξ εἰλικρινείας, "men of sincerity" (2 Cor. ii. 17), but corrupters of the truth, who "walked in craftiness, handling the word of God deceitfully" (2 Cor. iv. 2), and by their "subtlety seduced them from the simplicity which was in Christ" (2 Cor. xi. 3). More intolerable is it in the doctor to reject those words ἀλλ' ἐν ἀζύμοις εἰλικιρνείας, καὶ ἀληθείας, upon the sole authority of the Ethiopic version, they being owned by all the other versions, by all the Greek scholiasts, by Origen, ed. Huet. in Jer. p. 143, in Matt. p. 170, in Joh. 163. 172, by Hilary the deacon, by Jerome, lib. i. contra Pelag. f. 97; and the very word מצות azymos, might have taught him the pertinency and elegancy of these words; that 10 Yet not (intending) altogether (to forbid you any conversation) with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world.

11 [12] But now (since I heard this great miscarriage, and have been more exactly informed of the state of your church,) I have (changed my style, and) written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is [13] called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer (a contumelious person), or a drunkard, or an extortioner; (and that so strictly, as to charge you) with such an one [14] no not to eat.

12 [15] For what have I to do to judge (or censure) them also that are without (the church, as heathen fornicators, and the stepmother of this incestuous fornicator are)? do not ye (and all other churches and societies) judge them that are within (their body)?

13 But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore (leaving them to the judgment of God, censure them that thus offended within your body, and you will, by so doing) put away from among yourselves that wicked person.

signifying, saith Bochart, panes puros et sinceros, ch. vi. 5. He rejects οὐδὲ εἷς, upon the sole authority of the same version, though it be owned by all the versions, and all the Greek and Latin commentators. See the mischief of this licentiousness, Examen Millii in locum.

[11] Ver. 9. Ἔγραψα ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, I had written to you in this epistle.] All the Greek commentators upon this place conclude he wrote this, οὐκ ἐν ἄλλῃ, ἀλλ' ἐν ταύτῃ, "not in another, but in this epistle:" so Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Photius, and Theophylact, on this place. And who ever heard among the ancients of more than fourteen epistles of Paul? or of one word cited from an epistle of his to the Corinthians supposed to be lost? It cannot therefore be concluded hence, that any epistle of Paul writ and sent to the church of Corinth is lost: but only that some things in this epistle were changed by him, before he sent it to them. But, saith Mr. Clerc, "there is a contrariety in this interpretation to all the rules of grammar," which it seems none of the Greek scholiasts understood so well as he. Moreover, it is the common observation of grammarians, that the aorist is so called because it is of an indefinite signification, and is sometimes used for the perfect, sometimes for the plusquam perfect tense. So Herod, laying hold of John, ἔδησεν αὐτὸν, "had bound him," Matt. xiv. 3; "He commanded his servants to be called, οἷς ἔδωκε τὸ ἀργύριον, to whom he had given the silver," Luke xix. 15; "Jesus ἐμαρτύρησεν, had testified," John iv. 44; ἐξένευσεν, "He had withdrawn himself," John v. 13; "Annas ἀπέστειλεν, had sent him bound to Caiaphas," John xviii. 24. (2.) That τῇ, as Phavorinus saith, is put ἀντὶ τοῦ ταύτῃ, "instead of this," he both confesses and proves from Col. iv. 16, 1 Thess. v. 27, and where then is the contrariety of this interpretation to the rules of grammar?

[12] Ver. 11. Νυνὶ δὲ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν, But now I have written to you.]

Obj. 1. "This only shows," saith Mr. Clerc, "that the apostle here speaks of this epistle, and in ver. 9 of another."

Ans. This only shows that he speaks of this epistle sent, and of ver. 9, of what he had writ in it, before he saw this cause to change his style, and to add, to what he had said before, "a railer" and "a drunkard."

Obj. 2. "But," saith he, "he had nowhere, in the former part of this, admonished his Corinthians not to associate with fornicators."

Ans. Nor is it to be wondered, that he should nowhere say that which he had changed into these words, ver. 11. And, secondly, according to my exposition, what he before had written is contained in the immediate preceding words ver. 10.

[13] Ὀνομαζόμενος ἀδελφός, Called a brother.] Some think the word ὀνομαζόμενος refers to the words following, and imports that if any man be defamed and noted for the vices following, he is by the apostle's direction to be avoided: but the word plainly refers to the brother, and imports, that if any one, who hath professed himself a Christian, be found guilty of these crimes, he is to be avoided: now of all these sins some among the Corinthians were still guilty; of fornication, 2 Cor. xii. 21, of covetousness and extortion, 1 Cor. vi. 8, 2 Cor. xi. 20; they were idolaters, 1 Cor. x. 7, xiv. 20, railers or contumelious persons, 2 Cor. x. 2, xi. 19, drunkards, 1 Cor. vi. 21.

[14] Μηδὲ συνεσθίειν, No not to eat.] According to the Jewish canons, it was not lawful to eat or drink with one that was under their cherem. Tertullian and Theodoret carry this farther and say, Cum talibus non vult nos cibum sumere, nedum eucharistiam, "With such we must not eat at our own, much less at the Lord's table." But this, being a matter of discipline, can concern only those who are intrusted with the government of the church, not private communicants; though doubtless he, who was by excommunication separated from the place where this and other sacred functions were performed, was also separated from the table of the Lord.

[15] Ver. 12. Τί γάρ μοι καὶ τοὺς ἔξω κρίνειν; For what have I to do to judge them that are without?] Here our critic Mr. Le Clerc is too bold; (1.) when he quarrels with Paul's Greek; asking, what construction this is, τί μοι κρίνειν; I answer, none at all, but τί μοι προσήκει καὶ τοὺς ἔξω κρίνειν; "What concerns it me to judge them that are without?" is both good sense and good Greek. As in Latin, Quid mea refert? In English, "What is it to me?" So τί μοι ὄφελος; "What profit (is it) to me?" 1 Cor. xv. 32, τί γὰρ, "What is it" to the truth of God? Rom. iii. 3, τί γὰρ, Quid enim refert? Phil. i. 18. (2.) It is horribly bold to add, without any, yea, against all copies, μὲν οὖν γε instead of κρίνειν οὐχὶ, which have no affinity either in letters or in sense: the words need none of these criticisms; they are taken from Deut. xiii. 5, xxii. 21, and there they run thus, καὶ ἐξαιρεῖς τὸ πονηρὸν ἐξ ὑμῶν αὐτῶν, "So shall you put away the evil from among you;" and the Greek commentators read them thus, καὶ ἐξαιρεῖτε τὸ πονηρὸν, "And you will put away the evil." So the whole sense runs thus, κέκρικα, I have judged already of the incestuous person (ver. 3), and I judge concerning all other persons, in profession Christians, but in practice fornicators, &c., that you ought not to communicate with them; but I say nothing of the stepmother of this person, who hath not owned the Christian faith: for what belongs it to me to judge of them who are without the church? Do not you, in your church and civil assemblies, judge them only which are of your body? But them who are without the church, God, who is the governor of all men, judgeth; and by thus judging those that are within your body, you will put away the evil, or, this evil person, from you.

CHAPTER VI.

1 Dare any of you, having a matter (of complaint, suit, or action,) against another, [1] go to law before the unjust (the heathen tribunals), and not (rather submit it to be heard) before the saints?

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1. Κρίνεσθαι ἐπὶ τῶν ἀδίκων, Go to law before the unjust.] The saying of the Jews is this, That* "he who goes to law before the tribunal of the gentiles, profanes the

* Buxt. Lex. Talm. p. 1666.

2 Do ye not know (from Daniel) that [2] the saints (of the Most High shall receive the kingdom, Dan. vii. 27, and so) shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you (Christians, and by Christian magistrates), are ye unworthy (of the smallest judicatures, or) to judge [3] the smallest matters?

3 Know ye not (from Christ) that we (endued with the Holy Spirit) [4] shall judge (condemn, and cast out, the prince of this world, and his evil) angels? [5] how much more (worthy are we, by the assistance of the same Spirit, to judge of the) things that pertain to this life?

4 If then ye have judgments (controversies, or judicial causes,) of things pertaining to this life, (do ye) set them to judge who [6] are least esteemed in (and by) the church (i. e. the heathen magistrates).

5 I speak (this) to your shame. Is it so, that (by this action you should even confess before the heathen, that) there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren?

6 But brother goeth to law with (his Christian) brother, and that before the unbelievers (as if there were not among them one believer sufficient to decide their controversies).

7 Now therefore [7] there is utterly a fault (or a defect) among you, because ye go to law (about these matters) one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?

8 Nay, (so far are you from this Christian temper of bearing injuries with patience, that) ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren.

9 (And what will be the issue of these evil practices)? Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind,

10 Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.

11 And such were some of you: but ye are washed (by baptism), but ye are sanctified, but [8] ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.

12 (And whereas your false teachers encourage you to eat things offered to idols, in the idol temples, x. 23, and to indulge unto excess, because all meats are lawful; I grant that) All (these) things are lawful unto me, but all things (lawful) are not expedient (to be done, especially when tending to my brother's ruin, or my own): all things (of this nature) are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any (so as that I cannot refrain from them in such cases).

13 Meats (indeed are) for the belly, and the belly for meats (nor have either of them any other use): but (this is only for this present life: the time will come when) [9] God shall destroy both it and them. Now (but now, whereas some extend the words all things are name of God and gives honour to an idol; that he is to be accounted a wicked man, and as one that hath reproached and blasphemed, and lifted up his hand against the law of Moses." Accordingly, the apostle here represents this action in the Christian, as a reproach to the society, and to the spirit of wisdom which was poured out upon the church (ver. 5, 6), and as that which gave occasion to the heathens to observe in the Christians a contentious spirit.

[2] Ver. 2. Οἱ ἅγιοι τὸν κόσμον κρινοῦσι, The saints shall judge the world.] We often read that even the best of saints shall "stand before the judgment-seat of Christ" (Matt. xxv. 33, 2 Cor. v. 10, Rev. xx. 12), that they shall be assessors with Christ then, we read not; the words of Christ, Matt. xix. 28, in what sense soever taken, prove it not; they being spoken not of all saints, of whom the apostle here speaks, but of the twelve apostles only: these words must therefore admit of one of these two senses; viz. that there shall be Christian magistrates, who shall be governors, and so judges of the world, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, that "kings shall be their nursing-fathers, and queens their nursing-mothers" (Isa. xlix. 23), and that of Daniel (vii. 18), "The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom;" or, that they shall judge and condemn the world by the faith preached for a testimony to them (Matt. x. 18, xxiv. 14, Luke xxi. 13, 1 Cor. i. 6, ii. 1, 2 Thess. i. 10, 1 Tim. ii. 6, 2 Tim. i. 8), as Noah did (Heb. xi. 7, whence is the gospel so often called, "the testimony of Christ"), and by the Spirit given "to convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and judgment" (John xvi. 8), in which sense our Lord saith, "Now is the judgment of this world," John xii. 31.

[3] Κριτηρίων ἐλαχίστων, The smallest matter.] This word κριτήρια here, and ver. 4, saith Grotius, doth not signify tribunals, but controversies and judicial causes. Accordingly the βιωτικὰ κριτήρια, "judgments concerning things of this life," ver. 4, are by Photius rendered τὰ βιωτικὰ φιλονεικήματα, καὶ τὰς πρὸς ἀλλήλους δίκας καὶ ἔριδας, "Their controversies, contentions, and judicial causes, against each other," about these matters.

[4] Ver. 3. Ἀγγέλους κρινοῦμεν, We shall judge angels.] i. e. Evil angels, say all the Greek scholiasts; and this the Christians gloriously did by expelling them from their seats and their dominions, and forcing them to confess before their votaries they were only devils (see the general preface, §. 18): in which sense, saith our Saviour, "Now is the prince of this world cast out; the prince of this world is judged," John xii. 31, xvi. 11.

[5] Μήτι γε βιωτικά, How much more.] Μήτι γε, πόσῳ γε μᾶλλον, Hesychius, Phavorinus, and Photius apud Œcumenium.

[6] Ver. 4. Τοὺς ἐξουθενημένους, Them who are least esteemed.] That the ἐξουθενημένοι are the heathens, hath been shown, note on 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. Moreover, it is manifest that these words are to be read by way of question, as in the paraphrase; or by way of charge against them, thus, If you still retain your secular judicatures, or tribunals, you set them to be judges over you, who are despised in the church. For the apostle doth not here command them to do this, but sharply doth rebuke them for it, saying, "I speak this to your shame:" and this he doth by showing that this in effect signified that there was "not a wise man among them."

[7] Ver. 7. Ὅλως ἥττημα, There is utterly a defect,] Among you, that go to law at all; it being either on the one side, want of patience and Christian contentment, that you do not rather bear some injuries than thus seek to redress them; or, on the other, covetousness and injustice, which move you to do wrong to and defraud your brethren.

[8] Ver. 11. Ἀλλ' ἐδικαιώθητε ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Κυρίου, &c. But ye are justified in the name of our Lord.] Here is the figure called hyperbaton, for, we are justified in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and sanctified by the Spirit of our God: so Philem. 5, "Hearing of thy love and faith which thou hast towards the Lord Jesus Christ, and towards all saints;" i. e. which faith thou hast towards Christ, and love to his saints. Moreover, whereas Mr. Clerc here saith that "to be justified is the same thing with being washed, or sanctified, and that to be so by the name of the Lord, is to be so by taking upon them the profession of the Christian religion in baptism," he is utterly out in both, for sure I am he cannot produce one passage in all Paul's epistles, where δικαιωθῆναι, "to be justified," bears any such sense; but it still signifies to be absolved from the guilt of sin, and approved as righteous, either at present, or before God's tribunal. And so the name of Christ, when we are said to be justified by it, must signify, not the profession of Christianity, but faith in Christ dying for us, and be the same with ἐν αὐτῷ, "in him, for in him shall all that believe be justified," &c. (Acts xii. 39). Moreover, justification here is ascribed to the name of Christ, i. e. to faith in him; sanctification, to the Spirit of God; which shows they cannot signify the same thing: for, where the cause is different, the effect must be so also.

[9] Ver. 13. Ὁ Θεὸς καταργήσει, God shall destroy both it and them.] From these words that opinion, not of Origen lawful for me, to fornication also; know ye that) [10] the body is not (at all) for fornication, but for (the service of) the Lord (the head of the body); and the Lord for (the resurrection and glorification of) the body.

14 And (accordingly) God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power.

15 Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ (your head? 1 Cor. xii. 12. 27;) shall I [11] then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot (as I by fornication shall most surely do)? God forbid.

16 What? know ye not that he which is joined to an harlot is one body (with her)? for two, saith he, shall (by that action) be one flesh (as doing that by which, according to God's institution, two are made one flesh).

17 But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit (with him, as being partaker of his Spirit; for by one Spirit we Christians are all united to this head, Rom. viii. 11, 1 Cor. xii. 13).

18 Flee (therefore) fornication. (For) Every (other) sin that a man doeth is without (the pollution of) the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth [12] against (and polluteth) his own body.

19 What? know ye not that [13] your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, (and) which ye have of God, and ye are not your own (he having by his Spirit taken possession of you, and sealed you up as his own proper goods)?

20 (You, I say, are not your own:) For ye are bought with a price (even the precious blood of Christ): [14] therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's (by right of purchase, and the possession of his Spirit).

only, but of Athanasius,* Basil,† Hilary,‡ Theodoret,§ and others, seems to be confirmed, that at the resurrection, when we shall neither eat nor drink, "marry, nor be given in marriage" (Matt. xii. 30), there will be, as no meat, the world being then burnt up; so no belly, nec quæ sunt sub ventre, nor any difference of sexes.

[10] Τὸ δὲ σῶμα οὐ τῇ πορνείᾳ, The body is not for fornication.] The heresy of the Nicolaitans held that it was lawful to eat things offered to idols, and to commit fornication (Rev. ii. 14, 15), as Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Theodoret, and Austin testify (see the notes on 2 Pet. ii. and the Epistle of Jude). And therefore Theodoret introduces the words thus, τοῦτο λέγεις, "This thou sayest in defence of thy eating thus, and of thy fornication, All things are lawful for me."

[11] Ver. 15. Ἆρας οὖν.] Taking them then from Christ, shall I make them the members of a harlot? For, saith Hilary here, Membra adhærentia meretrici desinunt esse membra Christi, "The members, which cleave to a harlot, cease to belong to Christ."

[12] Ver. 18. Εἰς τὸ ἴδιον σῶμα, Against his own body.] Other sins pollute the heart and the soul, but those of fornication and uncleanness do properly pollute the body. Hence are those actions styled always in the scripture, pollutions: for "though all sins," saith Hilary, "render a man carnal, yet is this more especially desiderium carnis, quod sordibus maculatam animam cum corpore tradit gehennæ, carnal concupiscence, which exposes to hell the soul together with the body, defiled by its filthiness." This argument against fornication, from the defilement of the body by it, plainly shows, that it is a sin against the law of nature, and is a fault in man, as man.

[13] Ver. 19. Τὸ σῶμα ὑμῶν ναός, &c. Your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost.] Two things concur to make up the notion of a temple:

First, That the divinity should either dwell in or give some signal tokens of his especial presence there. Hence was the temple of Jerusalem called "the house of God's habitation," and the tabernacle, the house where the divinity or Shechinah dwelt in the midst of them. Accordingly, "I am with you," Hag. ii. 4, is there interpreted, ver. 5, "My Spirit is in the midst of you," or among you. Hence is the tabernacle styled, "The place of the habitation of God's glory," Ps. xxvi. 8, and from thence he is said to "shine forth," when he gave them a testimony of his gracious presence. Now the Holy Spirit, being that in the New Testament which answers to the Shechinah in the Old, he dwelling in the bodies, and being present in the assemblies of the saints, doth make them a "spiritual temple," or "habitation of the Lord" (Eph. ii. 22).

Secondly, That it be a place dedicated and appropriated to his use: hence were the tabernacle and temple so often styled the house and temple of the Lord, and by him "my house," according to those words of Christ, "Wist you not that I must be ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρός, in my Father's house?" for as to be ἐν τοῖς τοῦ Διός,* is to be "in the temple of Jupiter," so to be ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρός, must signify to be "in my Father's temple;" and therefore, saith the apostle, "you are not your own," as being dedicated and appropriated to God's use and service.

He also saith, "If any man corrupt" or desecrate, "the temple of God, him will God destroy, for the temple of God is holy" (1 Cor. iii. 17), i. e. appropriated and consecrated to his use. And he exhorts all Christians to abstain from all idolatrous and profane actions by this inquiry, "What communion hath the temple of God with idols?" proving all Christians to be the temple of God, and so appropriated to him by these words, "You are the temple of God, as God hath said, I will dwell and walk in them; I will be their God, and they shall be to me a people" (2 Cor. vi. 16).

Excellent therefore is the inference of Tertullian,† that "since all Christians are become the temple of God, by virtue of his Holy Spirit sent into their hearts, and consecrating their bodies to his service, we should make chastity the keeper of this sacred house, and suffer nothing unclean or profane to enter into it, lest that God who dwelleth in it, being offended, should desert his house thus defiled."

CHAPTER VII.

1 Now (to speak) concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: (viz.) [1] It is good for a man not to touch a woman (i. e. to live unmarried, or without the use of a woman, or, it is not good to marry, Matt. xix. 10. This I grant as Christ did to him who, having the gift of continency, can receive the saying).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VII.

[1] Ver. 1. Καλὸν ἀνθρώπῳ γυναικὸς μὴ ἅπτεσθαι, It is good for a man not to touch a woman.] It was an old philosophical question, An uxor ducenda esset, whether a man should marry? In which many of them held the negative, as Bion and Antisthenes,* who said, "A handsome wife would be

* Laert. in Bion. p. 108. in Antist. lib. vi. p. 138.

2 Nevertheless, to avoid (that) fornication (which is so common at Corinth, and so freely practised by the Nicolaitans, under the pretence that matrimony is a thing indifferent), let every man have (ἐχέτω, retain,) his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband.

3 Let (also) the husband render unto the wife due benevolence (i. e. the conjugal duty): and likewise also the wife unto the husband.

4 (For) The wife [2] hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife.

5 Defraud ye not (therefore) one the other (of this benevolence), except it be with (mutual) consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves [3] to fasting and prayer; and (then) [4] come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.

6 But I speak this (which I am now about to say of continence, ver. 2) by permission, and not of commandment (of the Lord, enjoin continence, ver. 25).

7 For I would that all men were (unmarried) even as I myself (am). But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that.

8 I say therefore [6] to the unmarried (men) and (to the) widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I (do).

9 But if they [7] cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn (or to be inquieted with filthy lustings).

10 And unto the married I command, yet not I (only), but the Lord (also, Matt. xix.), [8] Let not the wife depart (or separate herself) from her husband:

common, one deformed a punishment, οὐ λῃτέον ἄρα, therefore we should have none." Hence that of Menander,* οὐ γαμεῖς, ἐάν γε νοῦς ἔχεις, "if thou art wise, thou wilt not marry." This was held out of different sentiments; as, v. g. by some out of good liking to that celebrated doctrine of Plato, κοινὰς μὲν γυναῖκας, κοινοὺς δὲ εἶναι παῖδας, "that women and children should be common;" and this doctrine was improved by the Nicolaitans into all manner of impurity, who therefore did ἀναίδην ἐκπορνεύειν, "commit whoredom without shame." But others of the school of Pythagoras refused to touch a woman, as being an impediment to philosophy, and that which defiled that purity they aimed at. Hence Apollonius† the magician is represented as a man of so great chastity, γυναικείας ὅτι καθαρὸν ἑαυτὸν μίξεως διὰ τέλος ἦγαγε, "that he lived ever free from converse with women." And Porphyry saith‡ that "a philosopher must not marry;" that, to live the intellectual life, we must abstain from women, all use of them being a defilement. The word γυνὴ, which in this chapter still signifies a wife, seems to refer this question to the first opinion, but the phrase γυναικὸς μὴ ἅπτεσθαι, inclines us to refer it to the latter; the first question being too gross to be propounded by the Corinthians to the apostle; the second being a question then in vogue, on the account of which Apollonius and the Pythagoreans obtained great repute.

[2] Ver. 4. Οὐκ ἐξουσιάζει, Hath not power.] Here is a plain argument against polygamy: for, if the man hath no power over his own body, he cannot give the power of it to another, and so he cannot marry another; nor could his wife, exclusively to him, have the power of his body, if he could give his body to another.

[3] Ver. 5. Τῇ νηστείᾳ καὶ τῇ προσευχῇ, To fasting and prayer.] The apostle speaks not here of ordinary prayer, which is the daily work of Christians, but of extraordinary devotions on some special occasions; for daily prayers, public or private, needed no such consent of parties, nor by them could either of them be defrauded of their due benevolence. Vain therefore are the questions of St. Jerome, Quale illud bonum est quod orare prohibit, quare non ingrediuntur ecclesias? as if the bed undefiled could hinder men's prayers, or their going to church. Vain is his inference, Si sacerdoti semper orandum est, ergò semper carendum matrimonio, "If the priest must always pray, he must never marry:" for to pray always, and without ceasing, is also the duty of the laity (Luke xviii. 1, Eph. vi. 18, 1 Thess. v. 17).

[4] Καὶ πάλιν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ συνέρχεσθε, And come together again.] This chapter affords many arguments against the vow of continence, and those perpetual divorces from the bed, which are so commonly practised by the papists, on pretence of religion. For (1.) the apostle here admits of no separation of the wife and husband, but only with condition that they "come together again" to perform conjugal duties, as the word συνελθεῖν doth import, not allowing a perpetual separation, no, that they may "give themselves to prayer and fasting;" and that for a perpetual reason, at least whilst an age capable of temptation, and which may be subject to incontinence, remains. (2.) He declares the gift of continence not to be common to all, but proper to some only, as being the proper gift of God, and therefore not to be gotten by our industry: "I would," saith he, "that all men were unmarried, even as I myself am; but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that;" "he then that can receive it" (Matt. xix. 12), saith our Saviour, "let him receive it:" whence it is natural to conclude that all men cannot. (3.) Notwithstanding the present necessity which rendered it so desirable, that they might "serve the Lord without distraction," and which made their condition better and more happy who had the gift of continence, he abstains from laying any obligation to celibacy upon them, lest he should lay a snare on their consciences (ver. 35), and bring them under a necessity of burning (ver. 9). Much less would he have urged young men and women to that vow, which lays a greater snare and an absolute necessity upon them, rather to burn than marry. And, lastly, he supposes that some cannot contain (ver. 9), some have a necessity to marry, and need so requires them to do (ver. 36, 37). This respects not what the apostle had said, but what he was about to say of continence, it being very usual with the apostle to make this preface to what he was about to say: so ver. 29, of this chapter, τοῦτο δέ φημι, "But this I say, brethren, the time is short," 1 Cor. i. 12, τοῦτο δὲ λέγω, "But this I say," viz. "That every one of you saith, I am of Paul;" 1 Cor. xi. 17, τοῦτο δὲ παραγγέλλων, "But as to this I am about to declare unto you, I praise you not." 1 Thess. iv. 15; see Gal. iii. 17; blot out therefore the note there, and substitute this in the room of it.

[6] Ver. 8. Ἀγάμοις, The unmarried men.] The apostle begins his discourse concerning the virgin man and woman, ver. 25, here therefore he must speak of the unmarried man, or the man loosed from a wife, and of the widow, as, ver. 11, ἄγαμος is the woman who must not embrace a second marriage. And perhaps this only was St. Paul's case, as may, saith Grotius, be probably collected from this place, and may be argued from the testimony of Clemens of Alexandria,* and the interpolated Ignatius, who both reckon Paul among the apostles that were married; and from the strictness of the Jewish canons, which obliged all Jews to marry at twenty.

[7] Ver. 9. Εἰ δὲ μὴ ἐγκρατεύονται, γαμησάτωσαν, If they contain not, let them marry.] Had the apostle then known of any vow of continence, or any ecclesiastical law rendering it a damnable sin, and a renouncing their first faith to marry, though they burned, he could not so generally have propounded and prescribed marriage as the remedy of that disease; but would have restrained his word, as Esthius here doth, iis quibus conjugii contrahendi potestas esset, id est, qui à lege et voto continentiæ sunt liberi, "to those who were free from the law and vow of celibacy." But I believe he knew of none whom God's law had placed under a necessity of burning; that is, say the Greek commentators, of being subject to the insults of lust.

12 But to the rest (you mention to me, who are coupled with unbelievers,) speak I, [9] not the Lord (by any decision he hath made, or any precept he hath given, in this case, ver. 25, as in the former instance): If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, [10] let him not put her away.

13 And the woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if (yet) he be pleased to dwell with her, [10] let her not leave him.

14 For the unbelieving husband is (Gr. hath been) sanctified [11] by the (believing) wife, and the unbelieving wife is (hath been) sanctified by the (believing) husband: [12] else were your children (seminally) unclean; but now they are holy.

wife depart from her husband.] Note, that the apostle speaks here of the married persons, who had mutually embraced the Christian faith, forbidding them to divorce themselves, except for cause of fornication, as it was customary for women as well as men to do, both among the Jews and Romans. Dr. Lightfoot on this place cites this canon from R. Juchanan, "The wife hath power to put away her husband;" and he gives instances of it in Herodias divorcing herself from Philip, and Drusilla from Azizas; and our Lord supposes this was practised, in these words, "If a woman put away her husband, and marry another, she commits adultery" (Mark x. 12). That this was common among the heathens, is apparent from that saying of Seneca,* that "none blushes at it, because there was scarce a marriage without it." Hence had they divers names for the divorce of both kinds: for the wife being after marriage carried to the house of her husband, her divorce was called† ἀποπομπὴ "a sending her away from his house;" and because the woman, being not mistress of the house, could not do this to the man, but only leave his house, her divorce was called ἀπόλειψις, "a leaving of the house," though it was conceived in the usual form, Res tuas tibi habeto (see note on 1 Tim. iii. 2. 12): and therefore, though the word ἀφιέτω be used both ver. 12 and 13, it was not amiss in our translators, when it relates to the man, to render it, "Let him not, ἀποπέμπειν, put, or send her away;" and when it related to the woman, to render it, "Let her not ἀπολείπειν, leave him:" that here the apostle condemns these divorces, with our Saviour, is evident, because he saith, he speaks this "by commandment of the Lord."

[9] Ver. 12. Οὐχ ὁ Κύριος, Not the Lord.] St. Paul doth not say this to intimate that this direction was given by him, only as a man using his natural reason to direct them to what he thought best, but not as delivering the mind of Christ; for he had before declared the contrary, saying, "We have the mind of Christ," ii. 16, and after doth it in these words, "If any man think himself a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord," xiv. 37, but he speaks thus to declare our Lord, in his discourse touching divorce, had not decided the case, de imparibus conjugiis, of the marriage of a believer with an infidel; but left this to the decision of the apostles, by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, promised to lead them into all truth. Theophylact here notes, that this and the former verse speak of those who were both infidels when they first married; for, saith he, οὐδ' ὅλως ἐξῆν πρὸς ἄπιστον ζεύγνυσθαι, "it was not lawful for a Christian to be joined to an infidel."

[10] Ver. 13. Μὴ ἀφιέτω αὐτὸν, Let her not leave him.] This caution was needful, because the primitive Christians were sometimes in doubt of this, as finding that the Jews did null all marriages of the holy seed with infidels; and hence conjecturing that they also might be obliged to do so, and thinking it ἀσεβὲς, "an impious thing" to cohabit with a heathen, especially if he were addicted also to unnatural lusts, and that by being ὁμόκοιτοι, "bedfellows" to such a one, they communicated with him in his iniquity and idolatry; and concluding, that as he who was joined to a harlot was "one body with her," so she that was joined to an idolater was one body with him. Hence Justin Martyr saith of one of these Christian women, not without seeming approbation of the fact, that* τὸ λεγόμενον παρ' ὑμῖν βιβλίδιον ἐοῦσα ἐχωρίσθη, "giving him a bill of divorce, she was separated from him."

[11] Ver. 14. Ἐν τῇ γυναικὶ, By the wife.] Uxoris gratiâ, because of the wife, i. e. he is to be reputed as sanctified, because he is one flesh with her who is holy. So ἐδούλωσεν Ἰσραὴλ ἐν γυναικὶ, καὶ ἐν γυναικὶ ἐφυλάξατο, "Israel served for a wife, and for a wife he kept sheep," Hos. xii. 12; "I desire that you faint not, ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσί μου, by reason of my tribulations," Eph. iii. 13; and that "no man be shaken ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσι ταύταις, by reason of these tribulations," 1 Thess. iii. 3 (see Noldius in the twenty-third signification of the particle ב). Or we may take these words in the sense of the Greek interpreters, viz. The unbelieving husband hath been sanctified by the believing wife, by his consent to cohabit with her, and to have seed by her.

[12] Ἐπεὶ ἄρα τὰ τέκνα ὑμῶν ἀκάθαρτά ἐστι, νῦν δὲ ἁγιά ἐστι, Else were your children unclean, but now they are holy.] He doth not say, Else were your children bastards, but now they are legitimate; but, Else were they unclean, i. e. heathen children, not to be owned as a holy seed, and therefore not to be admitted into covenant with God, as belonging to his holy people. That this is the true import of the words ἀκάθαρτα and ἅγια, will be apparent from the scriptures, in which the heathens are styled "the unclean," in opposition to the Jews in covenant with God, and therefore styled "a holy people." So Isa. xxxv. 8, ὁδὸς καθαρὰ ἔσται ἐκεῖ, καὶ ὁδὸς ἁγία κληθήσεται, "A highway shall be there, and it shall be called, The way of holiness; ἀκάθαρτος, the unclean shall not pass over it; but the redeemed of the Lord shall walk therein," ver. 9; and lii. 1, God saith of Jerusalem, the holy city, "There shall no more come into thee, ἀπερίτμητος καὶ ἀκάθαρτος, the uncircumcised and unclean: so Acts x. 28, "You know that it is unlawful for a Jew to keep company with a man of another nation; but God hath shown me that I should call no man common, or ἀκάθαρτον, unclean." Whence it is evident that the Jews looked upon themselves as ἐοῦλοι Θεοῦ καθαροὶ, the clean servants of God" (Neh. ii. 20), and upon all heathens and their offspring as unclean, by reason of their want of circumcision, the sign of the covenant. Hence, whereas it is said that Joshua circumcised the people (v. 4), the Septuagint say, περιεκάθαιρεν, "he cleansed" them. Moreover, of heathen children, and such as are not circumcised, they say, "They are not born in holiness;" but they on the contrary are styled זרע קדוש, σπέρμα ἅγιον, "a holy seed" (Isa. vi. 13, Ezra ix. 2), and the offspring from them, and from those proselytes which had embraced their religion, are said to be born בקדושה in holiness, and so thought fit to be admitted to circumcision, or baptism, or whatsoever might initiate them into the Jewish church; and therefore to this sense of the words holy and unclean the apostle may be here most rationally supposed to allude, declaring that the seed of holy persons, the offspring born ἐκ τῶν ἁγιασμένων "of saints,"† as Christians are still called in the New Testament, are also holy. And though one of the parents be still a heathen, yet is the denomination to be taken from the better, and so their offspring are to be esteemed, not as heathens, i. e. unclean, but holy, as all Christians by denomination are. So Clemens Alexandrinus‡ infers, saying, "I suppose the seed of 15 But if the unbelieving (person will) depart (and so break off the matrimonial duty), let him depart. A brother or a sister [13] is not under bondage (Gr. is not enslaved) in such cases: but God hath called us to peace (and therefore we must give no occasion of quarrel with, or separation from, so near a relative, or of disturbance of the family).

16 For what knowest thou, O wife, whether (by dwelling with him) thou shalt (not be a means to) save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt (not, by dwelling thus with her, be a means to) save thy wife?

17 [14] But (whether this be so or not) as God hath distributed (the gift of continence) to every man (or not), as the Lord hath called every one (to the faith, married to an unbeliever, or servant to them, or not), so let him walk (doing nothing on his part contrary to those relations). And so ordain I in all churches (which I have converted).

18 Is any man called being circumcised? [15] let him not (endeavour to) become (as one) uncircumcised. Is any (man) called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised.

19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing (that renders us more or less acceptable in the sight of God), but the keeping of the commandments of God (is all in all).

20 Let every man (still) abide in the same calling wherein he was called (to the faith, not thinking himself obliged by it to quit his calling).

21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest (lawfully) be made free, use it rather. (Care not I say)

22 For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman (being delivered by him from his bondage to sin, John viii. 36): likewise also he that is called, being free, (nevertheless) is Christ's servant.

those that are holy is holy, according to that saying of the apostle Paul, The unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband," &c. Hence then the argument for infant baptism runs thus: If the holy seed among the Jews was therefore to be circumcised, and be made federally holy by receiving the sign of the covenant, and being admitted into the number of God's holy people, because they were born in sanctity, or were seminally holy; for, "the root being holy, so are the branches also:" then, by like reason, the holy seed of Christians ought to be admitted to baptism, and receive the sign of the Christian covenant, "the laver of regeneration," and so be entered into the society of the Christian church. The substance of this argument is in Tertullian de Animâ, cap. 39, and the author of the Questions, ad Antiochum, qu. 114.

Else were your children, ἀκάθαρτα, unclean, &c.] I think that the other translation, "Else were your children bastards," is not sufficiently confuted by saying that then the argument will not prove what the apostle had asserted: for what more strongly enforceth the believer of each sex to own that they may lawfully cohabit still as man and wife, than this inference, that otherwise they must own that the guilt of whoredom lay upon them both, and that their children were born ἐκ πόρνης, i. e. bastards? (Deut. xxiii. 2;) but then the word used for a bastard by this apostle being νόθος (Heb. xii. 8), and the word γνήσιος being the proper word for a legitimate offspring, had the apostle intended such a sense, he would have used the words which in the Greek writers are generally used in that sense, and not such words as in the Septuagint and in the Jewish language always have a relation to federal holiness, or the want of it, but none at all to the legitimacy or spuriousness of the birth.

[13] Ver. 15. Οὐ δεδούλωται, Is not under bondage.] That is, saith Hilary,* "the Christian in this case is free to marry to another Christian."—"He is free," saith Photius,† "to depart, because the other hath dissolved the marriage."—"If he depart," say Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact,‡ "because thou wilt not communicate with him in his infidelity, be thou divorced, or quit the yoke; for it is better that thy marriage should be dissolved than thy piety." These fathers therefore plainly supposed that the laws which say, "He that marries her which is put away committeth adultery" (Matt. v. 32), and that "the wife is bound to the husband as long as he liveth" (ver. 39, Rom. vii. 1—3), concerned only equal marriages; partly because the apostle saith he had no commandment of the Lord to produce for the decision of this case, and partly because he doth not here say, as in the case of equal marriages, ver. 11, ἐὰν χωρισθῇ, "If she be separated, let her remain unmarried." It is the opinion of Mr. Thorndike,* that the apostle looked upon marriage made by persons before they were Christians, to lay no stricter obligations on them than the laws which they were under when the marriage was contracted designed to lay upon them; but this seems not consistent with our Lord's decision touching divorce and polygamy; for though they were allowed both by Jews and gentiles, our Saviour pronounces them disagreeable to the first institution of matrimony by God; and, these laws binding all that were Christians, no Christian convert could, after his or her conversion, do any thing on their parts opposite to them; and whatsoever liberty of divorce the laws of Jew or gentile might allow of, the apostle will not permit the believing wife or husband to make use of them by beginning the separation (ver. 12, 13. 15): if then these words, "A brother or sister is not in bondage in these cases," do import they are not obliged to live unmarried, such a total and perpetual desertion must dissolve the matrimony, and render the deserting person as dead unto the other: but though all the Romanists, and many of the reformed, allow of this interpretation of the fathers, it must be dangerous to admit of it without this restriction—A brother or sister is not enslaved, after all means of peace and reconciliation have been in vain attempted, and the unbeliever hath entered into another marriage, or rather hath dissolved the former by adultery, as may well be supposed of those heathens who thus separated from their Christian mates: and this interpretation seems to be confirmed from the former words relating to the case of the believing wives and husbands; "If they depart, let them remain unmarried:" it being not to be supposed that believers would dissolve the bond of matrimony by adultery. Therefore the apostle seems to grant this in the case of unbelievers departing from Christians on the account of their faith.

[14] Ver. 17. Εἰ μὴ, But.] Or rather, if not. So אם אין and לא אם, Gen. xviii. 21, εἰ δὲ μὴ, "And if it be not so;" see xxiv. 8, and xlii. 16. 37; Job ix. 24, εἰ δὲ μὴ, "And if it be not so, who will make me a liar?" and xxiv. 25; John xiv. 2, εἰ δὲ μὴ, "If it were not so, I would have told you" (see Noldius de Partic. Hebr. p. 92). To others, εἰ δὲ μὴ seems to be misplaced, as being added to the beginning of this verse, when indeed it belongs to the close of the former, thus; "How knowest thou, O man, εἰ τὴν γυναῖκα σώσεις, whether thou shalt save thy wife or not?" And so the seventeenth verse will begin ἑκάστῳ, as the twentieth and the four-and-twentieth verses, which answer to it, do.

25 Now [18] concerning virgins I have no (particular) commandment of the Lord: [19] yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be (found) faithful (in my apostolical function, by advising still what is best and most expedient in those cases to be done).

26 I suppose therefore that this is good [20] for the present distress (of Christians, daily subject to persecution), I say, that it is good for a man so to be (i. e. a virgin still).

27 Art thou (then) bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife.

28 But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such (in these times of persecution) shall have (more) trouble in the flesh: but I spare you (not thinking it therefore fit to lay the yoke of celibacy upon you).

29 But this I say, brethren, (that) the time (of this life) is short: it remaineth (then), that both they that have wives be as though they had none;

price?] That the charity of Christians was employed to buy their brethren out of slavery, we learn from the Apologies of Justin Martyr,* and Tertullian,† who tell us, that "the offerings of Christians at the sacrament were, amongst others, employed for that use:" and that these words ought to be rendered by way of interrogation is evident from the preceding discourse, which is still by way of question: "Is any man called, being uncircumcised?" (ver. 18,) "Art thou called, being a servant?" (ver. 21.) And that they are to be thus interpreted the design of the apostle shows, which is to inform them that their Christianity did not exempt them from their secular relations to heathens, the believer still continuing in his conjugal relation, and in the same relation of a servant to his heathen master. Now to tell them they were bought with a price by Christ, and therefore ought not to be the servants of men, is plainly to contradict this design; but it is well consistent with the foregoing advice, "If thou canst be made free, use it rather," to add, Are ye then bought out of servitude by the charity of Christians? return not again to the service of unbelievers.

[17] Ver. 24. Let him abide with God.] Neither deserting his master upon pretence of being God's servant, nor doing any thing against the laws of God in obedience to his master.

[18] Ver. 25. Περὶ τῶν παρθένων ἐπιταγὴν Κυρίου οὐκ ἔχω, Concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord,] To produce, touching their continuance in, or change of that state. Here Esthius takes care to add, that the apostle must be understood only de virginibus quæ nondum Deo voverunt continentiam, "of such virgins which were not under the vow of continence." And when the apostle saith without exception, "If a virgin marry, she hath not sinned" (ver. 28), he adds, Nisi sit virgo Christo dicata, i. e. "Unless she be a virgin consecrated to Christ by such a vow;" both which exceptions, seeing Paul, assisted by the Holy Spirit, thought not fit to add; we may presume that he knew nothing of that matter.

[19] Γνώμην δὲ δίδωμι, &c. But I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be found faithful.] This, saith the apostle, is all that is required of a minister of God, and a steward of his mysteries, that he be found faithful in administering the grace of his apostleship (1 Cor. iv. 1, 2). And this fidelity was still attended with the power of Christ assisting them, as appears from these words, "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry" (1 Tim. i. 12). So that this phrase doth not imply, as some imagine, that the apostle had only an ordinary assistance in this advice, such as any pious skilful pastor may still expect; much less that this is a counsel which might be disregarded without sin.

[20] Ver. 26. Διὰ τὴν ἐνεστῶσαν ἀνάγκην, For the present distress.] This phrase plainly shows this cannot relate ad pacata ecclesiæ tempora, to the peaceable times of the church, for they are not times of tribulation, as the word ἀνάγκη often signifies: so Luke xxi. 23, "There shall be ἀνάγκη μεγάλη great tribulation, ἐν ἀνάγκαις, ἐν στενοχωρίαις, in afflictions, necessities, distresses," 2 Cor. vi. 4, ἐν ἀνάγκαις, ἐν διωγμοῖς, "in necessities and persecutions," 2 Cor. xii. 10. Nor can it signify the troubles common to this life, for they are not always instant or present: see ver. 28, where the phrase is θλῖψις ἐν σαρκὶ "trouble in the flesh."

[21] Ver. 31. Ὡς μὴ καταχρώμενοι, As not abusing it.] So this expression is used in Philo;* "This is another's, do not covet it; this is thy own, use it so as not abusing it; hast thou abundance? give to others: for the excellency of wealth consists not in thy purses, but in helping those that want."

Note also, That they who interpret these words, "The time is short," with relation to the troubles shortly to come at the destruction of Jerusalem, and the fashion of the world passing away, of a new scene of things beginning to appear, seem not to give the true import of the apostle's words: for (1.) It is not easy to conceive what concernment the Corinthians then had in the destruction of Jerusalem; what peculiar troubles happened; what loss of wives or of possessions they did then sustain; or indeed, what persecution they then lay under, from which the destruction of Jerusalem might free them.

Secondly, The fashion of the world passing away, seems plainly to refer to the dissolution of it, or at least to our passing out of it in a short time, according to those words of John, "Love not the world, nor the things of the world: for the fashion of the world passeth away, and the lusts thereof" (1 John ii. 15. 17). Again, to have, and use these things, as if we had them not, or did not use them, is to be moderate in the enjoyment of them; not to be much affected with them when we have, or much afflicted when we want or lose them.

[22] Ver. 34. Μεμέρισται ἡ γυνὴ καὶ ἡ παρθένος, There is a difference between a wife and a virgin.] The reading of the king's manuscript is this, καὶ μεμέρισται, "And is distracted." And then begins the thirty-fourth verse, thus, καὶ ἡ γυνὴ ἄγαμος, καὶ ἡ παρθένος ἡ ἄγαμος, "And the unmarried woman," i. e. the widow, "and the virgin careth for the things of the Lord:" but though this reading makes a good sense, it is not found in any of the Greek or Latin interpreters. (2.) It makes too great a variation from the ordinary reading, by adding καὶ before μεμέρισται, and by joining ἡ γυνὴ, ἡ ἄγαμος, which in all printed copies and ancient interpreters are separated. And (3.) it makes ἡ γυνὴ here to signify the sex only, and to be indeed a virgin, or unmarried woman: whereas in this chapter it above twenty times signifies a wife, and always stands opposed to the virgin, or unmarried person:

wife and a virgin. (For) The unmarried woman careth (only) for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth (also) for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

35 And (of) this (difference) I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you (by restraining you wholly from marriage), but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, [23] if she pass the flower of her age (Gr. if it be overaged), and need so require (or, he thinks this ought to be done), let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them (who so think) marry.

so ver. 1, 2, ver. 3 twice; ver. 4. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 twice, 16 twice; 27 thrice, 29. 39; which observation is sufficient to destroy this reading; especially seeing the common reading gives a good sense, and may be rendered thus, The virgin and the wife are divided, or drawn several ways: the first looking only after purity; the second, after the pleasure of her husband also.

[23] Ver. 36. Ἐὰν ᾖ ὑπέρακμος, If it be overaged.] The Jews,* from the precept to "increase and multiply," thought themselves obliged to marry at twenty, and that they offended against the law if they did not so, declaring that whosoever neglected this precept was guilty of homicide. The philosophers say, with Hesiod,† that γάμος ὥριος, "marriage was seasonable to the women about twenty, to the male from thirty to thirty-five." By the law of Lycurgus,‡ they who continued unmarried were prohibited to see the games: by the laws of the Spartans they were punished: and by Plato, they are declared unworthy of any honour: to either of these opinions the discourse of the apostle may relate.

[24] Ver. 37.] Note, It is generally supposed, that these three verses relate to virgins under the power of parents and guardians; and hence the usual inference is this, Children are to be disposed of in marriage by their parents. Now this may be true, but it hath no foundation in this text; for τηρεῖν ἑαυτοῦ παρθένον, is not to keep his daughter's, but his own virginity, or rather his purpose of virginity: for, as Phavorinus§ informs us, "He is called a virgin who freely gives up himself to the Lord, renouncing matrimony, and preferring a life spent in continency."

And that this must be the true import of these words, appears from this consideration, that this depends upon the purpose of his own heart, and the power he hath over his own will, and the no necessity arising from himself to change this purpose: whereas the keeping a daughter unmarried depends not on these conditions on her father's part, but on her own; for, let her have a necessity, surely the apostle would not advise the father to keep her a virgin, because he hath determined so to do; nor could there be any doubt whether the father had power over his own will or not, when no necessity lay upon him to betroth his virgin. The Greek runs to this sense, If he had stood already firm in his heart, finding no necessity, to wit, to change his purpose; and hath power over his own will not to marry, finding himself able to persist in the resolution he hath made to keep his virginity; he doeth well to continue a virgin: and then the phrase, "If any man thinks he behaves himself unseemingly towards his virgin, if it be overaged," and thinks he ought rather to join in marriage, refers to the aforesaid opinions of Jew and gentile, that all ought to marry at such an age; if any think thus, saith the apostle, let them do what they will, let them marry, for, in so doing, they do not sin: and then he concludes with those words applied to both cases, "So then both he that marries doeth well, and he that marries not doeth better."

[25] Ver. 39. Ἐν Κυρίῳ, In the Lord.] That is, ὁμοπίστῳ, "to one of the same faith," say Theodoret, Tertullian, Cyprian, and Jerome, declaring that all marriage with heathens is forbid to Christians. Hence also it is evident that second marriages are allowable (see Rom. vii. 3, 1 Tim. v. 14).

[26] Ver. 40.] "This (say some) is not spoken with the authority of an apostle, or a teacher sent from God, but in such a style as implies an ordinary assistance, such as any skilful pastor may still expect."

But these men did not well consider, that the apostle was writing to them who were apt to question his apostleship, and required "a proof of Christ speaking in him" (2 Cor. xiii. 3), to whom it was proper to say, "Whatsoever you may conceive of me, I suppose I have the Spirit of God." Nor (2.) that δοκέω is frequently an expletive, and so δοκῶ ἔχειν may be here rendered, "I have the Spirit of God." So δ δοκεῖ ἔχειν, "that which he seems to have," Luke viii. 18, is δ ἔχει, "that which he hath," Matt. xiii. 12; οἱ δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν, "they which are accounted to rule," Mark x. 42, are ἄρχοντες, "they which rule," Matt. xx. 25; so, in this epistle, ὁ δοκῶν ἑστάναι, is "he that stands," x. 12, ὁ δοκῶν εἶναι φιλόνεικος, "he that is contentious," xi. 16, and εἴ τις δοκεῖ προφήτης, "If any man be a prophet, or spiritual, let him know that the things I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord," xiv. 37.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 [1] Now as (for the plea mentioned in your letter) touching (the lawfulness of eating) things offered unto idols, we (who abstain from eating these things to the scandal of others) know (as well as others) that (an idol is nothing, for) we all have (this) knowledge. (Yet) Knowledge (when it is not joined with charity)

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

[1] Ver. 1. Περὶ τῶν εἰδωλοθύτων, Now as touching things offered to idols.] This is that doctrine of the Nicolaitans, Nullam differentiam esse docentes, idolothyton edere, "That things offered to idols might be eaten without discrimination;" which the apostle here sets himself to confute, speaking of these things both in the general, x. 23 to the end; and in particular, as they were eaten with relation to the idols, in the idol's temple.

puffeth up (against), but charity edifieth (our brother).

2 And (therefore) if any man think that he knoweth any thing (and by reason of that knowledge despiseth others, not regarding their welfare), he knoweth nothing yet [2] as he ought to know.

3 But if any man love God (and for his sake, his brother, John iv. 17, using his knowledge to the glory of God, and the benefit of his brother), the same is known (and accepted) of him.

4 As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we (also generally) know that [3] an idol is nothing in the world (of that it is esteemed by them that worship it, i. e. no deity), and that there is none other God but one.

5 For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, [4] (as (to the heathens) there be gods many, and lords many,) (they having their celestial and terrestrial gods and lords,)

6 But (or, yet) to us (Christians) there is but [5] one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in

[2] Ver. 2. Καθὼς δεῖ γνῶναι, As he ought to know.] To know thus, saith St. Bernard,* is to know in what order, with what study and endeavour, and to what end, we ought to know all things. "In what order," as desiring to know that first which is most necessary to salvation. "With what study," as desiring most ardently to know that which is most vehemently to be loved, and most tends to provoke love in us. "To what end," viz. not out of curiosity, vain-glory, or filthy lucre; but for the edification of thyself, or of thy brother.

[3] Ver. 4. Οὐδὲν εἴδωλον, An idol is nothing.] This aphorism, that an idol was nothing, was usual among the Jews, who were taught by the Old Testament, that the heathen deities were הבלים and אלילים, "vanities and nothings." Thus in Echa Rabboth,† or the old comment on the Lamentations, Rachael speaks thus to God, "Why enviest thou an idol, which is nothing?" And in the Elle Shemeth Rabba,‡ we have this aphorism, "There is nothing solid in an idol." And hence the rabbins concluded, saith Dr. Lightfoot, that it could have no power to pollute, and that whatsoever worship was paid to it, if it were not worshipped under the notion of a God, it was nothing; but whatever they meant of an idol's being nothing, it is certain the apostle only means that it is nothing of a God; for he proves that it is nothing, because "there is no God but one;" and so all the criticisms about the word εἴδωλον, idol, are impertinent.

[4] Ver. 5. Ὥσπερ εἰσὶ θεοὶ πολλοὶ, As there are gods many, and lords many.] Here Mr. Clerc§ translates the words thus, "As really there are gods many," &c., and magisterially saith, "The apostle hath no reference to the gods or idols of the heathens; but, by gods in heaven, are meant God and the angels; in the earth, magistrates, who are also called the lords of the world." But he proves not a word of all this: yea, the contrary is not only said by all the ancient fathers and commentators] upon the place, who both assert and prove the contrary, but also is evident from the words themselves: for, first, when the apostle had said expressly, "We (Christians) know there is no God but one;" would he immediately add, There are really gods many? What would this have been, but, as Chrysostom and Theophylact say, τοῖς φαυλοτέροις μάχεσθαι, "to speak things repugnant?" Which to avoid, the apostle adds, though there be οἱ λεγόμενοι θεοὶ, "those that are called gods," by these words separating them from him who truly is so: and showing they are only so in name, but not in reality; not in truth, but in word only. And this is evident from the words following: "Though (to them) there be gods many, and lords many, παρ' Ἕλλησι θεοὶ καὶ κύριοι λεγόμενοι, yet to us (Christians) there is but one God and one Lord." Lastly, whereas he saith, "By gods in heaven are meant God and the angels," let him show any instance in the New Testament where θεοὶ is put for God and the angels; or where both are thus mentioned under that one name. Here to be sure it cannot be so, for the apostle had not only said before, "We (Christians) know there is no other God but one;" but saith after, this is he, "of whom are all things," i. e. whose creatures the angels are; could he then say, in the intermediate words, There really are many gods in heaven, God and the angels.

[5] Ver. 6. Εἷς θεὸς ὁ πατὴρ, One God the Father.] Hence the Arians and Socinians argue thus against the Deity of Christ, viz. "As he who saith there is one emperor, to wit, Cæsar, saith in effect there is no other emperor but Cæsar; so he that saith there is one God the Father, saith in effect there is no other God besides the Father." Again, "He who, having separately spoken of one God, proceeds distinctly to speak of one Lord, to wit, Jesus Christ, doth by that distinct title sufficiently show Jesus Christ is not that God."

Ans. To the second argument the reply is obvious, by retorting the argument as do the ancient commentators, against this Arian objection, thus: That as the apostle, by saying, "there is one Lord," to wit, Jesus Christ, cannot be reasonably supposed to exclude the Father from being also the Lord of Christians, as he is often styled in the New Testament; so neither by saying, "there is one God the Father," ought he to be supposed to exclude Jesus Christ from being also the God of Christians. So Origen* and Novatian.† Especially if we consider, (1.) that he is here styled that one Lord, "by whom are all things," i. e. "by whom all things are created," Eph. iii. 9. "All things which are in heaven or in earth," Col. i. 16, "for he that made all things is God," Heb. iii. 5, and by the work of the creation is the Godhead known, Rom. i. 20. And this is elsewhere made the very description of God the Father, that it is he "by whom are all things," Rom. xi. 35, Heb. ii. 10. (2.) That all things were created, not only by this Lord, but εἰς αὐτὸν, "for him" also, Col. i. 16. Now this is the very thing which the apostle here ascribes to God the Father.

Secondly, To the other argument I answer, That we and all the ancients assert, as truly as they can do, the unity of the Godhead, and that Christ Jesus is not another God, but only another person from the Father; and that the application of the word God here to the Father, doth not necessarily exclude the Son from being God also; but only from being the fountain of the Deity, as the Father is. Thus, when these words, "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and last" (Rev. i. 17, ii. 8, xxii. 13), are by John applied to Christ; it cannot be concluded hence that the Father is not also "Alpha and Omega, the first and the last," as he is often called in the Old Testament: and though "our Saviour" be the proper title of our Lord Jesus, as his very name informs us; yet is the Father in scripture styled "our Saviour," 1 Tim. i. 1, ii. 3, and "the Saviour of all men," iv. 10. The primitive fathers therefore considering God the Father as the fountain of the Deity, and Jesus Christ as "God of God," do frequently assert two things which may serve to illustrate this passage; viz.

(or, for) him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him.

7 [6] Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol ('s being something) unto this hour eat (what is offered to) it as a thing offered unto an idol (i. e. not as common meat, but as a sacred banquet in honour of the idol); and their conscience being weak (i. e. erroneous, subject to stumble and fall,) is defiled.

8 But (it is to be considered by us, that) meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better (for so doing in the sight of God); neither, if we eat not, are we the worse (you therefore ought not so to eat, as to give occasion to the fall of your weak brother).

9 But (rather to) take heed lest by any means this liberty of your's become a stumblingblock to them that are weak [7] (so as to provoke them to fall from Christianity, or to defile themselves with idolatry).

10 For if any man (who with this erroneous conscience goes to these feasts) see thee which hast knowledge [8] sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be (the more) emboldened (by thy example) to eat those things which are offered to idols (in honour of the idol, or as thinking it no hurt to worship idols);

11 And (so) through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for [9] whom Christ died?

12 But (surely it deserves well to be considered, that) when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ (wounding and murdering the members of his body; defeating the great end of his death; and destroying them whom he designed to save).

13 Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend (and so to perish), [10] I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend (and perish).

First, That Christians* acknowledge one God only, even the Father, and yet that Jesus Christ was truly God, of the substance of the Father.

Secondly, That God the Father was the Creator of all things, and yet that all things were created by the Word.

[6] Ver. 7. Ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐν πᾶσιν ἡ γνῶσις, There is not in all this knowledge.] This contradicts not what is said, ver. 1, "We all have knowledge;" that being spoken of them who abstained from things offered to idols, out of scandal to others only; this of them who through weakness did eat of them: the first, being well-informed Christians, knew there was but one God the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ, to be worshipped: the weak thought there might be some deastri, or "inferior lords," to whom some reverence was due.

[7] Ver. 9. Πρόσκομμα γίνεσθαι τοῖς ἀσθενοῦσιν, To be a stumbling-block to the weak,] Is not barely to offend them, or to induce them to do any thing with a doubting conscience; but to make them stumble at the Christian faith, or fall off from it, or perish by idolatry. For thus it follows, "And so shall thy weak brother perish:" so, Rom. ix. 32, 33, "Israel stumbled at the stone of stumbling, as it is written, Behold, I lay in Zion, λίθον προσκόμματος, a stone of stumbling;" 1 Pet. ii. 8, "To them that be disobedient, the stone, which the builders disallowed, is made λίθον προσκόμματος, a stone of stumbling."

[8] Ver. 10. Ἐν εἰδωλείῳ κατακείμενον, Sitting at meat in the idol's temple.] The gentiles, saith Josephus,† offer hecatombs to their gods, καὶ χρῶνται ἱερείοις πρὸς εὐωχίαν, "and use their temples for their banqueting-house;" so we read Judg. ix. 27, Amos ii. 27, and in profane authors very frequently. When therefore, saith the apostle, the weak Jews who abhorred idols, or the gentiles newly converted from the worship of them, shall see thee doing the same thing which heathens do in honour of their idols, and that in places appropriated to their worship; will they not be tempted, by the example of such a strong and knowing Christian, to conclude, that either idolatry is by Christians accounted no sin, or that the idol deserves some honour; and so comply with them from these erroneous principles in eating things offered to idols?

[9] Ver. 11. Δι' ὃν Χριστὸς ἀπέθανεν, For whom Christ died.] From this, and the like place, Rom. xiv. 15, it is strongly argued, that Christ intentionally died for those that may for ever perish: for here the apostle dissuades the Corinthians from scandalizing their weak brethren, by an argument taken from the irreparable michiefs they do them, the eternal ruin they may bring upon them, by this scandal: whereas, if it be as some assert, that all things, even the sins of the elect, shall work together for their good, and that they can never perish; if the apostle knew and taught this doctrine to them, why doth he go about to fright them from this scandal, by telling them it might have that effect, which he before had told them was impossible? If you interpret his words thus, So shall he perish for whom in charity you ought to judge Christ died; it is certain from this doctrine, that they must be assured this judgment of charity must be false, or that their brother could not perish. In the first case, they could not be obliged to act by it; and, in the second, they could not rationally be moved by it, to abstain from giving scandal on that impossible supposition. If you interpret him thus, So shalt thou do that which in its nature tends to make thy brother perish, and might have that effect, had not God determined to preserve all for whom Christ died from perishing: since this determination renders it sure to me, who know it, that they cannot actually perish, it must assure me there can be no cause of abstaining from this scandal, lest they should perish by it. Moreover, by thus offending, saith the apostle, ye sin against Christ, viz. by sinning against them whom he hath purchased with his blood, and destroying them for whose salvation he hath suffered. Deny now this intent of Christ's death, and show, if you can, in what Christ hath demonstrated his great love to them that perish; how they can ever sin against redeeming love; or, how by thus offending them, who neither do nor can belong to him as members of his body mystical, we are injurious to Christ.

[10] Ver. 13. Οὐ μὴ φάγω κρέα, I will eat no flesh.] It being customary for the heathens to consecrate all the flesh they used to eat to some demon* or idol, and the weak Jews being so nice in matters of that nature, this necessity might sometimes lie upon the Christians to abstain from all flesh, to avoid the offence of the weak brother; and the apostle here engageth rather to submit to it, than to be an occasion of his ruin (see Theodor. H. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 15, and the note on Rom. xiv. 2).

Note also, That there is nothing in this chapter which intimates that the apostle discourseth of a conscience doubting about things indifferent; but rather that he all along discourseth of an erroneous conscience, which from a false persuasion falleth into sin: for, saith he, "some with conscience of the idol, to this hour, eat it as a thing offered to the idol" (ver. 7). Now so to do, is to act plainly, not from a doubting conscience about a thing indifferent, but from an erroneous conscience about a thing unlawful; and yet this is the man "whose conscience, being weak, is defiled." And in this sense are the words ἀσθενὴς, ἀσθενεία, ἀσθενεῖν, to be weak, and weakness, commonly used in the Septuagint, answering to the Hebrew כשל which signifies to fall and stumble (see note on Rom. v. 6).

To scandalize, or offend this weak brother is not only to do a thing ungrateful to him, or to cause him to sin by acting with a doubting conscience; but to divert him from the faith, or cause him to dislike it, because he sees that Christians so freely do communicate with idols; or to encourage him to join idolatry with the profession of it. That this is the constant sense of the word σκανδαλίζεσθαι, see note on Rom. xiv. 13. 21.

Hence evident it is, that what dissenters say from hence against our ceremonies, that they offend or grieve them, that they cannot comply with them by reason of those doubts which they lie under, touching the lawfulness of the use of them, is impertinent to the apostle's argument; if they would have the apostle here to patronize them, they must confess that they are acted herein by a false judgment and erroneous conscience, as the weak person mentioned by him was.

Nevertheless, this seemeth to press hard on them, who believe the schism of such weak persons will finally tend to their ruin, and render them exiles from the flock of Christ, and yet, in things indifferent, will in this dreadful sense cause their weak brother to offend, or to be scandalized; since this they do for that which commends them not to God; which doing, they are not the better, or omitting, they are not the worse (ver. 8). For if schism or idolatry be equally damning sins, and equally cause my brother to offend, and him to perish for whom Christ died, we are equally to take heed in both cases, lest ἐξουσία ἡμῶν, our power to do the thing indifferent become a stumbling-block to the weak, or the erroneous, in their judgment of these things. For let men imagine what other difference they please in the case, whilst the sad issue or event is in general the same, to wit, the perishing of my brother, and my power to have abstained from that which, through his erroneous conscience, gave occasion to it, is the same, I fear the guilt will be the same.

To this purpose tend those words of Origen:* "If we did more diligently attend to these things, we should avoid sinning against our brethren, and wounding their weak consciences; ἵνα μὴ εἰς Χριστὸν ἁμαρτάνωμεν, that we may not sin against Christ, πολλάκις ἀπολλύμενον οὐ μόνον τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ γνώσει, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἄλλοις τισὶ τῶν παρ' ἡμᾶς ἀδελφῶν, δι' οὓς ὁ Χριστὸς ἀπέθανεν, ἐφ' οἷς εἰς Χριστὸν ἁμαρτάνοντες τίσομεν δίκας, ἐνδικουμένης τῆς τῶν δι' ἡμᾶς ἀπολλυμένων ψυχῆς ἐξ ἡμῶν, our brethren that are among us, for whom Christ died, often perishing, not only by our knowledge, but by many other ways and things; in which things we, sinning against Christ, shall suffer punishment, the soul of them, that perish by us, being required of, and avenged upon, us."

CHAPTER IX.

1 [1] Am I not (who thus abstain from what is offensive to the weak) an apostle (as well as others)? am I not free (to do what they may)? [2] have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord (as well as they)? are not ye my work in the Lord? (and so if others have a power to live upon your temporal things, have not I rather? ver. 11, 12.)

2 If I be not (so visibly and demonstratively) an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am (so) to you: for the [3] seal (and testimony) of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord; (as being converted by me, exercising the signs of an apostle among you in all patience; in signs and wonders, and in mighty deeds, 2 Cor. xii. 12.)

3 Mine answer (or apology) to them that do examine me (why I and my companions use not the same freedom as other apostles and evangelists) is this,

4 Have we not power to eat and to drink (without using so much abstinence; or at the charge of the church, as well as they)?

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IX.

[1] Ver. 1. Οὐκ εἰμὶ ἀπόστολος; Am not I an apostle?] The apostle here, from his own example, in abstaining from the power which the Lord had given him to receive the necessaries and conveniences of life from them to whom he preached the gospel, shows how much it concerned them, in a matter unnecessary, to abstain from the exercise τῆς ἐξουσίας, of their rightful power granted by Christ; to avoid the scandal of the weak, and to promote men's spiritual welfare (so Esthius). This condescension indeed was not in the exercise of his apostolical authority; but it was in that which he might have challenged as an apostle of Christ (1 Thess. ii. 6). Hence he speaks thus, "Am not I an apostle?" and, therefore, have I not ἐξουσίαν, "power to eat and drink?" Yea, it was in that he might have challenged by the nature of his office (ver. 7), by the prescription of the law (ver. 8), and by the ordinance of Christ (ver. 14). And this abstinence he used not only in Achaia, but in Thessalonica (1 Thess. ii. 9, 2 Thess. iii. 8), that he might be an example for their imitation (ver. 9). It was not therefore any private or personal right which he here waved, but a right of office belonging to all who did officiate in things sacred (see note on 2 Cor. ix. 2).

[2] Οὐχὶ Χριστὸν ἑώρακα; Have I not seen Christ?] The apostles being chosen to be witnesses of the resurrection, it was requisite that St. Paul, being called to that office, should also see him risen. Hence Ananias speaks to him, "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest see the Just One, and shouldest hear the words of his mouth: for thou shalt be his witness to all men of what thou hast seen and heard" (Acts xxii. 14, 15, xxvi. 26). Accordingly we find, that Christ was seen of him (1 Cor. xv. 8), yea, often appeared to him after his resurrection (Acts xviii. 9, xxii. 18), and that he was taught the gospel by the immediate revelation of Jesus Christ (Gal. i. 12). The Syriac, Arabic, and some MSS. read thus, "Am I not free? Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?"

[3] Ver. 2. The seal of my apostleship are ye in the Lord.] This text seems very much abused by our sectaries, when from these words they argue, That seeing they have been instrumental to work some reformation in others by their preaching or discourses, therefore they have a legal, yea, divine call to exercise their ministry, and to administer the holy sacraments; which argument will plead as much for masters or mistresses of large families, who have successfully employed themselves in a religious education of their children and servants; and for schoolmasters, who have instilled good principles of virtue and religion into their scholars; and for every good man and woman, who spend themselves in examples of exhortation, and encouragement to others, to lead a virtuous and religious life, and therefore prevail more than others, because they know they do it not from prospect of advantage, or in pursuance of their calling, but out of pure affection to their souls. Moreover I inquire, what it is they would prove from these words? Is it that they are of the number of Christ's apostles? If not, why do they use this text? Is it that they have converted men

5 Have we not power [4] to lead (or carry) about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas?

6 Or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working (and to receive maintenance of the church as others do)?

7 [5] Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? (And shall we, soldiers of Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. ii. 2, the planters of his spiritual vineyard, the pastors of his flock, Acts xx. 28, be debarred of this privilege?)

8 Say I these things [6] as a man (only, from principles of natural reason and equity)? or saith not the law the same also?

9 For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God (say this only to show he) take (-th) care for oxen?

10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? [7] For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that (in this spiritual husbandry, 1 Cor. iii. 9,) he that ploweth should plow in hope (reaping some advantage by it); and that he that thresheth in (that) hope should be partaker of his hope.

from heathenism to Christianity, "by signs and miracles, and powers of the Holy Ghost?" or that "the signs of an apostle have been wrought among" their auditors, "by signs, wonders, and powerful operations," as this apostle doth? 2 Cor. xii. 12. Or that they have given their hearers such a proof of Christ speaking in them, as Paul did? xiii. 3. Or by their means their hearers were endowed with the gifts of tongues and prophecy, as the Corinthians were? If not, this text cannot concern them at all, who had no such seal or sign of their apostleship, as Paul saith he did.

[4] Ver. 5. Ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα περιάγειν, To lead about a sister, a wife.] It is the observation of Hilary, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, That as some women attended on the Lord when he was on earth, to minister necessaries to him and his disciples; so some rich women, converted by them, followed the apostles to provide diet and other necessaries for them; and they, who so interpret these words, translate them a sister-woman. This exposition Theodoret mentions, but seems not to approve; and indeed it seems to have had its rise from Tertullian* when he was a Montanist.

For Clemens of Alexandria† not only saith, that he that marrieth, εἰκόνας ἔχει τοὺς ἀποστόλους, "hath the apostles for examples; and that Peter carried his wife with him till her martyrdom;" but confutes the enemies of matrimony from these very words, "Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles?" adding, that οὐχ ὡς γαμετὰς, ἀλλ' ὡς ἀδελφὰς, περιῆγον τὰς γυναῖκας,‡ "they carried their wives about, not as wives, but as sisters, to minister to those that were mistresses of families; that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without any reprehension or evil suspicion, enter into the apartments of the women." This exposition seemeth (1.) most agreeable to the words, which are not γυναῖκα ἀδελφὴν, but ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα, which cannot be well rendered "a sister-woman," there being no sister which is not a woman. (2.) It is most agreeable to the context, which plainly seems to speak, not of such wealthy women which could nourish the apostles out of their abundance, but of such which were to be nourished with them by others. And (3.) to the language of the Jews, who called their wives sisters. Thus Tobit saith to his wife, μὴ λόγον ἔχε, ἀδελφὴ, "Take no care, my sister" (Tob. v. 20): and Clemens, in the words now cited, saith, "They were carried with them not as wives, but as sisters." And, lastly, this seems best to consult the credit and esteem of the apostles, who could not, without evil suspicion, carry about with them single women, or the wives of other men. As for the women who are said to have followed Christ, they were none of his retinue, they attended not upon his person, but upon his doctrine, and so they ministered no such ground of suspicion. But hence I think it doth not follow, as Mr. Clerc saith, that Paul then had a wife, but only that he, or Barnabas, had one, or at least might have had one, no law then forbidding it: Tertullian saying, if not in his own sense, yet in the person of the orthodox, Licebat apostolis nubere, et uxores circumducere. (De Exhort. Castit. cap. 8).

[5] Ver. 7. Τίς στρατεύεται; Who goeth a warfare?] The pertinency of this instance will be more visible if we consider that, both in the Old and New Testament, the ministerial function is represented as a warfare (see note on 1 Tim. i. 18): and the Levite, who was consecrated to the service of the tabernacle, is said to "enter into the host," Numb. iv. 3, λειτουργεῖν, "to officiate," saith the Septuagint; "to serve the service," saith the Chaldee. The church of God is also represented as his vineyard, Isa. v. 1. 5, Matt. xx. 1, xxi. 18. 33. 40, 41, Luke xiii. 6, 7, and as his flock, Isa. xl. 11, lxiii. 11, Matt. xxvi. 31, Luke xii. 32, Acts xx. 28, 29, 1 Pet. v. 1, 2. But then St. Chrysostom* and Theophylact observe that "he saith not, Who goeth a warfare, and is not rich? Who plants a vineyard, and heaps not up gold of the fruits of it? Who feeds a flock, and makes not a merchandise of the sheep? Teaching us, that the spiritual pastor should be content with little, and seek only what is necessary, not what is superfluous."

[6] Ver. 8. Κατ' ἄνθρωπον, As a man.] This phrase in the New Testament doth always signify to speak, act, and live, after the manner of a mere natural man, not yet acquainted with the mind of God, nor acting by the guidance of divine wisdom, or not assisted by the Holy Spirit. So Rom. iii. 5, "I speak κατ' ἄνθρωπον, as a man" by mere strength of reason would be apt to argue; 1 Cor. iii. 3, "Are ye not carnal, and walk as men," i. e. as natural and not spiritual men (ver. 1); 1 Cor. xv. 32, "If, κατ' ἄνθρωπον, after the manner of men," i. e. the heathen manner, "I have fought with beasts at Ephesus;" Gal. i. 11, "The gospel which was preached by me was not κατ' ἄνθρωπον, after man," i. e. it was not the product of human wisdom, but received from the revelation of Jesus Christ; Gal. iii. 15, "Brethren, I speak after the manner of men," i. e. what is acknowledged in all civilized nations (see note on 1 Pet. iv. 6).

[7] Ver. 10. Δι' ἡμᾶς γὰρ ἐγράφη, For our sakes this was written.] A like expression occurs in Maimonides,† who, having cited these words, "Thou shalt not take the dam with the young," saith, "If God took such care for beasts and birds, how much more for men?" And R. Menahem, on the same words, saith, The intention of the command was not to show mercy to birds, sed propter homines hoc dicit, but he saith this to teach men mildness and commiseration; and Philo‡, in the beginning of his discourse περὶ θυόντων, "of those who offer sacrifice," says, "The law took not care of brutes, but of reasonable creatures," οὐ τῶν θυομένων ἀλλὰ τῶν θυόντων, by its prescriptions that the sacrifice should be perfect and without blemish, having regard not to things offered, but to him that offered them, that he should be free from vile passions, or evil dispositions: so that these words do not import that God takes no care for beasts, for "he saveth man and beast" (Ps. xxxvi. 6), "and giveth to the beasts their food" (Ps. cxlvii. 9); but only that the commands he gives us, to show mercy and kindness to our beasts, are especially designed to teach us greater kindness to our brother man. Thus the high-priest Eleazar saith to Aristæas,§ that "all the precepts of this nature, delivered by Moses, had λόγον βαθὺν, a profound sense; and that God did not make them as being concerned about mice, or weasels or such-like beasts, but that all these laws were

11 If (then) we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap (some of) your carnal things? (Rom. xv. 27.)

12 If others be partakers of this [8] power over you, are not we rather (so, who laid the foundation of a Christian church among you, 1 Cor. iii. 10, and have begotten you through the gospel? 1 Cor. iv. 15). Nevertheless we have not used this power (among you, 2 Cor. xi. 7—9); but (choose rather to) suffer (the want of) all things, lest we should hinder the (advancement of the) gospel of Christ.

13 (And not to insist only on mystical interpretations of the law:) Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things (excoriating, washing, and preparing a sacrifice for the altar, as do the Levites,) live of the (holy) things of the temple? and (that) they which wait at the altar are (according to the institution of the law) partakers with the altar? (for that consumes not always the whole sacrifice, but leaves some portion to be eaten by the priests.)

14 Even so hath the Lord (Jesus, in the gospel, Matt. x. 20, Luke x. 7,) ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel.

15 But (yet) I have used none of these things: neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: for it were better for me to die (for want of food), than that any man should make my glorying (in thus advancing the gospel) void.

16 (I say, my glorying:) For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of (upon that account): for necessity is laid upon me (by the command and special call of our Lord Jesus Christ, so to do); yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel! (because then I shall be guilty of disobedience to the heavenly vision, Acts xxvi. 9.)

17 [9] For if I do this thing willingly (if I choose to take nothing for preaching the gospel, when I am under no obligation so to do), I have a (special) reward (and may glory in it): but if against my will (I preach the gospel, yet am I under a necessity of doing this; and therefore cannot glory in it, or expect any special reward above others for it, since) a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me (and so in that I only can discharge my trust).

18 [10] What is my reward then (or, what is matter of special reward and glory to me)? Verily (this,) that, when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel of Christ without charge, that I abuse not (or use not, see 1 Cor. vii. 31) my power (which is given me) in the gospel. (And this matter of rejoicing I have:)

19 For though I be free from all men (as being a servant to none), yet have I made myself (as a) servant unto all, that I might gain the more.

20 And unto the (unconverted) Jews I became as a Jew, (circumcising Timothy for their sakes, Acts xvi. 3,) that I might gain the Jews; to them that (in their opinion) are (yet) under the (obligation of the) law, as under the law, (purifying myself in the temple, because they were zealous of the law, Acts xx. 21. 26,) that I might gain them that are under the law;

21 To them that are without law, (the unbelieving gentiles, I became) as without law (discoursing to them from those natural principles which they owned, Acts xvii., rather than from the law and the prophets), (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) (or obedient to the law of Christ, and taking care notwithstanding that I did nothing contrary to the moral law of God, and to the rules of Christianity,) that I might gain them that are without law.

22 [11] To the weak (converts among the gentiles) became I as weak (by condescending to abstain from what might hurt their consciences), that I might gain the weak: I am made all things to all men (by my compliance with them in all lawful matters), that I might by all means save some.

23 And this I do for the gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof (the promises and rewards of) with you.

made for righteousness' sake and the information of our manners."

[8] Ver. 12. Ἐξουσίας ὑμῶν, Power over you.] So ἐξουσίας πνευμάτων is "power over unclean spirits," Matt. x. 1; ἐξουσίας πάσης σαρκὸς, "power over all flesh," John xvii. 2.

[9] Ver. 17. Εἰ γὰρ ἑκὼν τοῦτο πράσσω, If I do this willingly.] This is the interpretation of Œcumenius, and it seems best to suit with the scope of the apostle; the other sense, mentioned by the ancients, and followed by most interpreters, is this, If I preached the gospel as a volunteer, having no command from Christ to do it, I might expect a peculiar reward; but having this command from Christ, I execute it only in obedience to the trust committed to me, and so I cannot glory in, or expect a reward for that above others."

[10] Ver. 18.] Note, first, from ver. 12. 15. 18, that our power, in things indifferent and uncommanded, is not to be used to the hinderance of the gospel of Christ, and the scandal of the weak.

Secondly, That there is καύχημα, or matter of glorying in things done by the assistance of the grace of God, and it is for the glory of a man to do them (ver. 15, 16, 2 Cor. xi. 10), ἡ καύχησις ἡμῶν, "Our rejoicing," or "our glorying, in this, even the testimony of our conscience" (2 Cor. i. 12). And again, "Let every man approve himself" to his own conscience, "and then shall he have τὸ καύχημα, rejoicing in himself, and not in another" (Gal. vi. 4). The glorying therefore, or the καύχημα, which the apostle elsewhere doth reject and exlude, is only that of the merit of our works, or their sufficiency to procure the justification of a sinner (Rom. iii. 27, iv. 2), or that which doth exclude the help or the assistance of the grace of God in Christ (1 Cor. i. 29. 31). Note,

Thirdly, That there may be some actions entirely good, which fall under no particular command; I say, particular command; for I believe this very action of Paul, in which he glories, was done according to that charity which seeketh not her own, but the things of Jesus Christ (Phil. ii. 5), and that it was in general his duty to take care not to hinder the gospel of Christ (ver. 12), and to cut off occasion from others to glory, to the impairing of the truth (2 Cor. xi. 12), to perform that which rendered him instrumental to gain the more (ver. 19); and therefore he saith (ver. 27), "All this I do for the gospel's sake, that I may be partaker of it with you." I think every good work, which respects our duty towards God, falls under the general command of loving God with all our heart, our mind, and our soul; and all the kindness we show to our brother, under the command of loving him as ourselves; and think no action eminently good can be done by any Christian, which is not comprehended under the general precept of doing "whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report; if there be any virtue, any praise," &c. (Phil. iv. 8). But yet this action, as to the substance of it, being under no precept, but being a refusal to use the power God had granted to him as much as others, and this refusal being done out of respect unto God's glory, and the good of souls, was that of which he justly gloried, and for which, though he did not merit any thing, yet he might reasonably expect from God, whose glory he promoted by it, an especial recompense, according to the rule of his own nation, "To him a reward is given, who doth any thing uncommanded."*

which run in a race run all, but one (of them only) receiveth the prize? So (therefore) run (your Christian race), that ye may obtain (the reward of it).

25 And (then you will be moved to abstain, as I do, from what may cause your weak brother to fall and perish; for) every man that striveth for the mastery (or is a wrestler in these games) is temperate in all things (i. e. observeth a strict abstinence). Now they (who thus abstain, that they may prevail in wrestling,) do it (only) to obtain a corruptible crown (of bays or olives); but we (Christians, by using this temperance, shall obtain) an incorruptible (crown).

26 I therefore so run (this race), not as uncertainly (or not regarding whether I am within the lines, or come first to the goal or not); so fight I, not as one that beateth the air (i. e. not vainly, as you seem to do: for what advantage have you by going to the idol's temples, or eating things offered to idols, to the destruction of your brother?)

27 But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection (by denying myself these liberties in things indifferent): [12] lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway; (as being not partaker of the blessings of the gospel, ver. 23.)

[12] Ver. 27. Ἀδόκιμος, Lest I myself should be a castaway.] i. e. One disapproved of by God at the last. Excellent here is the note of the ancient commentators, εἰ δὲ Παῦλος τοῦτο δέδοικεν, ὁ τοσούτους δίδαξας, τί ἂν εἴποιμεν ἡμεῖς; "If Paul, so great a man, one who had preached and laboured so much, dreaded this, what cause have we to fear lest this should befall us?"

Note also, That the agonistical phrases, mentioned in these four last verses, are fully and excellently explained by the reverend Dr. Hammond, who informs us,

First, That the Isthmian games* were celebrated among the Corinthians, and therefore the apostle speaks thus to them, "Know ye not?"

Secondly, That, of the five games there used, the apostle alludes only to two or three, running, ver. 24. 26, wrestling, ver. 25, cuffing, ver. 26, 27.

Thirdly, That he, who won the race by running, was to observe the laws of racing, keeping within the white line, which marked out the path or compass in which they were to run, and was also to outrun the rest, and come first to the goal, otherwise he ran "uncertainly" (ver. 24. 26), and was ἀδόκιμος, one to whom the prize would not be judged by the βραβευταὶ, or judges of the games.

Fourthly, That the athletæ, combatants, or wrestlers, observed a set diet,* both for the quantity and quality of their meat, and carefully abstained from all things that might render them less able for the combat; whence they are here said to be the "temperate in all things" (ver. 25).

Fifthly, That he who cuffed used to prepare himself for the exercise by a σκιομαχία,† or thrusting out his arm into the air. And this is styled, "so fighting as to beat the air" (ver. 26): but, when he came to the combat, then his fist strove to hit the face and eyes of his adversaries; and this is, ver. 27, ὑπωπιάζειν, to stike under the eye, or give his adversary a blue eye, and, applied to the body, is so to keep it under, by beating it black and blue, as these combatants did one another.

Sixthly, That the rewards of all these exercises were only a crown made of leaves of some plant, or boughs of some tree, the olive,‡ bays, or laurel, which therefore the apostle here calls "a corruptible crown" (ver. 25).

CHAPTER X.

1 MOREOVER, brethren (to make you the more diligent in running this Christian race, and to avoid these sins which will cause you to fail of the prize you run for, I shall lay before you the case of the Israelites, your forerunners, showing what privileges and what advantages they had, and by what means most of them so unhappily miscarried: for, to begin with their privileges), I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers (the church of Israel) [1] were under (the protection of) the cloud, and all passed through the sea;

2 And (so) were all baptized unto (the covenant made with God, and the doctrine taught by) Moses in the cloud and in the sea;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. Ὑπὸ τὴν νεφέλην ἦσαν, Were under the cloud.] To understand the allusion here, note, that to be "under the cloud," is to be under the protection or covert of the cloud. For "the cloud of glory," saith the tradition of the Jews,* "signified the care and providence of God, and his presence with them day and night;" and that accordingly it compassed their camp, "as a wall doth a city." And therefore of the feast of tabernacles, which in the Hebrew is chagigah succoth, "the feast of coverings," the Jews† say, it was especially appointed to admonish them of the divine protection exhibited to them by the cloud. And the Chaldee paraphrase saith, this feast was instituted, "that their posterity might know that I made the children of Israel to dwell under the shadow of the cloud:" and therefore Philo‡ styles αὐτὸ σκεπαστήριον, "a covering." And so the psalmist represents it, when he says, "He spread out the cloud for a covering to them, and a fire to enlighten them by night" (Ps. cv. 39). And the prophet, when he says, "The Lord will create upon every dwelling-place of mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of flaming fire by night; for upon all their glory shall be a covering" (Isa. iv. 5, 6). Πάντα τὰ περικύκλῳ αὐτῆς σκιάσει ἡ νεφέλη, "The cloud shall overshadow all her circuits," saith the Septuagint, "He was to them as a covering by day, and a light of stars in the night-season," saith the book of Wisdom (x. 17). By these things Mr. Clerc may see we have good warrant for saying, "The cloud was a covering to them, and that they were under the cloud, because it was over them;" not only because it went before them, which indeed is a greater impropriety than that which he charges upon others, that being indeed none at all: for what hinders the same cloud from being at one time contracted into the figure of a pillar, and at another expanded as a covering? For do we not read that "the cloud covered the mount?" (Exod. xxiv. 15,) that it "covered the seat of the congregation?" (Exod. xl. 34,) that it "covered the tabernacle?" (Numb.

3 And did all eat [2] the same spiritual meat; (that manna which was a type of Christ, the true bread which came down from heaven, John vi.;)

4 And did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock [3] was Christ: (as typifying him, and

ix. 15, 16). The learned Bishop of Ely notes, that there were three several uses of the cloud: (1.) To guide them in their journeys; and this it did as a pillar going before them. (2.) To preserve them from the heat of the sun in the wilderness; and then it was spread out as covering (Ps. cv. 39), and was "a cloud shadowing the camp" (Wisd. xix. 7). (3.) To defend them from their enemies that they might not assault them; and so it stood betwixt the whole host of Israel and the Egyptians, and was a cloud of darkness to the latter, so that they came not near the Israelites (Exod. xiv. 20): it therefore must be large enough to darken their whole camp.

Secondly, That "they all passed through the sea, so as to come to the opposite shore," saith Josephus;* they "went through it," saith St. Paul,† elsewhere; "through the middle of it," say the Septuagint.‡ I confess some rabbins and commentators say, they only fetched a compass like to a half-circle in the sea, and came out again on the same side; because before they entered into the sea, they were in the edge of the wilderness Etham (Numb. xxxiii. 6), and after they had passed the sea, they go three days' journey in the wilderness of Etham (Exod. xv. 22). But to this it is answered, that the wilderness on each side of that arm of the sea, was called the wilderness of Etham, and beyond the Red sea was the same with Shur (Exod. xv. 22), for the Hebrew word קצה which we render edge, is by the Septuagint forty times rendered μέρος, "a part." And here, say they, they came to Buthan, ὅ ἐστι μέρος τῆς ἐρήμου, "which in some part of the wilderness" (Numb. xxxiii. 6); intimating that beyond the sea there was another part of the same wilderness. And, Thirdly, as it follows,

Ver. 2. They were baptized unto Moses in the cloud.] i. e. Into the doctrine taught by Moses: for the cloud was not only for direction, but for a covering over them; according to the words of the psalmist, "He spread out the cloud for a covering" (Ps. cxxxv. 29).

And in the sea.] For they were covered with the sea, on both sides (Exod. xiv. 22): so that both the cloud and the sea had some resemblance to our being covered with water in baptism; their going into the sea resembled the ancient rite of going into the water, and their coming out of it their rising up out of the water. And this the Jews§ do so far own, that they say "they were baptized in the desert, and admitted into covenant with God before the law was given."

Note, Fourthly, That the cloud had a bright shining side, as well as a dark side: so that their baptism in the sea answered to that of water; and the baptism in the cloud, to baptism by fire, or by the Holy Ghost; which, say the Jews,‖ was represented by the Shechinah, or the cloud of glory.

[2] Ver. 3. Τὸ αὐτὸ βρῶμα, τὸ αὐτὸ πόμα, The same meat and the same drink.] For though some manuscripts omit τὸ αὐτὸ, "the same," in both these verses, yet is that word to be retained in both places: for so read Irenæus¶ and all the Greek expositors (see Examen Millii in locum). And whereas Esthius interprets the words thus, "They ate the same among themselves, not the same with us:" this exposition is contrary, not only to what Austin and all the Greek fathers teach, but also to the scope of the apostle, which is to show that they had the like spiritual advantages and privileges with us, which yet he doth not do, unless their spiritual meat and drink signified or typified to them Christ, as ours doth to us. That all of them were not believers in Christ by faith, but some of them were unbelievers, is no objection against this sense: for so it is with Christians now; the wicked not partaking of the benefit of Christ by faith, as the fathers speak, though they receive the sacrament of his body and blood with their mouths.

Note also, That Paul represents manna as spiritual food; and the rock as being spiritual, and affording them spiritual drink, agreeably to the descants of the Jews: for manna, saith Philo,* "is the food of the soul; it signifies the law of God, and the divine Logos, whence all permanent instruction and knowledge flow. And this is the heavenly food, of which Moses, in the person of God, speaketh, saying, Behold I rain down for you bread from heaven."—"The food of the soul," saith the same Philo, "is heavenly, not earthly, as the holy scripture testifieth, saying, I rain down for you bread from heaven." He calls the manna put into the ark,† τῆς οὐρανίου καὶ θείας τροφῆς τὸ μνημεῖον, "the memorial of the divine and heavenly food," and saith, that "manna‡ is the divine Logos, the celestial and incorruptible nourishment of a soul desirous of knowledge." The Jews also declare that manna§ was a type of the external happiness of man: that it had its rise from heaven, and thence descended on the earth, by opening the gates of heaven; that it is "the divine light incorporated, the splendour of the glory of the majesty of God, the bread on which angels feed, and by which the sons of the world to come are to subsist." And with these representations of it agree the words of the apostle, saying, the Jews by eating of it did eat τὸ αὐτὸ βρῶμα πνευματικόν, "the same spiritual food" with us. But here Mr. Clerc saith, "The word πνευματικός, spiritual, is here opposed to φυσικός, natural, not to σωματικός, corporeal; for manna was corporeal food, which could not be spiritual in any other respect than as it was prepared, not by sensible causes, but by spirits; viz. angels, whose bread therefore it is said to be, Ps. lxxviii. 2." I answer, Here is nothing true, or at least nothing certain: for (1.) the Chaldee paraphrast saith it is called the bread of angels in the psalmist, "because it came from heaven, the habitation of the angels;" as the psalmist himself interprets it, saying, "He opened the gates of heaven, he rained upon them manna for to eat, and gave them bread from heaven; bread of the mighty did man eat." (2.) Why did he say, "It could not be called spiritual food in any other sense than as it was prepared by spirits?" It is because it was corporeal food. And might it not be also the food of the soul? Are not bread and wine corporeal food? And yet may they not be also spiritual food? Yea, doth not the apostle's argument plainly require that the manna should be spiritual? For how else did they "eat the same spiritual food" with us? And, (3.) how absurd is it to say, it is called "spiritual food" because prepared by spirits? Can he give one instance of any corporeal things called spiritual upon that account? Was it not spiritual meat, as the water issuing from the rock was spiritual drink, and was that so because prepared by spirits?

[3] Ver. 4. And that rock was Christ.] i. e. It typified Christ: for as the rock, being smitten, gave forth waters, so our Lord, being smitten, water came forth out of his side; and the Holy Ghost, signified by this effusion of waters from the rock, was poured forth as a river. "By the solid rock," saith Philo,‖ "Moses understands the wisdom of God, which is the nurse and the instructor of all that desire the incorruptible life. He by a synonymous word calls the rock manna; that is, the most ancient of beings, the divine Logos." And again, "the rock, cleft in the top, is the wisdom of which he makes the souls that love him to drink; and being thus made to drink, they are also filled with the universal manna, for manna is called τὶ, which is the progeny of all things. Now the most general cause of all things is God, and the second the Word of God." By these things Mr. Clerc may be convinced, that the Jews might understand these types by tradition; and seeing them thus accomplished, might be induced to believe. And as for Christians, the apostle here shows the influence they ought to have on them, viz. to preserve them from the like offences, lest they become subject to the like judgments to which the Jews were obnoxious (ver. 5, 6). But Mr. Clerc denies that the words bear this sense, The rock signifies Christ, or represented him; and saith, the import of these words, "That Rock was Christ," is only this, "That which may be said of that rock in a carnal sense, may in a spiritual be affirmed of Christ:" which is to expound the apostle as speaking thus, They all drank the same spiritual drink, for they drank of the Rock that followed them: now, what may be said of that Rock in a carnal sense, may be said of Christ in a spiritual; i. e. "They all drank the same spiritual drink," because what they drank was carnal. Moreover, we find many phrases of the like nature, both in the Old and New Testament, as when it is said, "The three branches are three days;" "The seven kine, and seven ears of corn, are seven years;" "The four great beasts are four kingdoms;" "Thou art the golden head;" "The seed is the word;" "The field is the world, the reapers are the angels, the harvest is the end of the world;" "The hair is Jerusalem;" "This bread is my body," "This cup is my blood" (Gen. xl. 12, xliii. 26, Ezra v. 5, Dan. ii. 38, vii. 17, Matt. xiii. 38, 39, xxvi. 26, 27, Luke viii. 11). Now in all these instances doth not is import typifies, signifies, represents? Why therefore should it not do so in the like proposition, "This rock is Christ?" Or what one instance can Mr. Clerc produce, that any thing was ever said to be another thing, because "what might be said of it in a carnal sense might in a spiritual sense be said of the other?" And is it not sufficient prejudice against this παρερμηνεία, or uncouth interpretation, that it hath no parallel example? Whereas our exposition is confirmed from numerous examples of like nature.

[4] Ver. 6. Τύποι ἡμῶν, Our examples.] "The examples he here puts," saith Theodoret, "exactly answer to the sins of the Corinthians;" for as the Jews lusted to eat flesh, so the Corinthians lusted to eat things offered to idols, when they had other meat provided plentifully by God for them: "for the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof" (ver. 28).

[5] Ver. 7. Ἐκάθισεν ὁ λαὸς φαγεῖν, &c. The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play.] When the heathens had offered upon the altar, and consumed that part which belonged to the god they worshipped, they banqueted in the idol temple upon the remains, and so did epulis accumbere divûm, as Virgil* speaks, at long tables prepared for that purpose, whence this is by the apostle called partaking of the tables of devils; and used very appositely, say the fathers, to convince the Corinthians, that, by eating things offered to the idols in the idol temple, they must be guilty of heathenish idolatry.

[6] Rose up to play.] Here almost all the critics observe, that παίζειν, to play, bears an impure sense, importing their fornication with one another; as when we say, such a one hath played the whore; but this criticism seems here to be without foundation: for (1.) the scripture often mentions their idolatry, but never charges them with whoredom, then committed when they made the golden calf; all that God himself charges upon them is, that they had made them a molten calf, and had worshipped and sacrificed to it, and said, "These be thy gods," Exod. xxii. 8. 35, Neh. ix. 18, Ps. cvi. 19, 20, Acts vii. 41. (2.) The apostle speaks of whoredom in the verse following as a distinct sin, and therefore cannot reasonably be supposed to charge them with it here. (3.) The exposition of the ancients, that they rose up to dance before the calf, is confirmed by these words, "And when Moses saw the calf, and the dancing, he was wroth" (Exod. xxii. 19). And because this was done after the manner of the heathens,† and was one of the rites by which they honoured their gods, the apostle useth it as a confirmation of their idolatry. And this is all the fathers seem to mean by saying, that to play, is used ἀντὶ τοῦ εἰδωλολατρεύειν, "for committing idolatry;" and the Jerusalem Targum, when it saith, they did ludere cultû peregrino, "play after the heathen manner."

[7] Ver. 8. Μηδὲ πορνεύωμεν, Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed.] How prone the Christians of the church of Corinth were to this sin, which made the heathen Corinth infamous to a proverb, we learn from these words of the apostle, "I fear when I come, I shall bewail many who have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness which they committed," 2 Cor. xii. 21 (see 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17, v. 11, vi. 9. 13. 15, 16).

[8] Εἰκοσιτρεῖς χιλιάδες, Three-and-twenty thousand.] The number of the slain was four-and-twenty thousand (Numb. xxv. 9), and so Œcumenius saith some ancient copies read here; but of this number one thousand was slain by the judges, and that probably the day before the plagues; three-and-twenty thousand by the immediate hand of God. Now the design of the apostle here, is only to mention them who fell in one day by the hand of God (see Bochart. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 34).

[9] Ver. 9. Τὸν Χριστὸν, Christ.] This reading ought not to be questioned, for we find it not only in Hilary the deacon, Chrysostom, Œcumenius, Theophylact, but in Irenæus.‡ Hence Primasius of old proved the divinity of Christ, as being that God whom they tempted (Ps. cvi. 14), and others his pre-existence before the birth of the blessed Virgin, against the Socinians. That the apostle here cannot speak, as Crellius contends, of Moses, is plain:

of them also tempted (him), and were destroyed of serpents (Numb. xxi. 5, 6).

10 Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured (Numb. xiv. 2), and were destroyed [10] of the destroyer (ver. 37).

11 Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples (to posterity): and they are written for our admonition, [11] upon whom the ends of the world (the last of ages) are come (i. e. the Christian age).

12 Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth (and is in high favour with God, as they once were, and still think they are,) take heed lest he fall.

13 (And whereas the great inducement to symbolize with Jew or gentile in their rites is this, that you may avoid persecution, you have no cause to doubt of Christ's protection under them, for he hath so preserved you hitherto, that)There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man (ἀνθρώπινος, supportable by the strength and resolution of a man): but (moreover) God is faithful, [12] who will not suffer you to be tempted (at any time) above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way (so fair) to escape (it), that ye may be able to bear it.

15 I speak as to wise men (in what I am now offering, to show the idolatry of this practice); judge ye (the reasonableness of) what I say.

16 [13] The cup of blessing which we bless (or receive with thanksgiving to God for it), is it not the [14] communion of the blood of Christ (or that rite by which we Christians do profess to hold communion with, and own him as, our Lord and Saviour, who shed his blood for us)? The bread which we break, is it not (also) the communion of the body of Christ (i. e. do we not

First, Because, though the name of Jesus be once given to Joshua (Heb. iv. 8) in the New Testament, as being the true import of his name, and the translation of it by the Septuagint, yet is the name of Christ never given to Moses, nor doth it bear any affinity with his name. Nor,

Secondly, Is Moses ever called Christ in the Old Testament. For though Crellius contends that name is given him in these words of Habakkuk (iii. 13), "Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people with thy Christ;" yet it is evident that this is spoken of God's going forth with Joshua, by "the captain of the Lord's host" (who is described, Josh. v. 14, 15, and so honoured by Joshua, as to leave no place of doubting that he was a divine person); or, ver. 11, the prophet saith, "The sun and moon stood still," as they did only in the time of Joshua (x. 12), and ver. 12, "Thou didst march through the land in indignation, thou didst thresh the heathens in anger," as he did by Joshua; and then follow the words cited. (2.) This appears farther from the words tempt and tempted, which, both in the Old and New Testament, signify distrusting the power or the will of God to do what he had given those who tempted him sufficient evidence he was able and willing to perform (see this proved, note on Matt. iv. 7). Now thus they did not tempt Moses (Numb. xi. 6), but God, by distrusting his power to give them bread and water in the wilderness (ver. 5).

Their second answer therefore is, That there being no accusative case expressed after the words καθὼς καί τινες αὐτῶν ἐπείρασαν, "As some of them tempted," they may as well add God, as we add him. But,

1. This exposition must ascribe that divine power to Christ, which belonged unto him they tempted in the wilderness, by virtue of the preceding argument, and also render it as wicked and as dreadful to tempt Christ now, as it was to tempt God then; and so by consequence it must ascribe to him that divine nature, from which a divine power is inseparable.

2. They have not yet produced one instance where the person spoken of in reference to the same action, in the same instance, is thus changed. Crellius, indeed, who never wants a shift, such as it is, brings his instance from ver. 6, viz. "These things were spoken, that we might not be lusters after evil things, as they also lusted:" but as here is the fallacy of a transition, εἰς ἄλλο γένος, from things to persons; so is there nothing said, ver. 6, to signify that the evil things forbid to the Corinthians to be the subject of their lusts, were to be quails or flesh, as in the Jews they were, but only that they were, for the kind, evil, as theirs also were.

[10] Ver. 10. Ὑπὸ τοῦ ὀλοθρευτοῦ, Of the destroyer.] i. e. By a plague sent by the hand of Sammael, the angel of death, called ὀλοθρεύων, "the destroyer," Wisd. xviii. 25, Heb. xi. 28, and "him that had the power of death," Heb. ii. 14. Now the Corinthians murmured, saith Theodoret, because some of them had received only inferior gifts; say others, by reason of the persecutions they suffered for the Christian faith.

[11] Ver. 11. Τὰ τέλη τῶν αἰώνων, The end of the ages.] This phrase either signifies the end of the Jewish age, as if the apostle did intend to say, These things, which happened in the beginning of the Jewish age, were recorded for caution and example to us, who are come to the conclusion of it; or the last of the ages of the world, i. e. the Christian age; for the Jews, according to the tradition of Elias, divide the duration of the world into three ages: the age before the law, the age of the law, and the age after the law, or that of the Messiah (Talmud. in Sanhedr. cap. Chelek).

[12] Ver. 13. Ὃς οὐκ ἐάσει ὑμᾶς, Who will not suffer you.] i. e. Any of you, who do what in you lies to arm yourselves against them, to be tempted above what you are able; this therefore ought not to be restrained to the elect: for the preceding words, "No temptation hath happened to you," are spoken to all the members of the church at Corinth; and God hath doubtless engaged to all that enter into covenant with him, to enable them to perform the condition of that covenant, since a covenant upon an impossible condition, he knows, cannot be performed; and all are bound to pray in faith, that God would not "suffer them to be tempted above what they are able," by his strength, to bear.

[13] Ver. 16. Τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, The cup of blessing.] The paschal cup being styled by the Jews, "the cup of blessing," because they sanctified it, i. e. they gave thanks for it in these words, "Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, the King of the world, who hast created the fruit of the vine;" and being also styled "the cup of blessing of the table," it cannot reasonably be doubted that the eucharistical cup was so called for the same reason, and that it was sanctified or consecrated by thanksgiving to God for it.

[14] Κοινωνία, The communion.] This word "communion" hath two significations: (1.) when the subject spoken of may be distributed into parts, so that each man may have a share of it, it denotes a distribution and a communication of those parts to the community, or body mentioned. Thus in the case of alms, seeing there is a distribution of our substance to those that want, this is in scripture styled κοινωνία, and is sometimes rendered "contribution" (Rom. xv. 26), sometimes "distribution" (i. 9. 13, Heb. xiii. 16); and since there were διαιρέσεις "divisions and diversities" of gifts, ministrations, and operations vouchsafed to the church; all which the Holy Ghost wrought, "dividing to every member of it severally as he would" (2 Cor. xii. 11); the giving these gifts and several operations to them, is called "the communion of the Spirit," 2 Cor. xiii. 13, Phil. ii. 1. Thus, because one consecrated loaf was anciently distributed among all the communicants, and they all drank their share of the same cup of blessing, therefore the bread, thus broken and shared out, may be said to be the communion or communication of the body of Christ, as being the communication of that bread which represented his broken body; and the cup they severally drank of may be styled the communication of the blood of Christ, as being the communication of that wine which represented his blood shed: and to this import lead the following words, "Because the bread (or loaf) is one (of which we all partake) we being many are one body, for we are all partakers of one loaf," according to the old proverbial expression, σύσσιτοι καὶ σύσσωμοι.

But where the subject mentioned is not capable of such by eating at his table, declare our fellowship with, and own him as our Lord, whose body was thus broken for us)?

17 [15] For we being many are one bread, and one body (or, because the bread is one, one loaf being broken for us all, we who partake of it, being many, are one body, owning ourselves thereby all members of that body of which Christ Jesus is the head): for we are all partakers of that one bread (and thus you see that, by partaking of this Christian sacrifice, we own ourselves to have communion with the Lord Jesus, and with the whole society of Christians).

18 Behold Israel after the flesh, (and see if it be not so there also: for) are not they which eat of the sacrifices (the peace-offerings, for of these only did the people eat,) [16] partakers of the altar? (and so hold communion with him whose altar it is? ix. 13.)

19 What say I then (i. e. what need I then to say)? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing (which can in its own nature pollute)?

20 But (this) I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice [17] to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils (or do service to them in the idol temples; for)

21 Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord (and thereby declare your fellowship with him, and that you own him as your Lord, in opposition to all others), and (yet drink) the cup of devils (and so make the like acknowledgment concerning them): ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, [18] and of the table of devils.

22 Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy (by bringing devils into competition with him)? are we stronger division, or distribution, but every one is to have the whole, or the same with another, it imports a fellowship and communion in the same thing; in which sense we are said to be called by God, εἰς κοινωνίαν "to the fellowship of his Son," 1 Cor. i. 9, "to have κοινωνίαν a fellowship in his sufferings; to have κοινωνίαν communion with God, and the Son," 1 John i. 5, and in the apostles' symbol, to believe "the communion of saints:" and in this import of the word the sense runs thus, Do we not, by partaking of this bread and wine, consecrated in memorial of Christ giving his body broken and his blood shed for us, hold communion, or declare our fellowship, with Christ? Both these senses seem agreable to the scope of the apostle, and the first infers the second.

[15] Ver. 17. Ὅτι εἷς ἄρτος, ἓν σῶμα οἱ πολλοί ἐσμεν, Because the bread is one, we being many are one body.] These words, "The bread which we break," the loaf or bread "is one," and "We all partake of one loaf," and therefore are one body, show how grossly the church of Rome hath varied from Christ's institution, in distributing to the communicants severally an unbroken wafer, so that they neither are partakers of one bread, or loaf, or of bread broken, as the custom both of Jews and Christians was to do. It also deserves to be noted from the testimonies of Jamblichus* and Lacrtius,† that anciently this was a token of friendship; and that Pythagoras forbade his scholars ἄρτον καταγνύειν "to break their bread," because that was not to be broken which made friendship.

[16] Ver. 18. Κοινωνοὶ τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου, Partakers of the altar.] i. e. Do they not by partaking of the gift consecrated by the altar, and of which one part is consumed upon it, partake with the altar, and own that they communicate with and worship that God at whose altar or table the meat was offered in honour of him? (Mal. i. 7.) For as swearing by the altar, is also swearing by him whose altar it is (Matt. xxiii. 20), so, having communion with the altar, is having communion with him whose altar it is. To illustrate this let it be noted, (1.) that, in these שלמים or peace-offerings, there was a threefold participation; 1. God had his part, offered him upon the altar, viz. the blood and the entrails; part was given to the priest, viz. the breast and shoulder; and part to the offerer, viz. the skin and the rest of the flesh; and this in token, say the Jews, of friendship and communion of the party offering them, with God and the priest: and he, by eating the remainder, and feasting on it in the temple, or the holy city, became partaker with the altar, or with God, who had received his share upon the altar. Note, (2.) that these peace-offerings were offered either by way of thanksgiving for mercies obtained, or by way of vow or of free devotion; for this division of peace-offerings, we find Lev. vii. Moreover, these being offered to the God of Israel, signified the owning him as that God from whom they received and expected all their mercies.

[17] Ver. 20. Δαιμονίοις, To devils.] Here Mr. Clerc saith, "The word δαιμόνιοι doth not necessarily signify devils or evil spirits; for the heathen did not always sacrifice to evil spirits, if we consider what were their true thoughts." But the wisdom of God did not think fit to consider the speculations of some of their philosophers; but what was indeed their practice, and what the objects and directors of their worship were, and who was gratified by it: they pretended to own a supreme Deity; but the spirits which spake in the oracles they consulted, which moved their idols, and resided in them, and set up and promoted their whole idolatrous worship, were doubtless evil spirits; and so the primitive Christians engage to force them to confess themselves to be,* even before them who paid homage to them. The pulling down of this idolatrous worship is, in our Saviour's language, "the casting out of the prince of this world," John xii. 31, and xvi. 11; the converting the gentiles from this idolatry to the worship of the true God, is, the "turning them from the power of Satan unto God," Acts xxvi. 18; "the delivering them from the power of darkness," Col. i. 13, who before walked according to the "prince of the power of darkness," Eph. ii. 2, and were "led captive by Satan at his will," 2 Tim. ii. 26. The psalmist, according to the Septuagint, saith, ὅτι πάντες οἱ θεοὶ ἐθνῶν δαιμόνια, "that all the gods of the heathens are devils" (Ps. xcvi. 5): and of the Jews who sacrificed to them it is said, "they sacrificed to devils, and not to God," לשדים, to evil, wasting, and destroying spirits. The Jews said the same of the gentiles, that they were Σύσαντες δαιμονίοις, "sacrificing to devils," and not to God, Baruch iv. 7, and so they are also styled, 2 Chron. xi. 15, Rev. ix. 20: and so all Christians ever did expound this place, and with good reason, it being absurd to think St. Paul is here dissuading Christians from having fellowship with good angels.

[18] Ver. 21. Καὶ τραπέζης δαιμονίων, And of the table of devils.] This being the design of the apostle, to show that the Corinthians could not partake of the idol sacrifices in the idol temples without being κοινωνοὶ τῶν δαιμονίων, "men who held communion with devils;" and the proof of this being taken from the practice of Christians in partaking of the eucharist, and of the Jews in partaking of sacrifices offered at the altar; it is evident that the sixteenth verse must be interpreted suitably to this design, and so as to be a fit medium to prove this conclusion. It is therefore evident,

First, That κοινωνία, "communion," cannot here signify the real and substantial communication of the body and blood of Christ, since that sense renders the apostle's argument infirm; for how doth it hence follow, that because Christians eat substantially the body, and drink the blood, of Christ, therefore they who eat of the idol sacrifices are guilty of idolatry, and hold communion with devils. Moreover, the eating of things offered to idols, could not in this sense make them that did it "communicators of the devils," for surely they did not eat of the substance of the devils: this therefore cannot be the import of the words. Nor, than he? (so that we need fear not the punishments he may inflict on them who give his honour to another.

23 And we reas you plead thus for yourselves,) All things are lawful for me, (i. e. all meats may lawfully be eaten; be it so;) but (yet) all (lawful) things are not expedient (to be done): all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not, (as charity doth, viii. 1.

24 For the rule of charity is this:) Let no man seek his own (only), but every man another's wealth, (preferring the public to his private good, and the good of souls to that of his own body.

25 Concerning then the eating of things offered to idols in the general, and without relation to the idol temple, in which to eat them is idolatry, I thus determine:) Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat (ye), asking no question for conscience sake (as if you thought it matter of conscience, whether you might eat it, if offered to idols, or not):

26 For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, (and therefore you may eat of any creature the earth provideth for your food, without scruple of conscience, when others are not scandalized at it.

27 And again I say,) If any of them that believe not bid (or invite) you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go; [19] whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake.

28 But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols (thinking that, by thus partaking in such meat, you must own the idol, or concur in the worship of it), eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof (who therefore can replenish thee out of other meats provided for thy food):

29 Conscience, I say, (meaning) not thine own, but (that) of the other (who showed thee this was offered to idols): for why is my liberty (so used by me, as that I be) judged of (and condemned by) another man's conscience?

30 For if I by grace be a partaker (of God's good creatures), [20] why (do I use them so as that) am I evil spoken of (by others) for that for which I give thanks (because of benefits received by it)?

31 Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, [21] do all to the glory of God.

Secondly, Can the sense of them be to this effect: The cup and bread communicate to us the spiritual effects of Christ's broken body, or his blood shed for us; though this be in itself a certain truth. For,

1. These spiritual effects cannot be shared among believers, so that every one shall have a part of them only; but the same benefits are wholly communicated to every due receiver (see note on ver. 16).

2. The apostle here attempts to prove, not that the Corinthians, by eating things offered to idols in the idol temple, received any spiritual influence from devils, but only that, by that action, they did partake of what was offered to them, and was a solemn part of their religious worship, as the eating these sacrifices was still reputed; so that by it they must own themselves the worshippers of idols, and then, by parity of reason, he must, by the example of the eucharist, intend to prove, not that the Christian did partake of the spiritual effects of our Lord's passion, but that he did partake of what was consecrated in honour of him, and received as a solemn act of religious worship and communion with him. And this appears yet farther from the words which the apostle useth, as the close of this argument, and as the thing which answers to the two preceding instances: for they do not run thus, By the things which the gentiles offer they receive spiritual influences from evil spirits; but thus, "This I say," to complete this argument, and to render the sacrifice offered to idols parallel to those of Christians and of Jews; that as these are offered to the honour of Christ and of the God of Israel, so "the things which the gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and I would not that ye should be partakers with devils;" viz. by feasting of the sacrifices thus offered to them, and of which the devils had a part; and that it was by the act of eating and drinking of these idol sacrifices, that they became partakers of the cup and table of devils, and thereby guilty of idolatry, as the fathers declare,* so is it evident from these words, "Ye cannot drink of the cup of the Lord, and of the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and the table of devils;" it was therefore by these actions that they held communion with them, and committed idolatry: the eating of the feast made of things offered to idols in the idol temple being as much a federal rite, as was the eating of peace-offerings of the Jews, eaten in the temple, or the holy city, or the sacramental bread eaten in the church by Christians, whence the oblations made there were styled οπονδαὶ ἐν τιμῇ δαιμόνων, "oblations in honour of our demons."

[19] Ver. 27. Πᾶν τὸ παρατιθέμενον ὑμῖν ἐσθίετε, Whatsoever is set before you, eat.] The apostle had before discoursed of eating things offered to idols in the idol temple, and shown, (1.) the scandal it might give to the weak gentile Christian; and (2.) that it was indeed an idolatrous action: here he begins his discourse of eating at all things offered to idols, with respect chiefly to the weak Jewish convert. And (1.) whereas by their canons† an idol, and all things appertaining to it, and whatever was offered to it, were wholly forbidden, the rabbins pronouncing the eating or possessing any thing of it forbidden, in these words, "Thou shalt not bring an abomination into thine house" (Deut. vii. 26): the apostle relieves the conscience of the Christian in this case, letting him know that he might eat these things, when sold in shambles, without scruple of conscience, ver. 25. (2.) Whereas their canons teach, that‡ if a heathen make a banquet for his son or daughter, a Jew is forbidden to eat of his meat, because he is forbidden, if called, to eat of his sacrifice (Exod. xxxiv. 15); the apostle exempts the conscience of the Christian from this obligation also, ver. 27.

[20] Ver. 30. Τί βλασφημοῦμαι; Why am I evil spoken of?] This is the exposition of all the Greek scholiasts, and it is confirmed by the parallel place, "Let not your good be evil spoken of," Rom. xiv. 16; i. e. let not your faith, or the liberty you take by reason of it, be used so as to minister occasion to others to speak evil of that faith, as the Jews did of Christianity upon occasion of this liberty; for they held the eating of things offered to idols to be idolatry,‡ and pronounced all idolaters to be apostates from the law and the prophets: and this was one of their great objections against Christians, that "they did eat things offered to idols, and thought not themselves defiled by doing so;" though in truth this was done chiefly by the heretics of those times, the Nicolaitans,§ the Gnostics,¶ and the followers of Basilides; but "the true Christians," saith Justin Martyr,¶ "will rather suffer death than be guilty of idolatry, or eating things offered to idols."

of God.] In things capable of honouring God positively, or proper to give glory to him, have always a general intention of glorifying God in the doing of them, that in the virtue of that intention you may proceed to particular actions.

In things not capable of honouring God positively, be careful that you act so that the name of God be not blasphemed, or his doctrine evil thought or evil spoken of, by reason of your actions: yea, do and abstain from all things so as to satisfy your own conscience, and discover to others, that the honour of God and the advancement of the interests of his kingdom are much dearer to you than any gratifications of your carnal appetites, or any temporal concern.

[22] Ver. 32. No offence.] As, by thus eating things offered to idols in the idol temple, or elsewhere, being thus admonished of it (ver. 28), you are like to do: for the Jews will be apt hence to conclude that Christianity renders you enemies to the law and the prophets; the gentiles, that your professed abhorrence of idols is not real, and that the practice, in which you comply with them, is not sinful; and the weak Christian will be tempted, by your example, to eat these things "with conscience of the idol" (viii. 7), or to fly off from the Christian faith.

CHAPTER XI.

1 Be ye (therefore) followers of me (in this condescension for the good of others), even as I also am of Christ (in it, Rom. xv. 2, 3, Gal. vi. 2, Phil. ii. 5, 6, 2 Cor. viii. 9).

2 Now I praise you, brethren, that ye remember me in all things (I have taught you), [1] and keep the ordinances (Gr. traditions), as I delivered them to you.

3 But (I must farther advertise you of some things which I had no occasion, when present, to take notice of, and therefore) I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and [2] the head of Christ is God: (and so, as Christ, as mediator, acts in subordination to the Father, so must the woman act in subordination to the man.)

4 Every man (therefore) praying or prophesying [3] (in the church), having his head covered, dishonoureth [4] his head (Christ, as acting unsuitably to that relation which he bears to God and Christ; for man ought not to cover his head, because he is the image and glory of God, ver. 17).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XI.

[1] Ver. 2. Ὅτι καθὼς παρέδωκα ὑμῖν, τὰς παραδόσεις κατέχετε, That you keep the traditions, as I delivered them to you.] This commendation must be restrained to the generality, or sounder part of the church of Corinth, or must be understood as such general expressions used to be, ὡς ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺ, as for the most part, or excepting those few things in which afterward I find reason to complain of your neglect, xv. 3, and here, ver. 23.

Vain is the note of Esthius on this text, that "it makes plainly for unwritten traditions:" for (1.) the word tradition is common to things written and unwritten, to things delivered by word and by epistle (2 Thess. ii. 15); the whole Christian faith is a tradition (Jude 3); the doctrine of Christ's death, burial, and resurrection, is a tradition; παρέδωκα γὰρ, "For I delivered to you" these doctrines, saith Paul (1 Cor. xv. 13); and will the Romanists say that these things are not written in the New Testament? (2.) To prove traditions extra-scriptural, it is not sufficient to cite a passage out of scripture, speaking of traditions not then written by one apostle; but it must be proved that these traditions were neither then, when mentioned, in writing, nor afterward committed to writing by himself, or any other inspired person. (3.) The traditions mentioned here, and 2 Thess. ii. 15, were traditions immediately delivered to those churches from the mouth of an apostle; and when the Romanists can make this good from like authentic testimony of any of their fardle of traditions, we shall be ready to receive them.

[2] Ver. 3. Κεφαλὴ δὲ Χριστοῦ ὁ Θεὸς, And the head of Christ is God.] "We are hence taught," saith Schlictingius, "that the head of Christ is God; whereas the most high God can have no head above him, so that Christ, who hath this head above him, cannot be most high."

Ans. To this some of the fathers answer, That God is here said to be the head of Christ, as being the Father* of the Son, and so the cause of him; but yet, as the woman is of the same nature with the man who is her head, so is Christ of the same nature with God the Father: they also add, that the word head is here used as a note of principality,* or causality in the Father, but not of subjection in the Son, which wholly enervates the argument of Crellius from this place. And, though the schools seem not to allow of this language, yet it was used by Irenæus in these words, "The Father is above all things, and he is the head of Christ; the Word is through all things, and he is the head of the church."†

Others answer, That the Father is here styled the head of Christ, considered as Mediator, in which relation he received his kingdom and dominion from him (John xvii. 2, 1 Cor. xv. 27, Heb. ii. 8), and exercises it wholly to his glory (Phil. ii. 9—11): in which sense the Father may be styled his head, because he doth all things according to his Father's will, to his glory, and by authority derived from him: and this interpretation is confirmed by these words, "The head of every man is Christ;" he being man's head by virtue of the power and dominion given him over all flesh (xv. 27, John xvii. 2, Eph. i. 19. 22), and that power being given to the man Christ Jesus.

[3] Ver. 4. In the church.] For that the apostle speaks not of prophesying at home, as Mr. Clerc imagines, but in the church, is evident from the apostle's argument, ver. 16, against this practice, in these words, "We have no such custom, neither the churches of God." His argument to the contrary is answered in the note on ver. 6.

[4] Τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐτοῦ, His head.] That is, Christ;‡ for (1.) he is the head of the man, ver. 3. (2.) This seemeth most agreeable to the reason assigned, why he should be uncovered when he doth service in the church, viz. because he is the image and the glory of God. And, (3.) did he dishonour his own head by covering it, he ought never to be covered; whereas if this only respects his head, Christ, whom he represents in praying and prophesying in the church, it is sufficient that he is uncovered, when he thus acteth as his minister. Lastly, The head the woman dishonoureth is the man, styled her head; and so the head the man dishonoureth is Christ, styled his head, ver. 3.

5 But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth [6] with her head uncovered dishonoureth (the man) her head (whose glory she is, as being put in subjection to him): for that is even all one as if she were shaven (and so had removed the token of subjection to the man which nature gave her).

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered (see note on ver. 5).

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head (as a sign of subjection), forasmuch as he is [6] the image and glory of God (as having the government of the world committed by God to him): but the woman (ought to cover her head, forasmuch as she) is the glory of the man (being taken from, made for, and put into subjection to him.)

8 For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man.

9 Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.

10 (Moreover,) For this cause ought the woman to have [7] power (a veil) on her head because of the (evil) angels (she being tempted by the prince of them to do that which is perpetual cause of shame to her, and which increased her subjection to the man, Gen. iii. 26, ought therefore to use this token of shamefacedness and subjection).

11 Nevertheless neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the (wisdom of the) Lord (ordaining that one should come out of the other).

12 For as the woman is (taken out) of the man, even so is the man also (propagated) by the woman; but all (these) things (are) of God (who made woman out of the man, and by his benediction increaseth men by the woman).

13 Judge in yourselves: is it comely that a woman pray (publicly) unto God uncovered (when God himself hath given her a covering by nature, to intimate to her that she should be veiled)?

[5] Ver. 5. Κατὰ κεφαλῆς ἔχων, With his head covered, ἀκατακαλύπτῳ τῇ κεφαλῇ, with her head uncovered.] For explication of these words, let it be noted from Theodoret,* that "the men of Corinth, according to the custom of the Greeks, both wore long hair, and prayed to God with their heads covered in the public assemblies." So also, saith Plutarch,† did the Romans; so, saith Lightfoot,‡ did the Jews; so did, saith Servius,§ "all that sacrificed to any god excepting Saturn." But the heathen woman paid her devotion to the gods, resoluta comas, seu capillos, "with her hair loose and hanging down;" or, in the language of the poets, crine jacente, aut demisso. Note,

Secondly, That the Jews judged it τὸ αἰσχρὸν, a shameful and indecent thing for a woman to be shaved, and permitted this only in the case of whoredom,‖ as a token of their shame. And among the heathens it was indicium ultimi luctûs, "a token of the highest grief."—"It is customary," saith Plutarch,¶ "for men to be shorn, and for women to wear long hair; and therefore, in times of mourning, the men let their hair grow, and the women are shaved, this being contrary to custom among the Greeks and Romans." It was also customary for the Jewish women to go veiled. Note, Thirdly, That the apostle doth not here approve of the woman's praying or prophesying in the church, as is evident from 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12, though he here says nothing to the contrary, as intending to rectify that disorder, when he spoke of other disorders in the case of prophesying, xiv. 34.

[6] Ver. 7. Εἰκὼν καὶ δόξα Θεοῦ, The image and glory of God.] True here is the note of Theodoret, that man is here styled the image and glory of God, neither as to his body, nor as to his soul; for, in respect of the soul, the woman is equally the glory of God, as to spirituality and immortality, and so is equally said to be made after his image, Gen. ii. 27, but κατὰ μόνον τὸ ἀρχικὸν, "only as to rule and government," which is the proper glory of a man, according to the psalmist's words, "Thou hast crowned him δόξῃ καὶ τιμῇ with glory and honour, and hast set him over the work of thy hands, and hast put all things in subjection under his feet" (Ps. viii. 5, 6).

[7] Ver. 10. Ἐξουσίαν ἔχειν ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς, διὰ τοὺς ἀγγέλους, A veil upon her head, because of the angels.] Here let it be noted, (1.) that all the ancient interpreters agree in this, that ἐξουσία, which we render power, doth signify a veil or covering, which, being put over her head, compels her to hang down her eyelids; and it is here, say they, called power, as being τῆς τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ἐξουσίας καὶ κυριότητος ἐνδεικτικὸν, "the token of the power and dominion of the man over her." Note, Secondly, That the reading διὰ τῆς ἀγγελίας, "by reason of her revelations," as Mr. Clerc doth, instead of διὰ τοὺς ἀγγέλους, without consent of any copy or version, is not to be endured. Moreover, διὰ τῆς ἀγγελίας signifies barely by message, not "by reason of her revelations," that being properly in Greek διὰ τῆς ἀγγελίας τῆς παρ' αὐτῆς.

Thirdly, That evil angels are absolutely styled angels, in these words of this epistle, "Know ye not that ye shall judge angels?" 1 Cor. vi. 3, and elsewhere, "The angels that sinned," 2 Pet. ii. 4, or "that kept not their first station," Jude 6. Note,

Fourthly, That among the nine maledictions of the woman, which the Jews reckon up, this is one, That she is to have caput velatum instar lugentis,* "her head covered like one that mourneth," and this, they say, she is to wear, not so much as a token of subjection, as of shame; whence Philo calls the τὸ ἐπίκρανον,† "cover of the woman's head," τὸ τῆς αἰδοῦς σύμβολον, "the symbol of her shame;" and this shame, say they, is due to her, "because she brought the first sin into the world."‡—"It is with her," say they, "as when one transgresseth and is ashamed, and therefore she comes forth with her head covered."—"She ought," saith Tertullian,§ "by her habit to resemble Eve, a mourner and a penitent, ob ignominiam primi delicti, for the shame of the first sin:" hence he often interprets this text of evil angels.‖

Moreover, in the judgment both of Jews and Christians, the serpent, which deceived Eve, acted by the suggestion of the devil,¶ or of Sammael, whom the Jews style "the prince of devils." That therefore these words may be interpreted as in the paraphrase, is evident, not only from those observations, but especially from a place parallel to this, "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. For I suffer not a woman to usurp authority: for Adam was first formed, then Eve" (as here, ver. 8, 9); "and Adam was not deceived,

14 [8] Doth not even nature itself (which hath made man the image and glory of God, created him before the woman, and given him dominion over her,) teach you, that, if a man have long hair (the covering and token of subjection in the other sex), it is a shame unto him! (see note on ver. 5.)

15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her (she being fitted by it to represent the condition of her sex): for her hair is given her for a covering (i. e. in token of subjection to her husband).

16 But if (after what hath been thus said) any man seem (still) to be contentious, (I shall add only this, that) we have no such custom, [9] neither the churches of God (it being only customary in the assemblies of heathens for women to pay their devotions to the gods thus. See note on ver. 5).

17 Now in this (other thing) that I (am about to) declare unto you I praise you not, (viz.) that ye come together (so as is) not for the better, but for the worse.

18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be [10] divisions (Gr. schisms) among you; and I partly believe it (or, I believe it true κατὰ μέρος τι, of some part of you).

19 [11] For (according to our Lord's saying, Matt. xviii. 7) there must be also heresies (or sects) among you (the flesh, the world, and the devil, tempting to it, and the wisdom of God permitting it), that they which are approved (of him) may be made manifest among you.

20 When ye come together therefore (thus) into one place, this is not (acting as if you came) to eat the Lord's supper (the feast of Christian charity and communion).

21 For in (your way of) eating [12] every one taketh before (the) other his own supper, (not tarrying for, or regarding, others, ver. 23:) and (so it falls out, that)

but the woman being deceived was in the transgression," 1 Tim. ii. 11—13, where the same reason is assigned for her subjection, which I offer for explication of these words.

Others interpret the words thus: The woman ought to act decently in the church, and therefore to be covered, because of the angels, who are present in the assemblies of the saints; it being the opinion, both of Jews* and Christians, that the ministering angels are there present.

[8] Ver. 14. Ἡ οὐδὲ αὐτὴ ἡ φύσις; Doth not even nature itself?] The exposition given in the paraphrase is so natural, and so well founded on the words and argument of the apostle, and so agreeable to the sentiments of all the ancient commentators on the place, that we seem not here to need the industry and learning the critics have so liberally spent upon this place: the apostle here by nature understanding not any inward principle implanted in the heart and reason of a man, but the first rise and constitution which man and woman have received from the God of nature. It is against nature, say the fathers, for a man to wear long hair, for by it he assumes the habit of a woman, καὶ ἄρχειν ταχθεὶς τὸ τῆς ὑποταγῆς σύμβολον παραλέλεκται, "and being made by God to rule, he takes upon him the symbol of subjection." Of the criticisms upon the word κομᾶν they say not a word.

[9] Ver. 16. Οὐδὲ ἐκκλησίαι τοῦ Θεοῦ, Nor the churches of God.] Hence it is manifest, (1.) that the apostle here cannot be thought to have respect only to the custom of the Greeks, as Mr. Le Clerc imagines, for then why doth he plead the custom of all the churches of God against this practice?

Secondly, Hence note, that in things only respecting decency, and in conforming to which there is no violation of the command of God, the custom of the church should be our rule, it being an argument of pride and a contentious spirit, in matters of so little moment, to be singular, and to create disturbance to the church of God.

[10] Ver. 18. Σχίσματα, Schisms.] Here the word schisms is not used of men separating from the church, but of them coming together in the church, but yet eating the Lord's supper separately, and so as not to join with the whole assembly in that ordinance: so the word also is used i. 10. "not of a separation from the unity of the catholic church," saith Esthius, "but of sects and divisions in the church."

[11] Ver. 19. Δεῖ γὰρ αἱρέσεις εἶναι, For there must be heresies, &c.] This necessity of heresies is not absolute, or of God's making, but only on supposition of the pride and vainglory, strife, envyings, and contentions, which were already in the church of Corinth (1 Cor. iii. 3), and God's permission that men so affected should act according to the corrupt affections and dispositions of their hearts; as the necessity of diseases in the body arises from men's intemperance. Nor is the reason here assigned of them properly causal, as if the wisdom of God designed there should be heresies for this end, that they who were approved of him might be made manifest, but rather eventual;† as if the apostle had said, Whence it will come to pass, that they who are approved will be made manifest.

[12] Ver. 21. Ἕκαστος τὸ ἴδιον δεῖπνον προλαμβάνει, Every one takes before his own supper.] It is the opinion of Dr. Lightfoot, that the apostle speaks not here of the agapæ, or love-feasts, which accompanied the eucharist, as the tradition of the ancient church supposed; but of the paschal supper, which these Judaizers did eat before the eucharist, as thinking that the eucharist, which our Lord instituted after that supper, was only an appendix of it; and that it was not instituted in commemoration of the death of Christ, but as a new form of their commemoration of their deliverance out of Egypt: and that on this account the apostle here repeats the institution of that sacrament by our Lord, and so oft tells them that Christ appointed this supper for the commemoration of his death, and that we might show it forth till he comes; and charges them with not discerning it to be the Lord's body (ver. 29). But he seems to be mistaken in both these conjectures. For,

First, It is very unlikely they should mistake the Lord's supper, celebrated then every week at least, for that paschal supper which was only to be celebrated once a year, and was then rather to be celebrated at home, in every man's family, than in the church; and which, according to the Jewish canons, could not be observed at all in Corinth, or out of Judea, whilst the temple stood.

Secondly, Those words of the apostle in the preceding chapter, viz. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" and those that follow, "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils," do plainly show that the apostle there supposes they well knew that in that supper they were partakers of the cup and table of the Lord, and had communion with his body and blood.

Dr. Lightfoot adds, That those words, "One is hungry, and another is drunken," refer not to the poor and the rich, but to the gentile who came fasting to the Lord's supper; whereas the Judaizing Christian, according to his custom, drank freely at his paschal supper; and he concludes, that the apostle doth not here reprehend their manner of coming to these suppers, but that he reprehends them for the very use of them. But here again he seems much mistaken, For,

First, It is evident the apostle reprehends them not for the supper itself, i. e. the eating and the drinking, but because they did προλαμβάνειν take their meat and their drink before others, not staying till they came (ver. 21. 33). Hence, for a remedy for this disorder, he saith not, Abstain from these suppers, but only, "When ye come together, tarry one for another."

Secondly, That the "hungry" here were the gentile converts, who chose to eat the eucharist fasting, is very improbable, not only because it was then generally received at night, but because the apostle, both here and ver. 34, allows all to eat and drink before they come, not taking notice of any that scrupled the doing this. Moreover, the οἱ μὴ ἔχοντες, "the hungry" here, are not men who have no houses, but who have nothing to eat or drink: for they were put to shame by this, that they had nothing to eat or drink, as one (who had nothing to bring) is (still) hungry, [13] and another (with his plenty) is drunken.

22 What? have ye not houses to eat and to drink in (if need be before you come? ver. 34) or despise ye (those poor Christians who are members of) the church of God (as well as you), and (put to) shame them that have not (what to eat or drink)? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not.

23 (To come together thus, I say, is not to come as they ought to do, who assemble to eat the Lord's supper?) For I have received of the Lord that which also I (as I received) delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed [14] took bread:

24 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said (to them all), [15] Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me (giving my body to be broken for you all).

25 After the same manner also he took [16] the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup (i. e. the wine contained in it) is the (memorial of the) new testament (or covenant ratified) in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me (confirming this covenant with my blood).

26 For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do [17] shew (by this memorial of it) the Lord's death till he come (to judgment).

27 Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and (or) [18] drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily (as they others had, nor were thought worthy to partake with them that had, in the assembly of which they were a part; it being not the place where they assembled, which is called the church of God, but the persons who assembled; for by the same action was the church despised, and they that had nothing put to shame: now it is not easy to conceive how, by this separate meeting in a church, they should despise a church, whereas, by denying their poor brethren any share in their banquet, they visibly despised them.

And with that agrees the note of Chrysostom on the place, that an assembly is called, οὐχ ἵνα διηρημένοι ὦσι οἱ συνελθόντες, ἀλλ' ἵνα οἱ διηρημένοι συνηγμένοι, "not that they who came together might be divided, but that they who are at home divided may join together."

Thirdly, These agapæ, or feasts of charity, being mentioned by Jude, ver. 12, by Ignatius, Ep. ad Smyrn. §. 8, by Clemens Alex. Pædag. lib. ii. cap. 1, p. 41, by Tertullian, Apol. cap. 38, by the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. ii. cap. 28, and by Julian the Apostate,* it is very unreasonable to call this custom into question, or to imagine that Paul here rather referred to a paschal supper than to this appendix of the supper of our Lord. When I call it an appendix, I do not mean that it was eaten by them after the Lord's supper, for the word προλαμβάνειν, "to take before his own supper," shows the contrary, viz. that this banquet was celebrated before the Lord's supper; but only that it was joined to the Lord's supper in imitation of our Lord, who celebrated the sacrament after the paschal supper.

[13] Ὃς δὲ μεθύει, And another is drunken.] This may either refer to the gentile converts among the Corinthians, retaining still their heathen custom of drinking liberally after their sacrifices, whence μεθύειν, "to be drunk," is by the grammarians thought to have its original from μετὰ τὸ θύειν, because of the free drinking they indulged in after their sacrifices; or to the Judaizing converts, who thought themselves obliged to drink plentifully at their festivals, four large cups of wine, saith Dr. Lightfoot,† at the paschal supper, and to be quite drunk, saith Buxtorf,‡ in the feast of Purim.

[14] Ver. 23. Ἔλαβεν ἄρτον, Took bread, &c.] The argument lies thus: Christ gave an equal distribution of the sacramental bread to every one at the table, in token that he died equally for all; and he appointed them all to eat together of it at one common table, in remembrance of his love to them all: can you then eat every one separately his own supper, excluding those to whom he equally distributed the sacred bread from any share of yours, leaving them hungry and in want of bread, and yet conceive you worthily eat the Lord's supper, and duly participate of, and thankfully commemorate, this great feast of love? But farther observe,

First, That this bread is called in the present tense, τὸ σῶμα κλώμενον, τὸ σῶμα διδόμενον, Christ's "body broken," his "body given," Luke xxii. 19, even whilst he was alive, and so his body was not actually broken, or given for us; it therefore could not be literally and naturally his broken body, but only by way of representation, as being then instituted to represent that body which was shortly to be given and broken on the cross for us: so also it is said of his blood, yet in his veins, that it is τὸ αἷμα τὸ ἐκχυνόμενον, his "blood shed," Matt. xxvi. 28, Mark xiv. 24, Luke xxii. 20, and this according to the usual sacramental phrase. Thus before the paschal sacrament was celebrated, it was said, "This πάσχα ἐστὶ τῷ Κυρίῳ, is the passover to the Lord (Exod. xii. 11. 13), i. e. this is that which is instituted to represent it; "for this night I will smite all the first-born of Egypt, and will pass over you:" and of circumcision it is said, "This is my covenant" (Gen. xiv. 10), before that Abraham was actually circumcised (ver. 23, 24).

Secondly, Observe that Paul calleth that five times bread which they did eat of, which was to them "the communion of the body of Christ," and by eating of which unworthily, they became "guilty of the body of Christ, not discerning the Lord's body," 1 Cor. x. 16, 17, xi. 26, 27, 28. He therefore five times calls that bread which was consecrated, and by our Saviour called his body: now is it not a wonder that one single passage, mentioned by our Saviour whilst he was alive, should be deemed sufficient to make us all believe that his whole body, and so his hand, was in his hand, and that this living Christ was at the same time dead and sacrificed; and that the same body which was whole before the eyes of his disciples was also broken for them at the same time, with many thousand contradictions more; and yet that what the Holy Ghost, who knew the meaning of our Saviour's words better than any Romanist, hath said so often, to inform us that this element is, after consecration, bread, should not be thought sufficient to make us think it bread, though it appears to all our senses so to be?

[15] Ver. 24. Λάβετε, φάγετε.] See the defence of these words against Dr. Mills, Examen Millii in locum.

[16] Ver. 25. Ποτήριον, The cup.] Note here two reasons for the participating of the cup by the whole body of the church at Corinth. (1.) Because it is "the blood of the new covenant," which belongs as much to the laity as to the priests: the "blood shed for the remission of the sins" not only of the priests, but of the laity. (2.) Because, by the drinking of this cup they remembered Christ's blood shed for them, and showed forth his death. Now since these reasons do equally concern all Christians, the drinking of the cup by which this commemoration, by our Lord's institution, is to be made, must equally concern them; for sure the means which Christ appointed for an end ought to be used by all who are obliged to pursue that end; and if the apostle here reprehends the Corinthians for varying from the tradition received from the Lord in the celebration of the sacrament, he would have reprehended them much more, had they so varied from it as to neglect the distribution of that cup which he had instituted for those sacred ends.

[17] Ver. 26. Τὸν θάνατον Κυρίου καταγγέλλετε, Ye show the Lord's death.] If then this be the end and use of this sacrament, to be a solemn commemoration of the death of Christ during his absence from us; if it was designed to be a standing memorial of his sufferings till he came again to judgment; the obligation that lies upon all Christians to observe it is perpetual, and ought not to cease till the world ends. Indeed, saith Theodoret,* "after his presence there will be no more of the symbols of his body, because the body itself will then appear." Which words are a full confutation of the doctrine of transubstantiation.

must do who, by this practice, thwart the great design of this institution, which was to show his equal love to all to whom he equally gave these elements, and to oblige us to live in continual remembrance of it), shall be guilty of (violating the sacrament of) the body and blood of the Lord.

28 But [19] let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup.

29 For he that eateth and drinketh [20] unworthily (as they who make those divisions and distinctions, and commit these disorders, when they come together to eat the Lord's supper do), eateth and drinketh [21] damnation (Gr. judgment) to himself, not discerning the Lord's body, (to be given as an indication of his equal kindness to all his members, without any difference or distinction, and as a symbol of their mutual communion with one another, x. 16, 17.)

30 For this cause (the not discerning the Lord's body, it is, that) many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.

31 For if we would (thus) judge (and discern) ourselves, we should not be judged (or, thus punished by God).

32 But when (neglecting this) we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world (but awakened by those chastisements to reform those evil practices which render us obnoxious to condemnation).

33 Wherefore, my brethren, (that this miscarriage may be rectified), when ye come together to eat (the Lord's supper), tarry one for another (that ye may all eat of that and your love-feasts together).

34 And if any man (pretend to do this out of) hunger, let him eat at home (before he come); that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come (or, as for the other things relating to this ordinance, or your letter, I will set them in order when I come).

note is this: The Greek ἤ, or, that he might lead you to think there was something in the popish argument taken hence to prove that the whole Christ was contained in either species; because either by eating or drinking unworthily, men become guilty of profaning both the body and blood of Christ: but for justification of our version, and, it may be noted that the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions read and, and so does Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. i. p. 271, Cyril. Al. de Ador. Sp. p. 421, Athanas. de Pass. Domini, p. 1027, Aut. Quæst. ad Antioch. p. 375.

Secondly, That according to Phavorinus, ἢ κεῖται ἀντὶ τοῦ καὶ, that is, "ἤ is often put for and;" so what is in the Hebrew וְ, or, is in the LXX. rendered καὶ, and, Lev. iv. 23. 28, Numb. xv. 18, Mal. ii. 7. So what is ἤ, Luke xx. 2, is καὶ, Matt. xxi. 23, Mark xi. 28. So the promise made to Abraham, καὶ τῷ σπέρματι αὐτοῦ, Gen. xvii. 8, is the promise made to him, ἢ τῷ σπέρματι, "and to his seed," Gal. iii. 6; and so the Hebrew vowel, when it divides or distributes, is rendered sometimes ἤ, or, as Exod. xxi. 17, Deut. iii. 34, 2 Sam. xxiv. 13, Ps. viii. 4, Prov. xx. 20, and sometimes καὶ, and, as Josh. viii. 22, Judg. iv. 6, xiii. 7, 1 Sam. xvii. 31, Jer. xiii. 23, Amos v. 19, and eating and drinking going here before, ver. 26, and following after, ver. 28, 29, this intermediate verse must bear the same sense.

[19] Ver. 28. Δοκιμαζέτω ἑαυτόν, Let him examine himself.] Δοκιμάζειν is to discern or approve: so, δοκιμάζεις, "Thou approvest the things which are most excellent," Rom. ii. 18; "Happy is the man that condemneth not himself, ἐν ᾧ δοκιμάζει, in that which he approves," Rom. xiv. 22. Δοκιμάζειν ἑαυτόν, is "to approve himself to himself," or discern how it is with himself: so 2 Cor. xiii. 5, ἑαυτοὺς δοκιμάζετε, "Prove yourselves: know ye not that Jesus Christ is among you, except ye be reprobates?" Gal. vi. 4, δοκιμάζετω, "Let every man approve his own work." And so here the sense is, Let a man approve himself to his own heart, as a good Christian, and one that comes to celebrate this ordinance with a grateful commemoration of the love of Christ dying for him, and with true charity and unfeigned kindness to all those for whom he did equally shed his blood, and gave his body to be broken; and so he may repair to it with a true Christian spirit, and in an acceptable manner.

[20] Ver. 29. Ἀναξίως, Unworthily.] i. e. "Not discerning the Lord's body;" which words plainly teach us what it is to eat and drink unworthily, viz. to do it so as in that action not to discern the Lord's body. Now this, as hath already been observed, cannot signify not to apprehend the sacrament to represent Christ's body broken and his blood shed for us: for of this ignorance had the Corinthians been guilty, the apostle would have argued ex non concessis, "from things not granted by them" (x. 16. 21). It therefore signifies their behaving themselves as if they had not considered that this sacrament was instituted in a thankful and practical remembrance of Christ dying for them, and ratifying by his blood the covenant in which he promised to be "merciful to their iniquities, and remember their sins no more;" and as a feast of love, designed equally for the benefit of all his members, and to knit them in the closest bonds of unity and friendship to each other: when this was wanting, they did not discern aright the Lord's body, or the sacrament of it, and so did eat and drink unworthily. In the Talmud, saith Dr. Pocock,* there is a distinction betwixt a man who ate the passover, לשם מצוה, "in obedience to the command," which was, that they should do it as a memorial of God's passing over them when he destroyed the Egyptians, by reason of the blood of the paschal lamb (Exod. xii. 13, 14); and he that thus ate it, was the just man that walked in the ways of the Lord, mentioned Hos. xiv. 9, and betwixt another who did eat it only as common food, i. e. without respect to the commandment, or the ends of its institution; and is compared to the transgressor there mentioned, that shall fall therein. So here, he that eateth this holy sacrament with a thankful memorial of the benefits conferred upon us, the death from which we are delivered by the blood of Christ, the true paschal lamb sacrificed for us, eats it worthily; but he that partakes of it only as common bread and wine, not considering the ends for which it was designed, and the benefits of Christ's death it represented and consigned, discerns not the Lord's body; i. e. he putteth no sufficient difference betwixt that and common food, as the word διακρίνω doth import (see note on Rom. xiv. 23).

[21] Κρῖμα, Damnation.] The word imports temporal judgments; as when Peter saith, "The time is come ἄρξασθαι τὸ κρῖμα, that judgment must begin at the house of God" (1 Pet. iv. 17), not damnation surely: and this is certainly the import of the word here, (1.) because the Corinthians did thus eat unworthily, and yet the judgments inflicted on them for so doing were only temporal; viz. weakness, sickness, and death, ver. 30. (2.) Because the reason assigned of those judgments is, that they might not be condemned in the other world, or that they might not be obnoxious to damnation.

CHAPTER XII.

1 Now concerning spiritual gifts, (or, persons, ver. 3), brethren, (which is another thing in and about exercise of which you offend; making them matter of contention, emulation, and vain-glory,) I would not have you ignorant (of what it concerns you to know of them, and yourselves that exercise them).

2 Ye know that (before your conversion to that faith, by which ye received these gifts,) ye were Gentiles, carried away unto (the service of) [1] these dumb idols (which could not speak themselves, much less enable you to speak), even as ye were led (by seducing guides).

3 Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus [2] accursed (or, anathema): and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord (and confirm that doctrine with supernatural gifts and miracles), but by the Holy Ghost.

4 Now there are [3] diversities of (these spiritual) gifts, but (it is) the same Spirit (which enables us to exercise any of them).

5 And there are differences of administrations (or, offices in the church, to which this diversity of gifts belongs), but (it is) the same Lord (who hath appointed all these offices, Eph. iv. 12).

6 And there are diversities of operations (performed by these offices in the church by virtue of these gifts), but it is the same God which (by giving them this Spirit) worketh (them) all in all.

7 [4] But the manifestation of the Spirit (in the exercise of these gifts) is given to every man (not for his own private use, but) to profit (others) withal.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XII.

[1] Ver. 2. Πρὸς τὰ εἴδωλα ἄφωνα, To dumb idols.] For though the priests told them they were only the receptacles of those deities they worshipped, that they resided in the image, and gave answers by it, as the Christian writers own;* yet both the prophets and writers of the New Testament, and all the fathers in their apologies, still represent them as they were in themselves, saying, "They have mouths, but speak not" (Ps. cxv. 5, cxxxv. 16), are dumb stones (Hab. ii. 19), et muta simulacra, and such only as gave answers, when they gave any, by the means of evil spirits.

[2] Ver. 3. Ἀνάθεμα, Accursed.] This the Jews did, as we learn not only from the words of Justin Martyr,† but also from their nineteenth prayer against heretics,‡ made by Samuel the younger in the days of Gamaliel: their exorcists and diviners therefore, though they pretend to it, saith the apostle, cannot be acted by the Spirit of God: nor can they who confirm the doctrine of Christ by miracles be acted by any other but the Holy Ghost; for no evil spirit would assist them to confirm a doctrine so opposite to, and destructive of, their kingdom and design.

[3] Ver. 4. Διαιρέσεις δὲ χαρισμάτων, There are diversities of gifts.] These gifts being in the nature of spiritual faculties, or habits, are very properly ascribed to that Spirit who animates the Christian, and by whom he lives the new life; and these ministries as properly to the Lord Christ, whose ministers and servants the apostles, prophets, teachers, &c. are in the propagation of the gospel. These operations being miraculous, and far exceeding the power of any creature, as fitly are ascribed to the Creator of all things. But whereas Crellius hence infers, that this third person being distinguished from the other two by the title of "the same God," he only must be truly and properly so called; he might as well have argued, that because the second person mentioned here is styled "the same Lord," he must be only so, exclusively to the same God; and because the first is called "the same Spirit," he must be so exclusively of the same God and Lord, who are equally spirits.

[4] Ver. 7—10.] It is exceeding difficult to fix the true import of all these gifts; I therefore shall propose what follows by way of conjecture, till I receive better information from more able hands.

First, then, By "the word of wisdom," I understand the wisdom given to the apostles to reveal the gospel to the world; for that, in this epistle, is styled "the wisdom of God in a mystery—the hidden wisdom," 1 Cor. ii. 7, and elsewhere, "the manifold wisdom of God," Eph iii. 10. Christ, the great teacher of it, is also styled "the wisdom of God," 1 Cor. i. 24, and in him are said to be contained "all the treasures of wisdom," Col. ii. 3. The apostles, to whom this gospel was committed, are called σοφοὶ, "wise men;"—"Behold, I send unto you prophets and apostles," Luke xi. 49, "and wise men," Matt. xxiii. 34, and they are said to teach this gospel "according to the wisdom given to them," 2 Pet. iii. 15.

Secondly, The "word of knowledge" being distinguished from that of revelation and of prophecy, 1 Cor. xiv. 6, xiii. 8, and being set by way of apposition, or explication, with "the knowledge of all mysteries," 1 Cor. xiii. 2, seems to signify the gift of understanding mysteries, or things concealed: such was the mystery of calling the gentiles, before it was revealed, Rom. xi. 25, Eph. i. 9, iii. 9, the mystery of recalling the Jews, Rom. xi. 25, the "mystery of iniquity," 2 Thess. ii. 7, "the mystery of the beast," Rev. x. 7, but more especially the gift of understanding the mystical sense of the scriptures of the Old Testament. And in this sense Barnabas seems to speak of it, when he saith (sect. 6), "Blessed be God, ὁ σοφίαν καὶ νοῦν θέμενος ἐν ἡμῖν τῶν κρυφίων αὐτοῦ, who hath given us the wisdom and knowledge of his secrets;" and so it agrees with that gift which the fathers call προγνωσις, as when Irenæus saith,* "Some have the knowledge of things to come, and visions, and prophetical sayings;" and the man thus gifted seems to be, in Clemens Romanus, "the powerful man to utter knowledge."

Thirdly, That by "faith" we are to understand a miraculous faith, enabling them to do things most difficult, seems highly probable from these words, "Though I have all faith, so as to remove mountains," 1 Cor. xiii. 2. But chiefly I would understand by it a peculiar impulse that came upon them when any difficult matter was to be performed, which inwardly assured them God's power would assist them in the performance of it (see note on James v. 15). Whence it is often mentioned as a preparatory disposition to the working such miracles, and is sometimes styled the "faith of God" (Mark xi. 22), sometimes faith without doubting (Matt. xxi. 21), and so it was a prerequisite to the casting out stubborn devils (Matt. xvii. 20), and to the ensuing gifts of healing and working miracles; and hence perhaps it is that in the following enumeration of them, ver. 28—30, we find no mention of it.

Fourthly, Ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, "the working of miracles," is, by the fathers, referred to the power residing in the apostles to inflict diseases, and even death itself, upon offenders, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 5. 10, and of Elymas the sorcerer, Acts xiii. 11, and of the incestuous person, 1 Cor. v. 4, where the apostle makes mention τῆς δυνάμεως Χριστοῦ, of the power of Christ; and where he speaks of his rod, he calls it the power that God hath given him, 1 Cor. iv. 19, 20, 2 Cor. x. 8, xiii. 10. But yet I doubt not but these words are truly rendered "the working of miracles;" for to them the word δύναμις, power, generally relates in the New Testament: as, when mention is made of the miracles done by Christ himself, Matt. xi. 20. 23, xiii. 54. 58, xiv. 2, Mark v. 30, Luke iv. 36, v. 17, vi. 19, xix. 37, Acts ii. 22, x. 38, and of the miracles done by others in the name of Christ, Matt. vii. 22, Mark ix. 39, Luke ix. 1, Acts i. 8, iv. 33, vi. 8, viii. 13, xix. 11, 1 Cor. ii. 4, 2 Cor. xii. 12, Gal. iii. 5, 1 Thess. i. 5. Hence it is frequently mentioned in conjunction with "signs and wonders," Acts ii. 22, viii. 13, Rom. xv. 19, Heb. ii. 4. It is also here plainly distinguished from the gift of healing; and it is as plainly distinguished from the power of casting out devils, in these words, "In thy name have we prophesied and cast out devils, and done δυνάμεις πολλὰς, many mighty works," Mark vii. 22. It therefore rightly seemeth in the paraphrase to be restrained to the doing things beyond the course of nature, and wrought by an immediate divine hand: such as the sup-

9 To another faith (to enable him to believe firmly, that he should be empowered to do things most difficult) by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing (all manner of diseases) by the same Spirit;

10 To another the working of miracles (or, powers, such as raising the dead to life); to another prophecy (enabling him to foretell things future, and speak by a divine afflatus); to another discerning of (the) spirits (of others); to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues:

plying a defective member, or the raising of the dead. Thus to the first order of the successors of the apostles, Eusebius* ascribes "many strange powers of the Holy Ghost;" and Justin Martyr† speaks of the powers done in his time by the name of Christ.

Fifthly, The gift of "prophecy" is not to be restrained, as some do, to teaching, and the interpretation of the scripture, which it importeth only as that was done by a particular inspiration of the Holy Ghost; for otherwise, as here the prophets and the teachers are two distinct offices in the church, so also are they reckoned as such in the church at Antioch, Acts xiii. 1, and they are reckoned as distinct χαρίσματα in these words, "Having gifts different, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching" (Rom. xii. 6, 7). And so they are reckoned by Justin Martyr,‡ when he saith, "One man receives at baptism the Spirit of understanding, ὁ δὲ προγνώσεως, ὁ δὲ διδασκαλίας, another of foreknowledge, or prophecy, and another of teaching;" and this discovers to us another sense of prophecy; viz. that it imports, as Irenæus saith, πρόγνωσιν τῶν μελλόντων, "the foreknowledge or prediction of things future," and that in order to the exhortation to some duty. Thus Agabus foretold by the Spirit the dearth that was to come over all Judea, Acts xi. 28—30, that the other Christians might be moved, as they were, to send their charity thither. Thus "Judas and Silas, being prophets, διὰ λόγου πολλοῦ, with many words they comforted the brethren, and established them" (Acts xvi. 32). This gift was exercised also by foretelling who would be fit persons to do good service in the church. Thus Paul commits a charge to Timothy, "according to the foregoing prophecies concerning him" (1 Tim. i. 18), and saith, "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, that was given thee by prophecy" (iv. 14). And in this sense the fathers understood it, is evident, not only from the word πρόγνωσις, foreknowledge, by which they did express it, but from the arguments they use against the Jews to convince them that God hath left their church, and had owned and embraced the societies of Christians, because he had left them no prophets, but had transferred that gift to the Christians: and these predictions being made by revelation of the Spirit, ἀποκάλυψις, or revelation, is accounted a part of this gift; for to the prophet is ascribed "his revelation," 1 Cor. xiv. 26. 30, and the Revelation of John is "the book of his prophecy;" and to the prophet is ascribed the manifestation of the secrets of men's hearts, as in those words, "If all prophesy, and there come in an unbeliever, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all: and thus are the secrets of his heart laid open" (1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25). Thus of those prophets Irenæus (lib. v. cap. 6) saith, that they did not only explain the mysteries of God, but also τὰ κρυφία ἀνθρώπων εἰς φανερὸν ἄγειν ἐπὶ τῷ συμφέροντι, "manifest the secret things of men, when it was needful or profitable for them, or the church" (see Origen against Celsus, lib. i. p. 34).

Sixthly, The διάκρισις πνευμάτων, "discerning of spirits," not only imports the faculty of discerning betwixt the impulse of false and true prophets, which he that hath seems to be styled by Clemens, ὁ σοφὸς ἐν διακρίσει τῶν λόγων, "a wise man in discerning words," and betwixt the lying wonders and magical operations of evil spirits, and the powers of the Holy Ghost, as 1 Cor. xiv. 29, 1 Thess. v. 20, 21, 1 John iv. 1, but also a judgment of discerning the spirits of other men, whether they were qualified for such an office in the church, and accordingly choosing them out for that work. So the Spirit, in the prophets, said, "Separate me Barnabas and Paul for the work whereunto I have called them," Acts xiii. 2, 3, and thus the Holy Ghost is said to have constituted the bishops and presbyters in Asia, Acts x. 28, because, as Clemens Romanus saith,* "they constituted bishops and deacons, ἐκκοιμήσαντες τοῦ Πνεύματι, making trial of them by the Holy Ghost." And Clemens of Alexandria,† that John "ordained to be of the clergy, τοὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος σημαινομένους, such as were signified to him by the Spirit." Ignatius‡ saith of the bishops of his time, that they were constituted, "not by men, but Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ γνώμῃ, by the counsel of Christ Jesus." Cyprian,§ that they were constituted, "not only by the consent of the people, and the suffrage of their fellow-bishops, but also judicio divino et Dei testimonio, by the judgment and testimony of God." And, lastly, this gift seems also to imply a discovering of what was done inwardly, or in the spirit of a man; so Peter discerned the heart of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 3. 9, and of Simon Magus, Acts viii. 21. 23, Paul of Elymas, Acts xiii. 10, and of the lame man, "seeing he had faith to be healed," Acts xiv. 9. And Ignatius‖ speaks of the Spirit in him that did foretell, and τὰ κρυπτὰ ἐλέγχειν, "reprove things secret."

[5] Ver. 11. Καθὼς βούλεται, As he will.] Here seems to be a plain argument for the personality of the Holy Ghost, because a will is here ascribed to him. (2.) Hence it is evident that he is no creature, because no creature can enable others to do these works. (3.) That he is God: for as all this diversity of operations is ascribed to the same God, ver. 6, so it is here said, "All these worketh one and the same Spirit."¶

[6] Ver. 12. So is Christ.] That is, saith Chrysostom, τὸ τοῦ χριστοῦ σῶμα, "the body of Christ," that is, his church, as appears from ver. 21, "The head cannot say to the feet, I have no need of you;" this being not true of Christ, the head of that church, which is his body, but only of the ministerial heads under him.

[7] Ver. 13. Εἰς ἓν σῶμα ἐβαπτίσθημεν, We were baptized into one body.] Vain here is the note of Mr. Clerc, viz. that "we are baptized that we might be called by one name, be of one society, the church of Christ:" for it is not by partaking of one spirit that we are called Christians, but by pro-ing of that living water, we) have been all made [8] to drink into (or, of) one Spirit.

14 (All, I say,) For (as) the (natural, so the mystical) body is not one member, but many.

15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

17 * If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

18 But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him.

19 And if they were all one member, where were the body?

20 But now are they many members, yet but one body.

21 And the eye (the man endowed with the word of wisdom or knowledge) cannot say unto the hand (the person employed in lesser ministries), I have no need of thee: nor again the head (the person placed in the highest dignities in the church) to the feet (the deacon, or man employed in the lowest offices of the church), I have no need of you.

22 Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary (Gr. but the members of the body which seem more weak are more necessary; viz. the brain, the stomach, and the guts):

23 And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable (Gr. more dishonourable), upon these we bestow (Gr. put) [9] more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness.

24 For our comely parts have no need: but God [10] hath tempered the body together (agreeably to the condition of each member), having given more abundant honour (or covering) to that part which lacked: (placing them so, that even nature may be a covering to them.

25 And so hath he dealt also with the body mystical, making the meaner offices of them who attend upon the poor more necessary, and to them more honoured who need their help,) that there should be no [11] schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care (and regard to) one for another.

26 And whether one member (of the natural body) suffer, all the members suffer with it (by sympathy); or one member be honoured (or adorned), all the members rejoice with it (i. e. if, being indisposed, it becomes sound, being weak, it recovers strength, all the members are eased, and so may be said to rejoice with it).

27 Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular, [12] (or, severally are members of that body, and so ought to act in the mystical body as do the members in the natural, rejoicing with them that do rejoice, and mourning with them that weep, Rom. xii. 15.)

fessing faith in Christ. The apostle is plainly proving, that as the natural body is one, so is the mystical: now the natural body is one, as being informed by one soul and spirit united to it, and animating all the parts of it; so is it, saith he, in the mystical body united together by one and the same Spirit received in baptism, and from our spiritual head, Christ Jesus, communicated to all the living members of his body, to give them spiritual life and motion (see Eph. iv. 16).

[8] Εἰς ἓν Πνεῦμα ἐποτίσθημεν, We were made to drink of one Spirit.] So our Lord represents the participation of the Holy Spirit, saying, "If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink. He that believeth, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living waters. This spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed in him should receive" (John vii. 37—39). And the apostle calls the water which was a symbol of the Spirit, "spiritual drink," 1 Cor. x. 4, and as believers are ἓν πνεῦμα, one spirit with Christ (1 Cor. vi. 17), so doth Christ invite them to come to him to drink of this Spirit.

[9] Ver. 23. Τιμὴν περισσοτέραν, More abundant honour.] The clothes God made to cover the nakedness of Adam and Eve, are styled by Onkelos "clothes of honour:" and the word τιμὴ, here rendered "honour," is in the Septuagint put to signify a cover; so, "Behold, he is to thee a covering of thy eye" (Gen. xx. 16), is in the Septuagint, εἰς τὴν τιμὴν τοῦ προσώπου σου, "for an honour on thy face."

[10] Ver. 24. Συνεκέρασε τὸ σῶμα, Hath so tempered the body.] Agreeable to this is that of Cicero,* Principio corporis nostri magnam natura ipsa videtur habuisse rationem, quæ formam nostram, reliquamque figuram in quâ esset species honesta, eam posuit in promptû; quæ autem partes corporis ad necessitatem datæ, aspectum essent deformem habituræ, atque turpem, eas contexit atque abdidit; hanc tam diligentem naturæ fabricam imitata est hominum verecundia, quæ enim natura occultavit, eadem omnes, qui sanâ mente sunt, removent ab oculis.

[11] Ver. 25. Ἵνα μὴ ᾖ σχίσμα, That there may be no schism in the body.] Of this schism of the members against the body, see Menenius apud Livium, lib. ii. cap. 32, Max. Tyr. diss. v. p. 50.

[12] Ver. 27.] For illustration of this long comparison betwixt the body natural and mystical, observe, (1.) that this comparison is taken from the Jews, who teach that such order ought to be observed betwixt the priesthood and the people as in the human body, in which there are members superior, and others serving to the rest, for all of them serve the heart from whence life proceeds; and so it is meet that the Levites should serve the priests, and the people the Levites (Paulus Fagius, in Lev. iii. 7). The argument which the apostle useth from the comparison of the natural with the mystical body, seems to consist in these particulars.

First, That as the most inferior members of the natural body are as much the members of that body as the most noble, so are the most inferior Christians as much the members of Christ's body.

Secondly, That there would be no perfect natural body without this diversity of members, and in like manner no mystical body without such diversity of gifts and offices as God hath ordered in his church (ver. 17. 19).

Thirdly, That the members are placed in the body according to the wisdom and the good pleasure of God (ver. 18. 24), and so it is in the members of the mystical body, which therefore ought to acquiesce in the good pleasure of his will, in whatsoever station and condition his wisdom doth see fit to place them.

Fourthly, That the members which seem the weakest and the meanest are as necessary and serviceable to the body as the other: human life could not continue, nor human kind subsist without them (ver. 22): so in the mystical body, they that are employed in works of charity and mercy to the poor and the sick, those that "serve tables," are in their kind as necessary and serviceable as other members of the church, and had their χαρίσματα, or spiritual gifts, as well as others (Rom. xii. 6—8, 1 Pet. iv. 10, 11).

Fifthly, That as nature had provided a covering for the less honourable parts, and taught us to employ our care in covering and adorning them, so was it also with respect to the less honourable members of the ecclesiastical body; there were "helps" and ministers particularly appointed to take care of them, to cover their nakedness and supply their wants, and promises were made to those who employed themselves in such acts of charity (ver. 23, 24).

Sixthly, That as there was no division in the members of the natural body, but all the members took care of, and were employed for, the good of the whole; so God hath ordered

* De Officiis, lib. i. n. 177.

28 [13] And God hath set some in the (body of the) church, first apostles (to exercise the gift of wisdom), secondarily prophets (to exert those of knowledge and prophecy), thirdly teachers (to labour in the word and doctrine,) after that (workers of) miracles, then (they that have the) gifts of healings, helps (to take care of the poor), governments (rulers of the church), diversities of tongues.

29 Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles?

30 Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret?

31 But covet earnestly the best (and the most useful) gifts: and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way (of ministering to the welfare of the church, and of your own souls; even that of charity).

matters thus in the body mystical, that there should be no divisions, no separate interests in it, but they should mutually regard the interests of one another, sympathizing and rejoicing together (ver. 25, 26).

[13] Ver. 28.] Note, for explication of these offices,

First, That to prophets I ascribe the gifts of knowledge and of prophecy, from these words, "If I have prophecy, and know all mysteries and all knowledge" (1 Cor. xiii. 2): and as the first gift, "the word of wisdom," belongs especially to the apostles, so it seems probable that the second, the "word of knowledge," should belong to the second office, that of prophets. But whereas Mr. Clerc saith that "the prophets did not teach by inspiration, but only had been fitted to teach by inspiration; that they spake as they saw fit themselves; and those things which they received from Christ and his apostles they interpreted after their own manner;" this seems to be confuted by these words of the apostle, "If any thing be revealed to him that sitteth by, let the first prophet be silent; for the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets."

Secondly, The "teachers" seem to be men who, having received the doctrine of faith from the apostles, preached it to others for their conversion to the faith, and so they are the men who "laboured in the word and doctrine," 1 Tim. v. 17. They were, saith Eusebius,* ἀποστόλων μαθηταί, "the disciples of the apostles, who built up the churches in the faith which the apostles had planted, promoting the preaching of the gospel more and more, and spreading among them the salutary seed of the heavenly kingdom." And they of them, who preached the gospel to them who had not heard it, were called evangelists, and sometimes apostles: so Andronicus and Junia are called ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, "men of esteem among the apostles," Rom. xvi. 7, and of these John saith, "For his name's sake they went forth, taking nothing of the gentiles; we therefore ought to receive such, that we may be fellow-helpers to the truth" (3 John 7, 8). But whereas Theophylact and Mr. Le Clerc say, that the prophets indeed spake by the Holy Ghost, but these teachers from themselves: this I cannot assent to, for διδασκαλία, "teaching," is numbered among the spiritual gifts, Rom. xii. 6, and διδάσκαλοι, "teachers," among them to whom Christ had given these gifts (see the note on Eph. iv. 11).

Thirdly, The "helps" seem to be the deacons and other officers who ministered, not only to the sick and poor, but in holy things also—in baptizing and distributing the eucharist; ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι, whence comes the word "helps," signifies, to take of others; and these also, as before I noted, had their spiritual gifts. As then the Talmudists, saith Dr. Lightfoot, call the Levites "the helps of the priests;" so may the apostle call the deacons, which answered to them, the helps of the apostles and bishops of the church.

Fourthly, "Governments" are almost generally supposed to denote the rulers of the churches planted by the apostles, and who are sometimes styled "bishops," Acts xx. 28, sometimes ἡγούμενοι, "guides" or "rulers," Heb. xiii. 7. 17, and sometimes προεστῶτες, "presidents" or "prelates," Rom. xii. 8, 1 Thess. v. 12. But Dr. Lightfoot conjectures they were the men who had the gift of discerning spirits, because κυβερνήσεις, which we here render governments, signifies in the Old Testament, wise counsels, and skill in giving judgment of things; thus ὁ νοήμων κυβερνήσεις κτήσεται, "A man of understanding shall attain to wise counsels," Prov. i. 5, οἷς μὴ ὑπάρχει κυβέρνησις, "Where no counsel is the people fall; but in much counsel there is safety," Prov. xi. 14, and μετὰ κυβερνήσεως, "By wise counsel thou shalt make war," Prov. xxiv. 6. It is not reasonable, saith he, to suppose no office should be appointed for this so necessary gift, and yet no other is here mentioned to which we can apply it. Let the reader choose which of these interpretations he likes best.

CHAPTER XIII.

1 [1] (For) Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels (the languages of all nations, or knew to converse with angels), and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal (benefiting no man by my empty and confused, and pleasing no man with my shrill and noisy, sound).

2 And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing (worth in the sight of God).

3 And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned (for the faith), and have not charity (to man, but do this rather out of vain-glory, or to be admired and praised of men), it profiteth me nothing (as to my eternal state).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

[1] Ver. 1—3.] Note. Here it is to be noted, that the apostle in these verses reckons up the things which were of highest value to the Jews, and which rendered their wise men the most celebrated. Thus of R. Jochanan ben Zachai,* they say that he understood the language of the angels; and of R. Azai,† that there was not in his days "a rooter up of mountains" like to him, or one that could do so great things as he did. The man on whom the spirit of prophecy did rest, or who was fit to receive him, must, say they, be "a wise man, a religious man, a temperate man, and one that is endued with all probity of manners."‡ Of alms they say, that "whosoever diminisheth any thing of his substance to bestow in alms, shall be delivered from hell."* And as for martyrdom for the law, they thought it sufficient to expiate, not only for their own sins, but even for the sins of the whole nation. Hence Josephus† brings in Eleazar, praying thus for the Jews, "Let my blood be an expiation for them, and receive my life for their lives." And thus he saith of the martyrs that suffered under Antiochus Epiphanes, that "the divine providence saved all Israel from the evils they suffered, by the blood and the propitiatory death of those pious men."‡

4 Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up,

5 Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;

6 Rejoiceth not [2] in iniquity (or falsehood), but rejoiceth in the truth;

7 [3] Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

8 Charity never faileth (as to the proper and elicit acts of it): but (as for other gifts) whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be (the gift of) knowledge, it shall vanish away.

9 For (with all our gifts) we know (still but) in part, and we prophesy (but) in part (knowing but few things in comparison to our future knowledge).

10 But when that (state of knowledge) which is perfect is come, then that (knowledge) which is in part shall be done away.

11 When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things (and the like difference will there be betwixt us now and then).

12 For now we see (only as) through a glass, darkly; but then (we shall see) face to face (with the greatest nearness and perspicuity, which now we cannot; for no man, saith God, shall see my face and live, Exod. xxxiii. 20. 23, 2 John 12, 3 John 14): now I know (but) in part; but then shall I know

But here is raised a dispute, whether the gifts here mentioned were at any time, or could be, exercised by them who wanted charity? or such profuse alms, and constancy in suffering to the death, were ever, or could be, separated from that grace? To which I answer, It is true that the apostle here speaketh hypothetically, that, were these things performed without charity, they would not profit to salvation; but then that supposition seems fairly to imply the thing itself was not impossible; or that there was no necessary connexion betwixt these gifts and actions and the grace of charity. Moreover, our Saviour seems plainly to inform us that men might prophesy and cast out devils, and do mighty works in his name (Matt. vii. 22, 23), and yet be workers of iniquity, and persons whom he would not own at the last day. He also teacheth that some may do their alms to be applauded by men (Matt. vi. 2), and therefore do them so as to receive no reward from God; and so informs us, that alms may be given without true love to God, or to our neighbour for his sake. And, lastly, All the fathers teach, that it is not the suffering but the reason of it, that makes the martyr; and that "when men, in schism or heresy, thus give their bodies to be burnt, they are not to be deemed true martyrs, by reason of the want of charity."* And the same they say of them who suffer for vain-glory; viz. that "they shed their blood in vain."†

[2] Ver. 6. Ἐν ἀδικίᾳ, In iniquity.] That ἀδικία here signifies falsehood, the "truth," to which it is opposed, shows; so it signifies in the Old Testament above a hundred times, and the word שקר, which in the Hebrew signifies a lie, is as often by the Septuagint translated ἀδικία as ψεῦδος· so "a right hand of falsehood" is δεξία ἀδικίας, Ps. cxliv. 11, the "way of lying," is ὁδὸς ἀδικίας, Ps. cxix. 29, and "he that telleth lies," is λαλῶν ἄδικα, see Ps. cvii. 7, and cxix. 69. 78. 86. 118. 128. 163, Ps. lxiii. 11, Exod. xxii. 7. Now "falsehood" and "a lie," in the Old and New Testament, do often signify a false religion, or a religion containing a false object of worship. Thus "the molten image is a teacher of lies," Hag. ii. 28, and he that maketh it, is said to have "a lie in his right hand," Isa. xliv. 20, he that goes after them "walketh in lies," Jer. xxiii. 14, and "inherits lies," ὡς ψευδῆ ἐκτήσαντο οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν εἴδωλα· he turns the truth of God into a lie, Rom. i. 25, believes a lie, 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11 (see the note on Rom. iii. 7). And "the truth" in the New Testament is emphatically put to signify the gospel, or the Christian faith: so the Second Epistle of John, ver. 3, 4, "I rejoiced greatly to find thy children walking in the truth:" and the Third Epistle, ver. 3, 4, "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth." So that the import of these words may be this—Charity will not permit us to rejoice, but rather cause us to be troubled, to find men still continue in their false worship, as the gentiles, or in opposition to the gospel delivered to them, as the Jews do; but it rejoiceth to see men walking according to the truth of the gospel.

[3] Ver. 7.] From these four comprehensive verses, we learn the properties and fruits of charity. (1.) What it requires us to do to all. (2.) What it will not permit us to do to any. (3.) What it requires us to do, or will not permit us to do, to our offending brother.

First, What deportment it requires towards all men; viz.

1. It is good, kind, and tender-hearted, towards all (ver. 4); "The Lord make your charity to abound to one another, and to all men," 1 Thess. iii. 12; for charity requireth us to love our brother as ourselves, it must engage us to consider him as we do ourselves, and so extend the same kindness to him, when he needs it, as we show to ourselves (Gal. vi. 10).

2. It is active and laborious, engaging us "by love to serve one another" (Gal. v. 13, 14), to do them any service we are able with good-will, and without grudging; for there must be in us, ὁ κόπος τῆς ἀγάπης, "the labour of love" (2 Thess. i. 3, Heb. vi. 10).

3. It "rejoiceth in the truth" (ver. 6); that is, in men's doing righteously, and living according to the gospel, which is called by way of eminence "the truth;" it begets in us a complacency and inward pleasure, to behold truth and righteousness, piety and goodness, prevailing in the world.

4. It makes us ready to believe all things (ver. 7); that is, all the good it hears, or can have any charitable ground to think of others.

5. It "hopeth all things" (ver. 7); i. e. it inclines us to hope still the best concerning men's intentions and actions liable to doubt; and if our brother be at present bad, to hope and not despair of his amendment, and so still to endeavour his reformation by all proper means.

Secondly, The things which charity will not permit us to do to any are these; viz.

1. "Charity worketh no evil to our neighbour," in his person, estate, good name, or relations (Rom. xiii. 10), much less in reference to his soul: and therefore,

2. It will not suffer us to scandalize, or to offend our brother, by doing any thing which either may embolden him to sin, or disaffect him to religion, or discourage him in the practice of his duty; for, "if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably" (Rom. xiv. 15).

3. Οὐ λογίζεται τὸ κακὸν (ver. 5). It will not permit us to surmise or suspect that evil of others which we do not know; it "imputes not evil" to them, nor puts to any man's account beyond absolute necessity. It doth not censure their miscarriages as done out of malice, or with ill intentions. So Theodoret.

4. It "rejoiceth not in iniquity" (ver. 6), in any evil done to, much less by, others; it permits no man to be pleased with any deceit, or falsehood spoken of, or done to, others, or with any ill stories, or malicious insinuations, concerning them.

5. It envies not the happiness or the prosperity of others, but is well pleased with it (ver. 4).

6. Οὐκ ἀσχημονεῖ, "It behaveth not itself unseemingly" towards any, in words or gestures; it refuseth not to do the

7. Οὐ φυσιοῦται, "It vaunteth not itself" (ver. 4): it "is not puffed up" against our brethren; it roots out of us all elation of mind, ambition, ostentation, pride in over-valuing ourselves, and despising others (Eph. iv. 2); οὐ περπερεύεται, it is not rash, heady, or precipitate in speaking of, or acting towards, others. So Chrysostom and Œcumenius. It doth not curiously search into other men's matters which belong not to us. So Theodoret.

8. It "seeketh not her own" praise, profit, or pleasure, to the hurt of others; but inclines men to seek the good of others (1 Cor. x. 24).

Thirdly, The deportment charity requires to our offending brother is expressed in these particulars:

1. Charity "beareth long," and causeth us to endure provocations with much patience, before we do conceive any displeasure against others.

2. It "endureth all things," though grievous to be borne, without returning evil for evil, enabling us to "forbear one another in love" (Eph. iv. 2, Col. iii. 13); and will not cease from being kind and well-affected to our brother, by reason of any provocation whatsoever.

3. It "covers all things," i. e. inclines us to conceal the evil that we know of others; and thus it "covers a multitude of sins" (James v. 20).

4. Οὐ παροξύνεται (ver. 5), "It is not highly exasperated," and breaks not forth into violent ungovernable passions on any provocation.

5. It is easy to be entreated, ready to forgive, and full of mercy (Col. iii. 13, Eph. iv. 32, James iii. 17).

[4] Ver. 12. Καθὼς καὶ ἐπεγνώσθην, Even as I am known.] I do not think that either these, or the words of John, "We shall see him as he is," afford any just grounds for the speculations of the schools, touching the intuitive vision of the essence of God, or their speculum Trinitatis, without which the invocations of saints and angels cannot be excused from idolatry: for as the words, 1 John iii. 2, refer not to the vision of God the Father, but of Christ Jesus, appearing at the day of judgment in his glory, and rendering "our bodies like unto his glorious body;" so these words refer not to the knowledge of God's essence, but rather to the knowledge of those great things he hath prepared for those that love him, revealed now in part, by the Spirit of prophecy and wisdom (1 Cor. ii. 9, 10), which then, saith the apostle, we shall know in the most clear and perfect manner, as we ourselves are known of God.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 Follow (therefore) after charity (above all things), and desire (also) spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy (i. e. expound the scripture, or reveal some mystery to the edification of the church).

4 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue [2] edifieth himself (only); but he that prophesieth edifieth the church.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIV.

[1] Ver. 2. Ὁ γὰρ λαλῶν γλώσσῃ, For he that speaketh with an unknown tongue.] That what is said in this verse is spoken only by way of concession, as Mr. Clerc imagines, cannot be true, because it is expressly said, that "in the Spirit he speaketh mysteries;" for mysteries, when the apostle speaketh of spiritual gifts, hath still relation to some profound secret things, 1 Cor. ii. 7, and xiii. 2. And Πνεύματι λαλεῖ cannot here signify, as Mr. Clerc conceives, "He speaketh to his own understanding:" since the apostle, through this whole chapter, is speaking of spiritual gifts, which also he expressly calleth "spirits," saying, "Seeing you are zealous πνευμάτων, of spirits," i. e. of spiritual gifts; and the afflatus or inspiration here was to enable the man to speak the mystery, and not to use the unknown tongue. For explication of this whole matter, let it be noted,

First, That the gift of tongues and prophecy, in their original donation, did still go together; and they who spake with tongues, spake τὰ μεγαλεῖα τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the great things of God" (Acts ii. 11, x. 46), "they spake with tongues and prophesied" (Acts xix. 6); and the reason seems plain, viz. because the gift of tongues was given as a help to prophecy. Now these two things, thus joined by God, should not have been used separately by these gifted men; yea, the gift of tongues was only to be used when they were to speak to gentiles in their own language, which was one great design of the gift of tongues (ver. 22). Nor should they have used the gift of tongues when an afflatus came upon them, and some mystery was imparted to them, by which the church was to be edified, unless they knew there was one present who had the gift of interpretation of tongues: this therefore was a great abuse of this gift, that when they had a mystery revealed to them they did not utter it in a language understood by the assembly, but only by themselves, and so they did not edify the church by it, though it was given, as all the other gifts were, for edification (xii. 7). Note, Secondly, That the gift of tongues being imparted per modum habitus, as a permanent gift, like to a habit; they who had received this gift could always use it at their pleasure, and so could also use it when a prophetical afflatus came upon them; but the gift of prophecy, being an afflatus in manner of a revelation, could be only used when the afflatus came upon them; so that the first gift might at any time be used without any fresh operation of the Holy Ghost, whereas the second gift always required that afflatus.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἑαυτὸν οἰκοδομεῖ, Edifieth himself.] He therefore understood himself, as the church did him that prophesied: and indeed, by speaking what he himself understood not, he would have been as much a barbarian, and unprofitable to himself, as he was to others. To say with Cajetan, "The words were pious which he uttered, and he had pious affections when he uttered them," is unsatisfactory: for what if the matter of them was so, since if he understood them no more than a parrot, his piety in speaking of them could be no more than that of a parrot; he neither could know they the mystery he utters in it), [3] that the church may receive edifying (by it).

6 Now (therefore), brethren, if I come unto you speaking with (strange) tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you (also) either by revelation (of some secret), or by knowledge (of some mystery), or [4] by prophesying (i. e. foretelling of something to come), or by doctrine (instructing you what to believe or practise)?

7 And (thus it is) even (in) things without life giving sound, whether (it be) pipe or harp, (for) except they give a distinction in the sounds (to render it intelligible), how shall it be known what is piped or harped?

8 For if the trumpet (for example) give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle (at the hearing of it)?

9 So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood (by your auditors), how shall it be known what is spoken (by you)? for (by speaking what they know not) ye shall (be as men who) speak (only) into the air (vain and unprofitable words, lost in the speaking, as the voice is in the air).

10 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices (languages and idioms, as there be nations, or, as the Jews compute, to the number of seventy) in the world, and none of them is without signification (but this signification they have only to them that understand them).

11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh (as if he spake to) [5] a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be (as) a barbarian unto me (not understanding what he saith).

12 Even so ye, forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts (Gr. of spirits, that you may not be barbarians, and unprofitable in the use of them), seek that ye may excel (in them which tend) to the edifying of the church.

13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue (in which he cannot edify) pray that he [6] may interpret (i. e. pray so, as to interpret what he prays).

were pious, nor receive any benefit by them, supposing they were so, whilst he understood nothing of them; nor could any pious affections be raised in him by words not understood. To say with Grotius, Sentit in se vim Christi, he perceives the gift of Christ operating in him, if he perceived not the meaning of his own words, is to talk as unintelligibly as he spake; for that can only signify, he knew he had the gift of tongues, which sure could not much edify him who formerly had used that gift, and so could not be ignorant he had that gift. Moreover, doth not the apostle bid him, who speaks with tongues not interpreted, "speak only to himself, and to God?" (ver. 28.) And can he speak to himself more than to others, who understands not himself! Or is it fit that he should speak to God he knows not what? However, it is certain that the apostle not only dislikes, but plainly forbids this way of speaking in the church (ver. 28); and so, by parity of reason, forbids the like way of speaking to others in the church of Rome.

[3] Ver. 5. Ἵνα ἡ ἐκκλησία οἰκοδομὴν λάβῃ, That the church may receive edification.] Hence I gather, that in this unknown tongue he uttered something tending to, and by God designed for, the edification of the church, though by uttering his mystery (ver. 2) in an unknown tongue, he frustrated that design.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἢ ἐν προφητείᾳ, Or in prophesying.] Though prophesying, in this verse, being distinguished from revelation, knowledge, and doctrine, seems only to import the foretelling of something to come, yet doth the apostle, in this and the foregoing chapter, manifestly speak of it in the whole latitude of the word, as comprehending all these other things; as v. g. revelation, so ver. 24, "If all prophesy, and there come in an unbeliever, and one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged by all, and so the secrets of his heart shall be made manifest:" according to that other sense we have given of this gift, ch. xii., that it was that which enabled them to manifest the secret things of men; hence to the prophet is assigned "his revelation," ver. 30. Secondly, γνώσις, here rendered "knowledge," viz. of the mind and will of God: so xiii. 2, "If I have prophecy, and know all mysteries, καὶ πᾶσαν γνῶσιν, and all knowledge." Whence to the prophet belongs λόγος γνώσεως, "the word of knowledge," mentioned xii. 8. And this is the ordinary notion of it, viz. that it imports a gift by which the mind of God, or his will, is, by the divine afflatus, discovered for the good of others. And thirdly, doctrine; whence the prophet is said to speak to the edifying of the church (ver. 3), so that "all may learn" of him, be exhorted, and comforted by him (ver. 3. 31). And prophecy, in the Old Testament, doth often signify a divine afflatus, enabling him who had it to compose hymns or psalms of praise to God (1 Sam. x. 5, 1 Chron. xxv. 1): accordingly the psalm here mentioned (ver. 26), and the singing with the Spirit (ver. 15, 16), are the effects of the prophetical afflatus, by which the Christians of those times "taught and admonished one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs" (Col. iii. 16, Eph. v. 20). And the praying in the Spirit (ver. 15), or in the Holy Ghost (Jude 20), seems to be praying by a like afflatus of the Holy Ghost, helping their infirmities, and teaching them what was proper to be asked for the good of the church (see note on Rom. viii. 26, 27): and therefore though, when they came together, "every man had a psalm, a doctrine, a tongue, a revelation, and interpretation," for the correcting their miscarriages in all these things, the apostle gives only rules concerning tongues and prophesying.

[5] Ver. 11. Βάρβαρος, A barbarian.] It was not only the Greeks that called all other nations barbarians, according to that of the apostle, "I am debtor to the Greek and the barbarian;" in which sense Julius Pollux* reckons up γλῶτταν Ἑλλάδι, καὶ βάρβαρον, "the tongue of the Greeks and of the barbarians;" but almost every nation called strangers, who understood not their language, by that name, as the same Pollux† noteth in these words, τοὺς δὲ βαρβάρους καὶ ξένους εἰκίλουν. So the Jews (upon those words, "When Israel came out of Egypt, and the house of Jacob מֵעַם לֹעֵז, ἐκ λαοῦ βαρβάρου, from a strange people,") say, "All language that is not the holy language is barbarous:" so the Chaldeans‡ styled those who spake not the Chaldee, and the Romans those who spake not Latin. Hence Verres§ is, in Cicero's style, linguâ et natione barbarus, "by language and by nation a barbarian."

[6] Ver. 13. Προσευχέσθω ἵνα διερμηνεύῃ, Let him pray that he may interpret.] Seeing it is evident, from the fourth and twenty-eighth verses, that he who spake with tongues understood the meaning of his own tongue; nor can he be said to have the gift of tongues who only hath the gift of talking he knows not what, as the Phanatici did among the heathens; nor can it be supposed the Spirit of God should assist men in that useless manner: these words cannot be here understood as an exhortation to this linguist, that he should pray that he might understand, and so be able to interpret his own words, which he already could do, had he been as willing as he was able, and had not more regarded the vain ostentation of his gift, than the edification of the church. Some, therefore, give the sense of the words thus: Let him rather pray that he may have the gift of interpretation, than that of tongues; for covet (saith the apostle) the best gifts (xii. 13), seek to excel in those which tend to the edification of the church (ver. 12): now this doth the gift of interpretation more than that of tongues. But I rather choose to interpret them thus: Let him (so) pray (with his gift, as) that he may (by the words used in his prayer, or by explaining it in a known language) interpret and impart to others what the afflatus hath imparted to him, and not out of vain ostentation utter it in a tongue unknown. To strengthen this sense, let it be observed, first, that the apostle here plainly discourseth of speaking with an unknown tongue in prayer, and of praying also by the afflatus of the Spirit, as is apparent from the illative words, "For if I pray in an unknown tongue my spirit prayeth," &c.

14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, [7] my spirit prayeth (i. e. my spiritual gift is exercised), but my understanding is unfruitful (to others).

15 What is it then? (i. e. What then is to be done?) I will pray [8] with the spirit (i. e. with my spiritual gifts), and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also (i. e. so using my spiritual gift in prayer and psalmody in public, as that I may be understood by others).

16 Else when thou shalt bless (i. e. give thanks to God) with the spirit (-ual afflatus not understood by others), how shall he that [9] occupieth the room of the unlearned (i. e. the laic, or the man who only knows his mother-tongue) say Amen (or give his assent) at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?

17 For thou verily givest thanks well (with thy spiritual gift, i. e. piously), but the other is not edified (by it).

18 I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all:

19 Yet in the church (of God) I had rather speak five words with my understanding, (so employed) that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

20 Brethren, be not (like) children in understanding (choosing what pleases you before what profits others): howbeit in (freedom from) malice be ye (as) children, but in understanding be (and act as) men (as persons of maturity of judgment to know what is fitting to be spoken).

21 [10] In the law it is written, (by way of a sign to a disobedient and unbelieving people, thus:) With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord.

22 Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe (and so not to be used in their assemblies), but to them that believe not (they being designed for

Secondly, Observe from Budæus, that the particle οὕτω is sometimes elegantly deficient, of which he gives two instances from Aristotle; to which add these from the New Testament, "As in heaven, καὶ (pro οὕτω καὶ) ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, so also upon earth," Matt. vi. 10; Luke xi. 2, καὶ εἰ ὁ Σατανᾶς, for καὶ οὕτω εἰ, "And so if Satan;" Mark iii. 26, "As my Father sent me, κἀγὼ (for οὕτω κἀγὼ), so send I you;" and with this ellipsis the word runs thus, οὕτω προσευχέσθω ἵνα καὶ, "Let him so pray, as that he also may interpret." Or observe from Noldius and Pasor, that ἵνα signifies adeò ut, "so as that:" so the word was hidden from them, ἵνα μὴ αἴσθωνται αὐτό, "so as that they perceived it not," Luke ix. 45; "He will do greater works than these, ἵνα ὑμεῖς θαυμάζητε, so that you may marvel" at the greatness of them, John v. 20; "Did I purpose according to God, ἵνα ᾖ παρ' ἐμοὶ, so as that there should be with me yea yea, nay nay?" 2 Cor. i. 17; "I rejoiced that you sorrowed according to the flesh, ἵνα, so as that you might be damaged by us in nothing:" so Rev. viii. 12, ix. 29, xiii. 13; and then the words may be rendered thus: "Let him pray, ἵνα διερμηνεύῃ, so as he may interpret."

[7] Ver. 14. Τὸ πνεῦμά μου προσεύχεται, My spirit prayeth.] Here Mr. Clerc asks, "What mortal would have rendered τὸ πνεῦμά μου by my gift?" I answer, Every one who knows the apostle is here speaking of spiritual gifts. And secondly, he not only warrants, but constrains them to do so, by saying, ver. 12, Seeing you are ζηλωταὶ πνευμάτων, "zealous of spiritual gifts;" and ver. 32, πνεύματα προφητῶν, "The spiritual afflatuses of the prophets are subject to the prophets;" and ver. 2, πνεύματι, "He by the spirit speaketh mysteries." And, thirdly, the word πνεῦμα never signifies the mind in all this discourse, or the understanding, that being in the very next verse νοῦς, the word opposed to πνεῦμα, "spirit." He adds, "What intolerable language is it to say, My gift prays!" I answer, Just such intolerable language as "The Spirit intercedeth," Rom. viii. 26; for that is only "The gift of the Spirit intercedeth; and though that may pass for a catachresis, yet to say, My gift is exercised in prayer, or, as ver. 15, "I pray with my gift," is to give the true meaning of Paul's words. When he adds, that "nothing is more ordinary than for the spirit and the body to be opposed to one another:" this is, first, impertinent; here being no opposition betwixt the spirit and the body, but only betwixt the spirit and the mind, i. e. according to Mr. Clerc, betwixt my mind and my mind; and what mortal would have so interpreted τὸ πνεῦμά μου? Secondly, The thing itself is not proved by him; see, saith he, Rom. viii. 23; where yet there is no such opposition at all, but only an assertion that they, "who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, wait for the redemption of the body." Now what mortal would have interpreted these words thus, We that have the first-fruits of the mind groan, waiting for the body opposed to it? see says he, Gal. vi. 15, where again is no opposition betwixt the spirit and the body, but only betwixt the Spirit and the flesh; or rather betwixt walking in the Spirit, that is, according to the conduct of the Holy Spirit, and fulfilling the lusts of the flesh (see 1 Cor. iii. 1. 3, Rom. viii. 4, 5. 13—15). He might more pertinently have cited 1 Cor. vii. 34, James ii. 26.

[8] Ver. 15. Τῷ Πνεύματι, With the Spirit.] I do not think that this phrase, "with the Spirit," relates here to the gift of tongues, but to an afflatus enabling them to pray and sing by the impulse of the Holy Ghost: the uttering what this afflatus suggested, in an unknown tongue they had before received, was the great fault the apostle in this chapter endeavours to correct; the person speaking with an unknown tongue, is ὁ λαλῶν γλώσσῃ· the person speaking with an afflatus, whether mysteries (ver. 2), prayer, or psalmody, is ὁ λαλῶν Πνεύματι, "he that speaketh by the Spirit."

[9] Ver. 16. Ὁ ἀναπληρῶν τὸν τόπον τοῦ ἰδιώτου, Who fills up the place of the idiot.] That is, ὁ λαϊκός, "the laic," say Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact. Buxtorf* informs us, this is a phrase frequent among the Jews: and Maimonides† teacheth, that the word place is used to denote the dignity or estimation of any man, it being frequent with their rabbins to say, "Such a one fills up the place of his fathers" in such a thing, that is, he resembles them. So Epictetus,‡ in his Enchiridion, saith, ἢ φιλοσόφου τάξιν ἐπέχειν ἐεῖ, ἢ ἰδιώτου, "Thou must either hold the place of a philosopher, or of one unlearned:" so that "to fill up the place of an idiot" or unlearned person, is to be one of them, or to be like them in want of understanding of strange tongues. Ridiculous, therefore, are those popish commentators who interpret this of "the clerk of the congregation," there being no such office then, either among Jews or Christians: but "when the minister of the synagogue said prayers, all the people of the synagogue answered Amen after him."§ "It was the custom in the Jewish church," saith Buxtorf,‖ "to say Amen to the blessings or cursings of the priests." To his curses; so the woman, suspected of adultery, was to confirm his imprecations by saying, "Amen, Amen" (Numb. v. 22): so all the people answered "Amen," to the curses pronounced from mount Ebal (Deut. vii. 15. 26); and to the oath and imprecation imposed upon them by Nehemiah (v. 12, 13). To his blessings; so when Ezra blessed the congregation, "All the people answered Amen, Amen" (Neh. viii. 6). And this practice was from them translated to the primitive church.

[10] Ver. 21. Ἐν τῷ νόμῳ γέγραπται, In the law it is written.] All interpreters I have met with refer this to the saying of the prophet Isaiah, xxviii. 11, telling us, it is there mentioned as a miracle shown to the people, that God would send prophets to them "in a language they understood not;" but I find no mention of any miracle there: wherefore it may be noted, that in the law, properly so called, among the curses threatened to them "for a sign and a wonder,"¶ this is one, "that the Lord shall bring against them a nation the more speedy and effectual propagation of the gospel by this gift, among those nations whose languages they understood not): but prophesying (by teaching the doctrines of the New, or expounding the mysteries of the Old Testament) serveth not for them that believe not (that faith, or those scriptures), but for them which believe (them).

23 If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or [11] unbelievers, will they not (be tempted, by hearing you thus speaking to one another in unknown languages, to) say that ye are mad?

24 But if all prophesy (one after another, ver. 31), and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced (or discovered) of all, he is judged (or discerned) of all (that prophesy):

28 [13] But if there be no interpreter (present), let him (that only speaks with tongues) keep silence in the church; and let him (only) speak (mentally) to himself, and to God, (in prayer and thanksgiving, ver. 15, 16.)

29 Let the prophets speak two or three (successively), [14] and let the other (prophets) judge.

In the law it is written, &c.] Jerome, upon Isaiah xxviii. 11, 12, saith, the apostle cites this, not according to the translation of the Septuagint, or of Symmachus, or Theodotion, but from the Hebrew. But Origen* saith, εὗρον τὰ ἰσοδυναμοῦντα τῇ λέξει ταύτῃ ἐν τῇ τοῦ Ἀκύλου ἑρμηνείᾳ κείμενα, "I found in the translation of Aquila words equivalent to those of the apostle here."

[11] Ver. 23. Ἴδιῶται.] Here Grotius notes that the heathens and unbelievers then used to come to the asssemblies of the Christians; and so we read they did, Acts xiii. 44. 48, and whilst they assembled in the Jewish synagogue, it could not be otherwise.

[12] Ver. 25. Τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς καρδίας αὐτοῦ φανερὰ γίνεται, The secrets of his heart are made manifest.] For, as Theophylact notes, ἡ ἀποκάλυψις εἶδός ἐν προφητείᾳ, "revelation is one species of prophecy:" and though it is taken in a restrained sense, and so distinguished from prophecy, ver. 6; yet, ver. 30, it is supposed that revelation belongeth to a prophet; and the doctrine, the revelation, the psalm, ver. 26, do all seem to belong to the prophets; the speaker with tongues, the interpreter of them, and the prophet, being the only persons mentioned in the ensuing words, and in this whole chapter; so that what cannot be ascribed to the one must belong to the other.

[13] Ver. 28. Ἐὰν δὲ μὴ ᾖ διερμηνευτής, σιγάτω, But if there be not an interpreter, let him be silent.] The apostle permits him to use his tongue in the presence of one who had the gift of interpretation of tongues, because then the church was not only edified by the interpretation, but the faith of the hearers was confirmed by the exercise of two miraculous gifts: but the apostle permits him not to be his own interpreter, though he could do it; because his speaking that first in an unknown tongue, which he himself must afterward interpret in a known language, served only for ostentation, not for edification; nor could it be known whether his tongue was supernatural, or acquired only.

[14] Ver. 29. Καὶ οἱ ἄλλοι διακρινέτωσαν, And let the rest discern.] Since it is impossible that the afflatus of the Holy Spirit should suggest any falsehood to him that had it, there can be no ground to judge him that had it, as Grotius† hath well observed upon this place. But, saith Theodoret, as the devil raised up false apostles to oppose the true apostles (1 Tim. ii. 1), so did he also false prophets (2 Pet. ii. 1, 1 John iv. 1), in opposition to those who truly were inspired; and of these, say the Greek interpreters, the true prophets were to judge: or else διακρινέτωσαν, "let them discern" the agreement of what they utter with the dictates of the same Spirit in the Old Testament, "comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (1 Cor. ii. 13). So in the conference, Acts xv., when Peter had given his judgment in that matter, James adds, "With this agree the words of the prophets, as it is written," ver. 15.

[15] Ver. 32. Πνεύματα προφητῶν, The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.] The common interpretation of these words, that the spirits of the true prophets are subject to the judgment, examination, and regulation of other prophets, seems not agreeable to the apostle's affirmation, that "he that is spiritual is judged of none," 1 Cor. ii. 13. 15, nor is there any ground for judging his doctrine who speaks by the impulse of the Holy Ghost; nor doth the apostle say, the spirits of the prophets ought to be, but ὑποτάσσεται, actually are subject to the prophets. I prefer therefore the interpretation of Œcumenius* and Theophylact, that this is spoken in opposition to the heathen prophets; for the prophets among the Greeks, receiving an afflatus from the evil spirit, could not be silent if they would; but it was not so with the holy prophets: "They had it in their power to speak, or to be silent; and to this the apostle refers, by saying, The spirits of the prophets, that is, their spiritual gifts, are subject to the prophets; that is, it is in their power to restrain them," and consequently they may prophesy the one after the other. And upon this account the church rejected the ecstatic prophets of the Montanists, that they had an ungovernable impetus; for, say they, "They can show no truly inspired prophet in the Old or New Testament who was moved after this manner."† Moreover, it is the opinion of persons eminently learned and judicious, that in Corinth, and some other churches, there were then no settled pastors to perform the public offices, but they were all performed by prophets and by gifted men, excited to that work in the assembly, Christ being thus in the midst first to be silent;) for God is not the author [16] of confusion (which yet would follow upon all the prophets speaking together, so that one should confound the other), but of peace, as (may be seen by the regular exercise of these gifts) in all churches of the saints.

34 [17] Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak (by way of teaching or prophesying, but only by joining with the church in prayer and psalmody); but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law (Gen. iii. 16).

35 And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame (i. e. a thing indecent) for women [18] to speak in the church.

36 (And whereas in this matter you think fit to practise contrary to all the churches of the saints, even those in Judea, I ask,) What? came the word of God out from you (to all other churches)? or came it unto you only (and not to other churches, that you thus differ in your practice from them)?

of them (Matt. xviii. 20), according to his promise. And this they judge more probable touching the church of Corinth, because there seems no order to be observed among them, and no subjection of their prophets to any ruler of the church; no direction of the sentence to them, when the incestuous person was to be "delivered up to Satan," or when he was to be absolved: but all seems to be done by the immediate authority of Paul. They also, from this chapter, do observe, that whereas all the public offices then performed in the church were prayers and psalmody, expounding or preaching the word, and thanksgiving, all these are here ascribed to men endowed with these spiritual gifts; for that, when they came together, some of them prayed, others composed sacred hymns by their spiritual gifts, we plainly read, ver. 15, that their prophets did then teach for edification, instruction, and comfort, ver. 3. 31; that they did also εὐλογεῖν "bless," and εὐχαριστεῖν "give thanks," we learn from ver. 16, 17; but that all or any of these things were done by stated pastors, we never read in these epistles: now if this were so, the occasional prophets might be subject to the standing prophets, mentioned ch. xii., and thus these words may be interpreted by them, who like not the exposition given in the paraphrase.

[16] Ver. 33. Ἀκαταστασίας, Of confusion.] This also confirms the interpretation given of the preceding words; for the prophesying of many together would necessarily breed confusion; whereas the neglect of judging of their prophecies could only be supposed to breed error.

[17] Ver. 34. Αἱ γυναῖκες ὑμῶν, Let your women be silent in the church.] In that of Corinth the women not only prophesied in the church, but they did it with the head uncovered, 1 Cor. xi. 5, the latter indecency he corrects there and the first here (see 1 Tim. ii. 12).

[18] Ver. 35. Ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ λαλεῖν, To speak in the church.] So the Hebrew canon saith,* "A woman must not read in the synagogue for the honour due to that assembly:" and the heathens declared it indecent for a woman δημηγορεῖν, "to speak publicly" (Stob. serm. 72, p. 443, f f f).

[19] Ver. 40. Εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν, Decently and in order.] This order, saith Theodoret, he had taught in the words foregoing, "Let all things be decently:" not like children (ver. 20), not so as to give occasion to others to say you are mad (ver. 23), not so as to breed confusion (ver. 33), not indecently by women speaking in the church (ver. 34, 35); "in order," that is, one after another; or by course (ver. 27. 31), see Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, descanting upon these words to this effect.

CHAPTER XV.

1 Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand (Gr. have stood);

2 [1] By which also ye are (in the way to be) saved, if ye keep in memory what (i. e. retain the gospel as) I preached (it) unto you, (which you will do) unless ye have believed in vain.

3 (I declare, I say, the gospel which I preached;) For I delivered unto you first of all (or among the principal doctrines of faith) that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures;

4 And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures:

5 And that he was seen (after his resurrection) of Cephas (Luke xxiv. 34), then [2] of the twelve (ver. 36, John xx. 19. 26):

6 (And, that you may not depend upon their testimony only,) After that, he was seen of above [3] five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XV.

[1] Ver. 2. Δι' οὗ καὶ σώζεσθε, By which also ye are saved.] They who by embracing the Christian faith were brought into that way which leadeth to salvation, and in which, if they persevered, they would assuredly be saved, are styled in scripture, οἱ σωζόμενοι, "the saved," Acts ii. 47, 1 Cor. i. 28, and are said σώζεσθαι, "to be saved," Rom. viii. 24, 2 Tim. i. 9, 1 Pet. iii. 21 (see note on Eph. ii. 5. 8, and on Tit. iii. 5), so here it signifies, you are at present in a state of salvation, and will assuredly enjoy it, if you retain and live suitably to the faith delivered to you.

[2] Ver. 5. Τοῖς δώδεκα, Of the twelve.] i. e. Of the society of the apostles, consisting formerly of twelve persons, and therefore so called still (John xx. 24), though in strictness of speech they were but eleven when Thomas was with them, and ten in his absence (Matt. xxviii. 16, Luke xxiv. 33).

[3] Ver. 6. Πεντακοσίοις ἀδελφοῖς, To five hundred brethren;] Of whom he was seen in Galilee, where he had many disciples; for before his resurrection he told his disciples that, being risen, he would go before them into Galilee (Matt. xxvi. 32): after his resurrection the angel sent this message to them, "Behold, he goes before you into Galilee, there you shall see him, as he said unto you" (Mark xvi. 7). Now it may reasonably be thought that the eleven, who went themselves into Galilee to the mountain which Jesus had appointed, even after they had seen him at Jerusalem (Luke xxiv. 33. 36), would acquaint the seventy, and others who believed in Jesus, where it was he appointed to be seen of them; and then, no doubt, their curiosity, as well as their affection to him, would induce them to repair to the place.

remain unto this present (day to testify it), but some are fallen asleep.

7 After that, he was seen of [4] James; then of all the apostles (at his ascension).

8 And last of all he was seen of me also (Acts ix. 17), [5] as of one born out of due time (or shape).

9 For I am the least of the apostles, (and one) that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God.

10 But by the grace (and favour) of God (notwithstanding) I am what (now) I am: and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet (it is) not I, but the grace of God which was with me (to which the fruit of all my labour is to be ascribed).

11 Therefore whether it were I or they (who preach the gospel), so we preach, and so ye (also) believed.

12 Now if Christ be (so) preached that (all who do so unanimously affirm) he rose from the dead, [6] how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

13 But (or for) if (it be so that) there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen:

14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching (in) vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are (then) found false witnesses of God; because [7] we have testified of (or by) God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not (at all).

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins (not justified nor absolved from them, seeing he died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, Rom. iv. 21).

18 Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ (and suffered for his name) are perished (so as never to rise up out of that sleep, and so are truly miserable).

Now, that they who had believed in Jesus were very many, will be evident, if we consider how often it is said in the gospel, that "many believed on his name," John ii. 23, vii. 31, viii. 10, x. 42, and that "great multitudes believed on him," John xii. 42, iv. 1; that "many of the rulers believed on him," that "he baptized more disciples than John," and that the pharisees complained that "the world was gone after him." If you say we only read of the eleven going to Galilee, Matt. xxviii. 16, I answer, that others might go with them, though no mention be made of them; or that the rest might be inhabitants of Galilee, where most of Christ's disciples dwelt. If you still object, that "the number of the names" of Christ's disciples, after his ascension, are reckoned only "one hundred and twenty," Acts i. 15, it is answered by Dr. Lightfoot, that the number of one hundred and twenty are not to be accounted the whole number of believers at that time, but only the number of those who had followed Christ continually, ver. 21; to be sure they were not all the disciples in Judea, but only in Jerusalem.

That this appearance of Christ to them was before his ascension, is evident, because this was in Galilee (Luke xxiv. 50), and, saith tradition, on mount Tabor; his ascension was nigh to Jerusalem from the mount of Olives (Acts i. 12); and Christ and his angel giving them such timely notice of his going before them to the place, it is probable it was some considerable time before his ascension.

As for the note of some, that Christ was seen of these "five hundred brethren" in the air, beause the Greek word is ἐπάνω, "upwards," it seems very light; for that word joined with numbers still signifies plusquam or more than, as doth our English word upwards, and the Hebrew מִמַּעְלָה: so Mark xiv. 5, ἐπάνω τριακοσίων ἐναρίων, is "more than three hundred pieces of silver;" ἀπὸ πέντε καὶ εἰκοσαετοῦς καὶ ἐπάνω, "from five and twenty years and upwards," Numb. iv. 3. 23. 30. 35. 39. 43. 47, viii. 25; ἀπὸ εἰκοσαετοῦς καὶ ἐπάνω, "from twenty years and upwards," Numb. i. 3. 20. 22. 24. 26. 28, xiv. 29, 1 Chron. xxiii. 24, 2 Chron. xxxi. 17, Ezra iii. 8; ἀπὸ μηνιαίου καὶ ἐπάνω, "from a month and upwards," Numb. iii. 15. 22. 28. 34. 39. 43, xxvi. 62.

[4] Ver. 7. Ἰακώβῳ, Of James,] The Just, the brother of the Lord, saith the tradition of the church, and the gospel of the Nazarenes (see Dr. Hammond, and Jerome in Catal. Script. Eccles.).

[5] Ver. 8. Ὡσπερεὶ τῷ ἐκτρώματι, As of one born out of due time.] Ἔκτρωμα, say Hesychius, Phrynicus, and Phavorinus, is παιδίον νεκρὸν ἄωρον, "a dead child born out of due time; ἐκβολὴ γυναικός, one whom the woman casts forth." St. Paul therefore having not seen Christ, of whom he was to testify, till after his conversion, and our Lord's ascension, as the rest of the apostles had (John xv. 27, Acts i. 21, 22), speaks of himself as a witness "born out of due time."

[6] Ver. 12. Πῶς λέγουσί τινες ἐν ὑμῖν, How say some among you?] That there were some in the apostle's time who taught that the resurrection was past already, we learn from 2 Tim. ii. 18, but that they were Jews, who of sadducees had embraced the Christian religion, as Mr. Le Clerc asserts,* I find no reason to believe: much less, that the false apostle or apostles, so styled by St. Paul, not in his First but Second Epistle to the Corinthians, should be of the Jewish sadducees; for they being the great opposers of Christ's resurrection (Acts iv. 1, 2), and the great adversaries of St. Paul, upon this very account, that he testified that Christ was risen from the dead (Acts xxiii. 6. 8), and this doctrine being of so great importance, that the denying of it rendered both the preaching of the apostles and the faith of their hearers vain (ver. 14 of this chapter): sure the apostle could not say of such men, "Are they the ministers of Christ? I am more;" so 2 Cor. xi. 23; or that they transformed themselves "into the apostles of Christ" (ver. 13).

The Gnostics* taught not that the resurrection was past already, but only that the flesh was not fit to rise, and that it was incapable of salvation and incorruption, and therefore they are generally said by the ancients to deny the resurrection, but none of them insinuate that it was past already. The Marcionites† are by Clemens Alexandrinus said to have held this doctrine, and to have renounced matrimony, because in the resurrection (saith Christ) they do not marry. But Marcion began his heresy in the second century, and therefore could not infect the church of Corinth with it in Paul's time. Menander indeed taught, that they who received his baptism were made partakers of the resurrection by it, and that they should not die; and he, according to many of the ancients, was contemporary with Paul (see note on 2 Tim. ii. 18): but haply Paul refers here to none of these, but only to the philosophers among them, as Chrysostom thinks; for Corinth being an eminent city of Achaia, where the philosophers and wise men of the world abounded, who looked upon the resurrection of the flesh as a thing both impossible and absurd (see here note on ver. 35), and placed their future happiness in their exemption from the clog and prison of the body, they might put a new construction on the doctrine of the resurrection, saying it only did import a renovation of our manners, or a resurrection from the death of sin unto a life of righteousness, and so it was performed already in that baptism in which we are raised with Christ from the dead (Col. ii. 12).

[7] Ver. 15. Ἐμαρτυρήσαμεν κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, We have testified of God.] It being very rare that κατὰ with a genitive case signifies de, i. e. of, these words may be rendered per Deum, by God; as "Because he could swear κατ' οὐδενὸς μείζονος, by none greater, he hath sworn καθ' ἑαυτοῦ by himself," Heb. vi. 13, and ver. 16, "Men swear κατὰ τοῦ μείζονος, by a greater:" so Matt. xxvi. 63, "I adjure thee κατὰ Θεοῦ, by God:" so in the Old Testament, "The Lord hath sworn καθ' ἑαυτοῦ, by himself," or, "I have sworn κατ' ἐμαυτοῦ, by myself," Isa. xlv. 23, Jer. xlix. 13, Amos vi. 6: so 1 Kings ii. 23, Solomon swears κατὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, "by the Lord;" and iii. 43, "The oath of the Lord." κατὰ σοῦ, made by the Septuagint "Them that swore κατὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, by the Lord, κατὰ by Malcham" (see Isa. lxii. 8, Amos iv. 2, viii. 7. 14). And then 19 (For) [8] if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we (Christian sufferers) are of all men most miserable.

20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept, (who therefore shall follow after him thus risen, as the whole harvest follows the first-fruits, ver. 23.)

21 For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead (the wisdom of God so ordering it, that the same nature which had lost life and immortality should regain it).

22 For as in (the man) Adam (and for his sin in eating the forbidden fruit) all (men proceeding naturally from him) die, even so [9] in (and by the man) Christ shall all (partakers of his nature and Spirit) be made alive.

23 But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's [10] at his coming (to judgment).

24 Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up (Gr. deliver up) the (mediatory) kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all (other) rule and all authority and power (both of men and devils which opposed his church.

25 Which kingdom till then he cannot deliver up;)For he must reign (according to the promise, Ps. cx. 1), till he (who made this promise) hath put all enemies under his feet.

26 The last enemy that shall be destroyed (by him) is death.

27 For he (namely the Father) hath (saith the psalmist) put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted (from this subjection), which did put all things under him (see note on Heb. ii. 8).

28 And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself (lay down his kingly office in governing his church, and as a man) be subject unto him that put all things under him, [11] that God (the

the sense runs thus: We have pretended to be μάρτυρες αὐτοῦ, God's witnesses in this matter (Acts v. 32), and by the power of miracles, and of the Holy Ghost, derived from him, to bear witness to the resurrection of Christ; and so must be false witnesses of God, if he hath not raised him from the dead (see here Examen Millii).

[8] Ver. 19. Εἰ ἐν τῇ ζωῇ ταύτῃ, If in this life only we have hope.] The apostle seems not here to say that if there should be no resurrection of the body the Christian could have only hope in this life; for if the soul be immortal, and may be happy after its separation from the body, this seems not to follow: but he argues thus, If Christ is not risen for our justification, we are yet under the guilt of sin (ver. 17), and if so, both soul and body must perish after death (ver. 18), and then the hope of Christians must terminate with this life, which being more especially to them a life of misery, by reason of the sufferings to which their faith doth here expose them, they would of all men be most miserable.

[9] Ver. 22. Ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, In Christ.] The opinion of the Jews was this, that the Messias was "the second Adam who should raise the dead:" his name, say they,* is called Jinnon, Ps. lxxii. 17, for "he shall raise them that sleep in the dust." And the last man, or Adam, is the Messiah,† who "shall be above Moses, and above the ministering angels: he shall take away the old sin from whence death came, and in his days shall be the resurrection of the dead: and this God intended in the creation of Adam, that he should be immortal, but sin brought death upon him, therefore the divine intention, which was not fulfilled in the first Adam, was fulfilled in the King Messiah." Thus is the doctrine of the church delivered by Irenæus,‡ that Christ took our nature upon him, and suffered death in it; that "as, by man vanquished, death fell upon all mankind, so, by man conquering, we may ascend to life; that, whereas we were all dead in the animal Adam, we may be quickened in the spiritual."

[10] Ver. 23. Ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ αὐτοῦ, At his coming.] This chapter contains many arguments against the doctrine of the resurrection of some saints before the rest, to reign with Christ on earth a thousand years: for (1.) from the words, "every man in his own order," it might have reasonably been expected, that some mention should have been made, as of "Christ the first-fruits," so of the first and second resurrection; but yet we see that when the apostle is professedly speaking of the order in which we shall arise, he has nothing to say of this first resurrection, which, it seems, is to happen a thousand years before the general resurrection; and nothing of a first or second advent of our Lord; one to reign on earth a thousand years, a second to judge all the world; and yet this double advent is as necessary as is Christ's reign on earth.

Moreover, the end and the delivery up of this kingdom are here made contemporary with his advent; and the resurrection of all that are Christ's is to be at this very advent: but how can he deliver up his kingdom, and yet reign on earth a thousand years? In a word, if all that are his must be raised at his coming to the final judgment, then none before that coming, and then they must be all raised together, not some a thousand years before the rest.

[11] Ver. 28. Ἵνα ᾖ ὁ Θεὸς πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν, That God may be all in all.] He saith not that the Father, mentioned ver. 24, but that "God may be all in all," and so he seems to lead us to that interpretation of the Godhead which comprehends Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and then the import of the phrase, "That God may be all in all," will be this: That the Godhead may govern all things immediately by himself, without the intervention of a Mediator between him and us, to exact our obedience in his name, and convey to us his favours and rewards, we being then to tender all our duty immediately to him, and derive all our happiness immediately from him. So that as now Christ, Theanthropos, God-man, is all in all (Col. iii. 11), because the Father hath put all things into his hands, does all things, and governs all things, by him; when this economy ceases, the Godhead alone will be all in all, as governing and influencing all things by himself immediately.

Moreover, the Jews say, that "the kingdom of the Messiah shall return to its first Author,"* and so saith the apostle here; for, though it shall have no such end as the preceding monarchies had (Luke i. 32, 33), by giving place to a succeeding kingdom; for till the world last, οὐ παρελεύσεται, "it shall not pass away, or be dissolved by any other kingdom" (Dan. vii. 14), but shall be an eternal kingdom, in the sense in which he is a "priest for ever," and hath τὴν ἱερωσύνην ἀπαράβατον, "a priesthood that doth not pass away" (Heb. vii. 17. 24, 25), and so he is able to intercede for ever for us; yet, as that priesthood must needs cease when the subject of it ceaseth, and he hath none to intercede for, so must his kingly office cease when all his friends have that eternal life conferred upon them for which this power was committed to him (John xvii. 2), and all his enemies are become his footstool (Ps. cx. 1), when there is no more a house of Jacob to reign over, or a throne of David to sit on (Luke i. 32, 33, Rev. xi. 15); and the whole office of a Mediator must then cease, when God and man are made completely and indissolubly one.

For farther explication of this matter, let it be observed:

First, That this mediatory kingdom was given to our Lord by the Father; for "he hath put all things in subjection to him" (ver. 27), and that after his resurrection; for it was given as the reward of his sufferings, and so could not be given till they were accomplished: "he humbled himself, and became obedient to the death, even to the death of the cross; wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name, which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 8. 10, 11). Accordingly, after his resurrection, he speaks to his disciples thus, "All power is given to me in heaven and in earth," Matt. xxviii. 18. But why this reward should not cease when the work is done; why, v. g. his dominion over death should not cease when death is destroyed; his power of giving eternal life, or judging, when all are judged, and none are left to be crowned; I confess I do not understand.

2. Seeing the human nature only suffered, and seeing the divine nature is capable of no such exaltation, or new dominion, it is certain that this kingdom could be given to Christ only according to his human nature; for though the Godhead could alone enable him to execute his kingly office; yet was he thus exalted, this power and judgment was conferred upon him "because he was the Son of man" (John v. 27). He intercedeth still in heaven by virtue of his blood; all favours are granted to the church through him, and God will judge the world by the man Christ Jesus.

3. During this reign of Christ, God the Father immediately "judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son, that all men might honour the Son (by owning his authority) even as they honoured the Father" (John v. 22, 23), by owning his authority over them. He made him Lord of all things, to punish and reward according to his wisdom, will, and pleasure: and so his human nature, or Christ as man, though subject to the Father, as his viceroy, acting by the authority of him who "put all things into his hands," and "set him over the works of his hands" (Heb. ii. 7, 8), and doing all "to the glory of God the Father," yet seems not now to be in the same order of subjection to the Father as are other creatures, i. e. so as to act by his immediate command in all particular transactions, as the holy angels do, "obeying his commands, and hearkening to the voice of his word" (Ps. ciii. 20). They are all "ministering spirits" (Heb. i. 13, 14), but he is "sat down at the right hand of God" in full possession of his mediatory kingdom. Whilst he continued on earth, and acted as a prophet sent from God, he always owned that he could "do nothing of himself, but as the Father gave him commandment, so he did, and so he spake" (John v. 30, viii. 38, xii. 49): but, being once exalted to be "Lord of all things," he acteth as a Lord in all things which relate to his kingly office over his church, giving laws to all, as being Lord of all, and rewarding and punishing according to his will.

4. The exercise of his authority he shall then lay down, when all things are subdued to him, no other kingdom or dominion being to be exercised in the celestial state, but what is essential to the whole Godhead: and though he shall ever so far reign, as to be still "at the right hand of God," highly exalted in honour, dignity, and beatitude; and to have still religious respect and veneration from all saints who then are to reign with him (2 Tim. ii. 12), and be owned by them as their king; and though the effects of his kingly power shall continue for ever, his enemies being destroyed, and his saints reigning in bliss for ever; yet the exercise of that kingly power shall then cease, and he as man shall be then subject to the Father, as other saints and angels will be; that so as Christ before was "all in all" (Col. iii. 13), with reference to his church, and from "his fullness did they all receive," so now the Godhead may be all in all, and fill all things immediately by himself. This is only my conjecture of the sense of this obscure place, from which, upon better information, I shall willingly recede.

Ver. 28. Τότε καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ υἱός.] The word υἱὸς crept in, saith Dr. Mills, from the margin: see this confuted by full authority, Examen Millii.

[12] Ver. 29. Οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, Who are baptized for the dead.] i. e. For that Jesus, who, according to their doctrine, must be still dead. To strengthen this exposition, let it be noted,

First, That it is absolutely certain that all who received Christian baptism were baptized in the name of Jesus; but it is very uncertain whether any in the apostle's time were baptized for them who died without baptism, or to fill up the place of those Christians who died after baptism: there is no intimation of any such thing in scripture, or in primitive antiquity.

Secondly, That the apostle doth not say, What do they that baptize for the dead? but τί ποιήσουσιν οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι, "What will they do who are baptized" already, if the dead rise not again? τί καὶ βαπτίζονται, "Why are they also baptized for the dead?" We who believe otherwise of him, and preach ἐν τῷ Ἰησοῦ, by this raised Jesus, the resurrection from the dead (Acts iv. 2), may well be baptized in the name of Christ; but why are they so, who believe him dead? what will they do? what motive can they have to stand to their baptismal covenant, and own a dead man as their Lord and Saviour? what inducement can they have to continue faithful to him to the end, but this, that, "if they suffer, they shall also reign together with him?" what will they do for comfort against the fear of death, if, when they fall asleep, they perish, and shall not rise again? must they not be as well the worst of fools as the most miserable of men, to suffer thus for a dead man, who could not help himself, and therefore is not likely to give them any help in life, or hope in death?

Thirdly, That ὑπὲρ often signifies in gratiam, on the account, or for the sake: so Rom. i. 5, "We have received grace and apostleship, &c., ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος αὐτοῦ, for his name's sake;" Eph. iii. 13, "I desire that you faint not at my tribulations, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, which I suffer for your sake;" Phil. i. 29, "To you it is given ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, for the sake of Christ, not only to suffer;" Col. iii. 24, ὑπὲρ τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ, "For the sake of his body;" 2 Thess. i. 5, "That you may be accounted worthy of the kingdom of God, ὑπὲρ ἧς πάσχετε, for the sake of which ye also suffer." See more examples, both sacred and profane, in Schmidius on the place, and Dr. Edwards in his preface to the Authority, &c. of the Holy Scripture.

Fourthly, Observe that οἱ νεκροὶ is used in scripture, when speaking of one single person. Thus, when Christ had raised the widow's son, he bids John's disciples tell him that νεκροὶ, "the dead are raised," Luke vii. 15. 22, and so here, ver. 12, 13, "If there be no ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν, resurrection of (one single person from) the dead, then is not Christ risen:" yea, the resurrection νεκρῶν, "of the dead" in general is thrice mentioned by this apostle, when speaking of the resurrection of Christ alone: thus, when he saith, "God will judge the world by Christ, of which he hath given us a demonstration, having raised him ἐκ νεκρῶν, from the dead," Acts xvii. 30, 31, it follows, that "when they heard him asserting the resurrection of the dead, ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν, they mocked;" whereas he had only asserted the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Thus Paul saith twice, περὶ καὶ ἐλπίδος ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν, "For the hope and resurrection of the dead, I am called in question," Acts xxiii. 6, xxiv. 21; and yet he was not called in question about the resurrection of the dead in general, for that the pharisees believed as well as he, but only "concerning one Jesus who was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive" (Acts xxv. 19), or risen from the dead. And so the apostle saith, Christ was declared to be the Son of God with power, ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν, "by his rising from the dead," Rom. i. 4, and here, "If Christ be risen, how say some among you, that ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν οὐκ ἔστιν, there is no resurrection of the dead?" And this import of the phrase seems to be confirmed by the word ὅλως, viz. If it be wholly and entirely true of all that are dead, that they rise not, and so Christ is not risen, what avails it any that they are baptized for the dead?

Ἐπεὶ τί ποιήσουσιν οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι ὑπὲρ νεκρῶν, Were it not so, what will they do who are baptized for the dead?] Here which I have (common with you under all our sufferings, Rom. v. 3) in Christ Jesus our Lord, I (run the hazard to) die daily (or, by that rejoicing I have in you, as my children and the fruits of my labours in Christ, 1 Cor. ix. 16, 2 Cor. i. 14, vii. 4, ix. 2, Phil. ii. 16, 1 Thess. ii. 19).

32 If [13] after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? (it will be then more reasonable to say,) let us eat and drink; for to morrow we die (Isa. xxii. 13).

33 (But) Be not deceived (with such discourses, rather

Mr. Dodwell refers to the custom mentioned by Epiphanius, that some heretics, when any who professed Christianity died without baptism, baptized others in their stead; whereas the words are only capable of these two interpretations, either that of the ancients,* "Why are they baptized for the resurrection of the dead?" that is, in expectation and belief of that fundamental article of the Christian faith? Or, why are they baptized for, or on the account of, that Jesus who is dead; and, say they, is not risen from the dead? which is the sense I have given of these words. To make this evident, and show the vanity of the interpretation which Mr. Dodwell hath embraced, let it be noted,

First, That the conjunctive particle, ἐπεὶ, as Phavorinus and Budæus have observed, signifies εἰ δὲ μὴ, alioquin, quod si non; "if it be otherwise," or, "were it not so:" thus it is used by the apostle ten several times, Rom. iii. 6, ἐπεὶ, "If it be not so, that God is righteous, how shall he judge the world?" xi. 6, ἐπεὶ, "If it were otherwise, grace would not be grace; ἐπεὶ, and were it otherwise, works would not be works;" and ver. 22, ἐπεὶ, "Otherwise thou shalt be cut off;" 1 Cor. xii. 14, ἐπεὶ, "Were it not so, your children would be unclean;" xiv. 16, ἐπεὶ ἐὰν, "Otherwise, when thou blessest in the Spirit, how shall the unlearned say, Amen?" Heb. ix. 17, ἐπεὶ, "Otherwise his will is of no force;" and ver. 26, ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἂν ἐπαύσαντο, "Otherwise they would not have ceased to be offered" (which by the way is a probable inducement to believe that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by Paul; this conjunction being not once used in this sense by the evangelists, or in the other epistles): now hence it clearly follows, that this conjunction must contain an inference from what was said before, viz. that "Christ was risen as the first-fruits of them that slept," and were to be raised by him from that sleep, and was to reign till he had vanquished their last enemy death; for (saith the apostle) if this were not so, that is, if Christ were not risen, or, being risen, were not to reign till he had overcome death, and so had raised us also from it; why are men baptized ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, for a dead Jesus, or in hopes of a resurrection by him from the dead? So that one of these two senses of this dark passage must obtain.

Secondly, Observe, that the apostle's question runs not thus, Why do they baptize others for the dead? or, Why are others baptized in their stead? but, τί ποιήσουσιν, "What will they do who are baptized?" Which question relating to the deportment of those who undergo this baptism, and not at all to them for whose sakes they do it, excludes any relation of these words to that pretended practice; for, if it was done by any, it was not with relation to their own deportment, who were living, but with relation to the dead. Moreover, the three questions, "Why are they baptized for the dead?" or, "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour?" or, "What advantageth it me, if I have fought with beasts at Ephesus?" seem plainly to relate to the same matter, and therefore must all relate to the deportment of the living under the evils and persecutions which Christians suffered in this present life, and be to this effect: Why are they who say, Christ is not risen, and therefore can expect no resurrection from him, baptized in his name, or in expectation of this benefit from him? What will they do in times of persecution? What inducement can they have to stand to their baptismal covenant, and own a dead man as their Lord and Saviour?

Add to this, that though Tertullian,† by saying, Si autem et baptizantur quidam pro mortuis, supposes such a thing might be done by some, yet he neither mentions time nor persons. Epiphanius,‡ in the fourth century, saith they had a tradition concerning some heretics in Asia and Galatia, ὡς τινῶν μὲν παρ' αὐτοῖς προῃθανόντων τελευτῆσαι ἀνεὺ βαπτίσματος, ἄλλους δὲ ἀντ' αὐτῶν εἰς ὄνομα ἐκείνων βαπτίζεσθαι, "that some among them being prevented by death from receiving baptism, others of them were baptized in their names; καὶ τούτου ἕνεκα ἡ παράδοσις ἡ ἐλθοῦσα παρ' ἡμᾶς φησὶ τὸν αὐτὸν ἅγιον ἀπόστολον εἰρηκέναι εἰ ὅλως, &c., and that he had received it by tradition, that upon this account the apostle said, If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for the dead?" But as he is the only person who speaks of this tradition, so he is guilty of a manifest contradiction in his relation of it: for having told us that the heretics, who practised thus, owned indeed the resurrection of our Lord; which saith he, the Corinthians denied, and therefore were not of this sect; but yet said, νεκροὺς δὲ οὐκ ἐγείρεσθαι, that the dead were not to be raised, and so denied the resurrection of the dead; yet he adds, that they used this practice, ὑπὲρ τοῦ μὴ ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσει ἐναστάντας αὐτοὺς δίκην δοῦναι τιμωρίας βάπτισμα μὴ εἰληφότας, "that they who died without baptism might not, at the resurrection, be punished for want of baptism." Chrysostom and Theophylact say that the Marcionites, when any of their sect died without baptism, put a live man under the bed in which the dead man lay, and then asked the dead, whether he would be baptized; and the man under the bed answering, Yes, they baptized the dead man; εἶτα ἐγκαλούμενοι, and, being accused of this ridiculous practice, they pleaded that the apostle spake of some who were baptized for the dead, τὸ δὲ οὐκ οὕτως ἔχει, "whereas he said no such matter, but only said, If the dead rise not, why are they baptized for the resurrection of the dead?" They therefore knew of no such practice in the apostle's time, or of any tradition relating to it: and certain it is, the apostle could not relate unto this practice of the Marcionites, seeing Marcion began his heresy in the second century, and so long after the writing of this epistle. In a word, if they who are supposed to practise thus, believed the resurrection, they could not be concerned in the apostle's argument against them who did not believe; if they did not believe the resurrection of the body, when once dead, it cannot be imagined, why they should be concerned to baptize a dead body, or any other body for it. See the text defended against the surmises of Dr. Mills, Examen Millii, ibid.

[13] Ver. 32. Κατ' ἄνθρωπον, After the manner of men.] i. e. After the usual manner of heathens. That St. Paul thus fought with beasts indeed, and they would not touch him, they, saith Nicephorus,* who writ the life of this apostle do affirm. Theodoret seems plainly to hint the same thing in these words, "In human opinion I was made the food of beasts, but I was wonderfully preserved from them:"† and this sense will appear more probable,

1. From the phrase κατ' ἄνθρωπον, which signifies, as men used to do, but never according to men's purposes, or, to speak after the manner of men (see the note on 1 Cor. ix. 8).

2. From the place here particularly mentioned, Ephesus, which cannot refer to the tumult there caused by Demetrius, for the apostle suffered nothing in it. Had he intended a combat with metaphorical beasts, or savage men, that at Lystra, where he was stoned and left for dead (Acts xiv. 19), had been more properly mentioned; see the note on 2 Cor. i. 8—10, where he speaks of such troubles that befell him in Asia, as made him to "despair even of life;" though as we read nothing in the Acts of this fight with beasts, so we read nothing of that trouble. It is therefore no objection against this interpretation, that this fight with beasts is not recorded by Luke, or that Paul speaks not expressly of it in the catalogue of his afflictions, 2 Cor. xi.: it is suffiicient that there he tells us, he was "in deaths often" (ver. 23).

34 Awake to righteousness, and sin not; (which advertisement is very needful,) for some have not the knowledge of (that righteousness of) God (which doth oblige him to render to men according to their works, 2 Thess. i. 6, 7, Heb. vi. 10): I speak this to your shame.

35 But some man will (yet) say, How are the dead raised up (again)? [11] and with what (kind of) body do they come?

36 Thou fool, (who makest an inquiry about a matter of which thou hast an instance in the very seed thou sowest, for) that which thou sowest is not quickened, except (first) it die (and lie buried in the earth):

37 And (again) that which thou sowest, (when) thou sowest (it is) not that body that shall be (again produced), but [15] bare (or naked) grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain:

38 But God giveth it a body (clothed) as it hath pleased him, and (yet) to every seed (he giveth with the clothing) his own (kind of) body.

39 (And as) All flesh is not the same (kind of) flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another (kind of) flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

40 (And as there is a like difference in the qualities of bodies; for) There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

41 (And as in the celestial bodies) There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

42 So also is (it as to) the resurrection of the dead, (the body raised being in quality much different from the earthly body we at present have; for) it is sown in corruption (frail, mortal, subject to death and putrefaction); it is raised in incorruption (not subject any more to death or dissolution):

43 It is sown in dishonour (with some dishonourable parts, 1 Cor. xii. 23, a vile body, Phil. iii. 21, subject to filth and deformity); it is raised in glory (in clarity and splendour, shining like the sun, Matt. xiii. 43, and like Christ's glorious body, Phil. iii. 21, free from all defect or deformity of its members, or from any dishonourable parts, 1 Cor. vi. 13): it is sown in weakness (subject to weakness by labour, to decays by age, to impotency and wasting by diseases); it is raised in power (nimble, strong, active, and that without reniteny, or molestation, grief, pain, or lassitude):

44 It is sown a natural (Gr. [16] an animal) body (having multiplicity of organs, muscles, tendons, arteries,

If this sense be not liked, you may interpret κατ' ἄνθρωπον, according to the intention of men, it being the intention of the men of Asia in that tumult, to deal so with Paul's companions, and much more with him, had not his friends dissuaded him from entering into the theatre (see the note on Acts xix. 29); and note also, that cruel and bloody-minded men are often represented under this metaphor of beasts: so Ignatius,* when he was carried from Syria to Rome, under a band of soldiers (who, saith he, are the worse for the kindness I show to them), he saith, ἀπὸ Συρίας μέχρι Ῥώμης θηριομαχῶ, "From Syria to Rome I fight with beasts." And Heraclitus† the Ephesian saith, Ephesiorum cives conversos esse in bestias, "The Ephesians were turned into beasts, because they slew one another."

[11] Ver. 35. Ποίῳ σώματι, With what kind of body?] This was the question of the philosophers,‡ whose chief objection against the resurrection of the flesh, and of the body, was this; That the body was§ "the prison and the sepulchre of the soul," and that it was her punishment to be tied to it; that the body was "the great hinderance to the knowledge of the truth;" and that we could not be truly happy till by death we were delivered from it: it was thereby judged by them, not only an impossible thing, but even an unjust, unworthy thing, for God to raise these bodies to be united to those souls, whose happiness consisted in being delivered from the body, and whose punishment it was to be confined to it; that being according to their philosophy,‖ not to make them alive but "die again." And therefore Celsus saith, "The hope of the resurrection of the flesh is the hope of worms, a filthy, an abominable, an impossible thing, which God neither will nor can do." Hence probably it was that the Valentinians, Marcionites, Basilidians, the followers of Saturninus, and other primitive heretics, denied so stiffly τῆς σαρκὸς ἀνάστασιν, "the resurrection of the flesh" (Just. Mart. Dial. p. 307. 253), and said, non esse capacem carnem vitæ, "that the flesh was not capable of life" (Iren. lib. i. cap. 29, lib. v. cap. 41), because they held with the philosophers, corpus esse carcerem, "the body was the prison of the soul" (idem, lib. i. cap. 21). Now, to this objection the apostle here returns a full and satisfactory answer, by showing the happy change which shall then pass upon the raised body; and this he seems to do with some resemblance to the ancient philosophy of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, and to the sentiments of the Jews.

That here are two questions, but then both have respect to the manner or the qualities of the bodies to be raised, for the apostle saith not διατί, Why are dead men raised to life again? or, Why do they live again? but πῶς ἐγείρονται, "How, after what manner, are they raised?" are they raised with such mortal bodies as they had before, or with bodies subject to the like distempers and infirmities which we now suffer in this life? or if not, "with what kind of bodies?" do their bodies rise naked? or are they clothed upon? This is exceedingly evident from the whole discourse of the apostle in answer to these questions, which gives no reason why they being dead do rise again, but wholly is employed in showing what are the qualities and conditions of the raised bodies of good men.

[15] Ver. 37. Γυμνὸν κόκκον, Naked grain.] Note here, that the Jewish rabbins* use the same similitude of grain in the affair of the resurrection, and speak also of "a clothing of the body raised," from the example of grain raised with a covering (see note on 2 Cor. v. 2—4). Note also, that St Paul is not discoursing of the identity of the raised body, but only of the qualities with which it is raised.

[16] Ver. 44. Σῶμα ψυχικόν, An animal body.] It seems hence probable that the word sown doth not relate to the body's being laid in the earth, but rather to its production into the world; for, when it is interred, it is no more an animal body, but a body void of life; it is not only weak, veins, nerves, by which, by the assistance of the animal and vital spirits, it perceives the objects of sense, moves, and conveys nourishment to all its parts, wanting continual recruits of meat and drink); it is raised a spiritual body (possessed and acted by the Holy Spirit, and advanced so far to the perfection of spirits, as to be free from grossness, ponderosity, from needing rest, sleep, or sustenance). There is a natural (Gr. animal) body, and there is a spiritual body.

45 And so it is written, The first man Adam (from whom we all derive our bodies and our animal life) was made a living soul; (Gen. ii. 7; whereas) the last Adam (i. e. Christ) was made [17] a quickening spirit, (as having power to quicken and confer eternal life on all his members, but wholly destitute of power: and this appears yet farther, from the following proof of these words, "It is sown an animal body, for so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul." The apostle doth indeed, ver. 36, 37, speak of seed sown in the earth, but then he speaks of it as still alive, and having its seminal virtue, or animal spirit in it, and after dying there; whereas our bodies first die, and then are cast into the earth.

Secondly, Hence it is also probable that the apostle discourseth not here of the different degrees of glory which the saints hereafter shall enjoy; for he speaks only of what is raised, that is, the body, and of the qualities belonging to all bodies that are raised.

Thirdly, Certain it is that the apostle in this chapter discourseth only of the resurrection of the just, since it is alone their bodies that shall undergo this happy change.

Fourthly, Observe, that there is another sense of the forty-fourth verse, as good as that which I have given in the paraphrase, viz. There is an animal body, i. e. a body fitted for this lower sensible state in which we live at present; and there is a spiritual body, that is, a body fitted for our spiritual and celestial state: in this state we are forced to serve our bodies, and to attend their leisure, and mightily depend upon them in the operations of the mind; in the other, our bodies shall wholly serve our spirits, and minister to them, and depend upon them, and therefore may be styled spiritual. But,

Fifthly, That our bodies shall be then spiritual, thin, and aerial, is neither a new doctrine nor proper to the followers of Origen; for so both Chrysostom and Theophylact upon the place allow it to be. "What incredible thing assert we," saith Isidore Pelusiota,* "if we say the body is small and aerial? for by this we do not deny it to be the same body." And again, "The apostle calls our bodies spiritual, διὰ τὸ κοῦφα καὶ αἰθέρια μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι,† because hereafter they shall be light and etherial." And this, which the apostle here says, is suitable to the philosophy of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, who taught that good and pure souls were by death delivered from those gross and earthly bodies which press down the soul (Wisd. ix. 15), and were after the dissolution of the body, said they, will be at the resurrection of the body saith he,‡ "invested with thin and aerial, with active and spiritual, with bright and shining, and, lastly, with celestial and eternal bodies." Now to this plainly answers the description of our raised bodies here given by Paul, in answer to the second question of the philosophers at Corinth, "With what bodies do they come forth out of the grave?" declaring in their very terms, that this body will be σῶμα πνευματικὸν καὶ οὐράνιον, "a spiritual and celestial body," ver. 44. 46. 48, 49, 2 Cor. v. 1, that it will be οἰκία αἰώνιος, "an eternal house," σῶμα ἄφθαρτον καὶ ἀθάνατον, "an incorruptible and immortal body," ver. 53, 54, that it will be raised ἐν δόξῃ, "in glory," and so be αὐγοειδὲς, "a shining body." "The just," saith Christ, "shall shine as the sun, and as the brightness of the firmament" (Matt. xiii. 43); "and as the stars," saith Daniel (xii. 3). And this answers to the σῶμα ἀστροειδὲς, which these philosophers mention as the same with their αὐγοειδὲς, "shining body." Lastly, "It is raised in power," and this is in sense the same with their σῶμα εὐκίνητον, "agile body," and of quick motion. Indeed, the parallel is so exact, that seeing I find nothing of this nature in the life of Pythagoras, writ by Diogenes Laertius, or in Plato, but only in those writers who lived since Christ's time, and were professed enemies of Christianity, Hierocles, Porphyry, Proclus, and Jamblichus. I am apt to suspect, that as in other things they apparently dressed up their philosophy and morality anew, to accommodate it the better to the Christian philosophy, that so there might seem less need of Christianity; and particularly made the felicity of souls hereafter much like the Christian doctrine, that so they might destroy, or render needless, the doctrine of the resurrection; so they gave to the dying souls of good men this ὄχημα ψυχῆς, or "vehicle of a spiritual, immortal, shining, heavenly body" also, from the Christian notion of the change our raised bodies should then undergo. See the text defended against the surmises of Dr. Mills, Examen Millii, ibid.

[17] Ver. 45. Πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, A quickening spirit.] All the ancients till Austin, by "a spiritual body" seem to understand a body possessed and acted by the Holy Spirit, as the natural body is by the animal and vital spirits; and say that Christ was made a quickening spirit, "by the seed of the Holy Spirit, which unites him to all his members," and confers on them a new life and immortality. Irenæus* is very express and copious in this matter, saying that, "as from the beginning of our frame in Adam, that inspiration of life which proceeded from God, united to the body, animated man, and made him a reasonable creature; so in the end, the word of the Father, and the Spirit of God, united to the old substance of the frame of Adam, make a living and a perfect man, receiving the perfect Father; that, as we all died in the animal, we may be all quickened in the spiritual Adam; and that by the Spirit the bodies rising are made spiritual, as by the Spirit they have life eternal."—"It is called spiritual, as putting on the Spirit," saith Tertullian :† "As receiving the whole energy and communion of the Spirit," saith Methodius.‡ And that the resurrection of the just shall be effected by the Spirit of God, seems to be plainly taught by the apostle in these words, "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 10). And this agrees with the opinion of the Jews, who ascribe the resurrection of the Spirit, from Ezek. xxxvii. 10, and in particular to the Spirit of the Messiah. And from this differs not much the opinion of Theodoret, and others, That Christ is made a quickening Spirit, because he himself, being quickened by the Spirit (1 Pet. iii. 18), hath himself the power to quicken and raise the bodies of his servants to eternal life; for "as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, so the Son quickeneth whom he will" (John v. 21), and "as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself" (ver. 26).

Moreover, that Christ is said here to be εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, "for a quickening spirit," not with his relation to his quickening the soul by the body only, is visible to any who will peruse the whole discourse of the apostle here, since bers; or, as being the giver of that quickening Spirit by which we shall be raised from the dead, and made spiritual as his body is.

46 I say, there is an animal body, and there is a spiritual body;) Howbeit that (body) was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural (Gr. animal); and afterward that which is spiritual.

47 (For) The first man (Adam) is (was) of the earth, earthy (having a body formed of it; and so the animal body derived from him must be earthy): the second man is the Lord (descending) [18] from heaven (to raise our bodies and advance them to that place).

48 As is (was) the earthy, such are they also that are earthy (and live in the animal body as he did): and as is the heavenly, such are they (to be) also that are (to have) heavenly (immortal and shining bodies).

49 And as we have borne the image of the earthy (Adam, being begotten after his fall in his own likeness, with earthy, mortal bodies, Gen. v. 3), we shall also [19] bear the image of the heavenly (partaking in our bodies of his heavenly glory, he changing our vile bodies into the likeness of his glorious body, Phil. iii. 21).

50 Now this I say, brethren, that [20] flesh and blood (such as ours is) cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth (nor can) corruption inherit incorruption.

it relateth only to the truth and manner of the resurrection. For after the apostle had dispatched his proof of our Lord's resurrection, he concludes thus, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept; for as by man came death, so by man came also the resurrection of the dead:" for as, ἐν τῷ Ἀδάμ, "by Adam all men die, so also, ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, by Christ, all ζωοποιηθήσονται, shall be made alive again." Now this is the very word used by Christ, in reference to his power of raising the dead, when he saith, "As the Father raises the dead, καὶ ζωοποιεῖ, and makes them alive again, so the Son ζωοποιεῖ, gives life to whom he will. For as the Father hath given life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself" (John v. 21. 26).

After this the apostle proceeds to the inquiry of the unbeliever, "How are the dead raised up?" &c. And, in his answer to this, he begins with the same word; "That which thou sowest, οὐ ζωοποιεῖται, is not quickened except it die;" and then shows the difference of our present body, subject to death, and the condition of our future bodies, saying, "It is sown," or born into the world, σῶμα ψυχικόν, "an animal body;" that is, a body which, by the animal and vital spirits in it, lives, moves, perceives, and conveys nourishment to all its parts; "it is raised, σῶμα πνευματικόν, a spiritual body;" that is, a body quickened by the Spirit of Christ (Rom. viii. 11), and advanced so far to the perfection of spirits, as to be immortal as they are (Luke xx. 35, 36), and so fitted for the celestial and immortal state: for, saith he, "so it is written, The first man Adam," from whom we all derive our bodies and our animal life, was therefore made, εἰς ψυχὴν ζῶσαν, "with a soul giving life" to his body, and conveying this animal life to others (Gen. ii. 7); the second was made εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, to revive the body, and quicken it by his Spirit (John vi. 63); for having promised that he would raise up them who spiritually did eat his flesh and drink his blood, he adds, τὸ Πνεῦμα ἐστι τὸ ζωοποιοῦν, "It is the Spirit that quickeneth." He saith also, that "the first man," whose image we bear in our bodies, was χοϊκός, formed ἀπὸ χοός, from the dust, and so is to return to the dust; "the second man," whose image we shall bear, "is the Lord from heaven;" to wit, descending from it with his glorious and heavenly body, whose image we shall bear by having bodies "made like unto his glorious body;" not then consisting, when they ascend thither, of flesh and blood, or subject to corruption, as now they are; "for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal body must put on immortality." And this happy resurrection is to be effected by the Spirit of Christ dwelling in us; "for if the Spirit of Christ dwell in us, he that raised up Christ from the dead, ζωοποιήσει καὶ, shall also quicken our mortal bodies, by his Spirit dwelling in us" (Rom. viii. 11); whence it is evident that Christ, the second Adam, is said to be εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, not with relation to our souls, but to our bodies, to be raised by him. And thus are these words expounded by Photius in Œcumenius, and by Theophylact on the place.

[18] Ver. 47. Ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, From heaven.] Not as some fancy, because Christ's body was from heaven, and not from the Virgin Mary; for the scripture expressly teacheth that he was begotten ἐξ αὐτῆς, from her body, Matt. i. 16, Luke i. 35, and was the fruit of her womb, Luke i. 42, that he was made ἐξ γυναικὸς, "out of a woman," and came from the fathers, τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, "according to the flesh," Rom. ix. 5; and had his body been derived from heaven, it must have been immortal, as our bodies will be when we bear the image of the heavenly Adam: both which things make it necessary to interpret "the Lord from heaven," as I have done in the paraphrase.

[19] Ver. 49. Φορέσομεν, We shall bear.] Irenæus, lib. v. cap. 9, Tertullian de Resur. Carnis, cap. 49, et adversùs Marcion. lib. v. cap. 10, Cyprian adv. Jud. lib. ii. §. 10, et lib. iii. §. 11, de Habitû Virg. ed. Ox. p. 103, de Zelo et Livore, p. 226, Hilar. diac. in locum, Jerome in Isa. lii. f. 84, 1, read portemus, which answers to the Greek φορέσωμεν, as Chrysostom reads, and as the Alexandrian and other copies read. The other reading is owned by Origen against Celsus twice, lib. v. p. 213, and also by Methodius. Theodoret also and Theophylact well note, that the words are not to be read by way of exhortation, φορέσωμεν, "Let us bear," but φορέσομεν as a prediction of what we shall be: for the apostle, from ver. 42, to this verse, still passeth on from what we were to what we shall be; and having said, "As is the heavenly, such are (i. e. shall be) they that are heavenly;" he proves this, because "as we have borne the image of the earthly Adam, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly."

Note also that Philo speaks much like the apostle; for he saith,* "There are two kinds of men, one made after the image of God, and another made out of the earth." The last he proves from the very words the apostle useth to prove there is a natural or animal body; the first from this, that "God made man after his own image," which image he styles "the divine Word;" and says he is the ἐπουράνιος ἀστὴρ, "the heavenly star, the fountain of all sensible stars." The last he calls "the earthly and corruptible Adam; the first, the Adam made after the image which is not," saith he,† "earthly, but heavenly. The one is heavenly, as being made after the image of God; and so incapable of any corruptible or earthy substance; the other out of seminal matter, which the scripture calleth earth." But then he saith that "the heavenly man was formed first, and after him the earthy;" and perhaps, for the correction of that error, the apostle might here say, "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which was natural."

[20] Ver. 50. Σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα, Flesh and blood, &c.] Most of the fathers interpret these words of flesh and blood, not naturally, but morally, taken for the corrupt affection of the flesh. But,

1. Though flesh itself in scripture sometimes bears this sense, yet flesh and blood jointly never seems to have this import in scripture.

2. It is plain, and confessed by Austin,‡ that the apostle is not here speaking of the requisites to make our souls meet to inherit this kingdom, but of the manner of the resurrection of the body.

3. The apostle speaks of flesh and blood as subject to corruption here, ver. 52, or of such flesh and blood as must be changed, and put on incorruption, as of flesh and blood naturally taken.

4. It is evident to sense that flesh may be cut and divided, and blood let out, and so must, whilst they continue such, be subject to corruption; and also that a heavenly and spiritual body, a "house from heaven," cannot consist of such flesh and blood as we have at present.

It therefore must be said that, though the same flesh and blood may rise from the grave, it will then, or afterward, receive such a change as will render it spiritual or incorruptible, and so perhaps, when it comes to heaven, will not be flesh and blood; or that it will be clothed with such a heavenly body as will keep it from a possibility of corruption; and so the import of these words may be this, That flesh and blood unchanged, and unclothed with its heavenly body, cannot inherit the kingdom of God.

[21] Ver. 51. Πάντες μὲν οὐ κοιμηθησόμεθα, πάντες δὲ ἀλλαγησόμεθα, We shall not all sleep, &c.] This reading is much to be preferred, before either of the other two; viz. "We shall all rise," or "We shall all sleep, but shall not all be changed;" as being,

1. Not only the reading of Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, on the place, but also of Origen,* Theodotus, Apollinarius, Jerome, and of Pseudo-Justin, qu. 61 and 109.

2. As being enforced from the next words repeated thus, "And we shall be changed;" from the like words, 1 Thess. iv. 17, and from the observation of almost all the commentators on the place, that the apostle in this chapter speaks only of the resurrection of the just; and from the falsehood of the other words, "We shall not all be changed," seeing the bodies of the wicked will certainly be changed by the fire they go into; and, lastly, from the sense, for what sense is it to say, "We shall not be changed in a moment," and to add this reason of that saying, viz. "For the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed?"

Note also, that it cannot be hence concluded that he and the rest of the apostles should live to the general resurrection; no, he elsewhere discovers his expectation, that the same God who raised up Jesus should raise them also from the dead, 2 Cor. iv. 14. He speaks this therefore, not in his own, but in the person of all pious Christians that should then live (see the note on 1 Thess. iv. 15. 17).

[22] Ver. 52. Ἐν ἀτόμῳ, In a moment.] It is the observation of Jerome,† that by these words the apostle cunctam primæ et secundæ resurrectionis excludit fabulam, "destroys the fable of the first and second resurrection." He doth it sufficiently in the description of the state of all the raised bodies of the just: for though the patrons of this opinion would avoid it, it is certain that the old assertors of it held that they should be raised to enjoy the pleasures of meat and drink, as Irenæus‡ speaks. Now can thin, spiritual, glorious, heavenly bodies, and such as are made like to Christ's "glorious body," eat and drink, and enjoy these sensual pleasures? Moreover, who shall be changed? Those that have already been raised a thousand years? If not, they must not be alive, for Christians then alive shall be changed; but if they must be changed, then must their bodies be raised corruptible, and they must twice "bear the image of the earthy," or the animal Adam.

Ver. 53. Δεῖ γὰρ τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο.] It is said, τὸ φθαρτὸν and τὸ θνητὸν have not σῶμα for their substantive, but are put in the neuter gender absolute, and stand to represent νεκροὶ, "the dead;" but this is a great mistake; for the words are not only τὸ φθαρτὸν, τὸ θνητὸν, but τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο, "this corruptible, this mortal;" now istud, saith Tertullian, is a word demonstrative of the body; this hoc, saith Ruffinus, est vox corpus suum quodammodò contingentis, "is the voice of one as it were pointing to the body." Moreover, what is mortal and corruptible; what puts on incorruption, but the body sown in corruption, and raised in incorruption? (ver. 42.) What is mortal but the body? what therefore can be raised to immortality but the same body? When it is farther said that the apostle saying, οὐ πρῶτον τὸ πνευματικὸν, ἀλλὰ τὸ ψυχικὸν, "That is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural," he uses the neuter gender, to signify the persons of Adam and of Christ, that is another plain mistake; they plainly being used to signify the body received from Adam, and raised by Christ, as is evident from the precedent words, ἔστι σῶμα ψυχικὸν, καὶ ἔστι σῶμα πνευματικὸν, "There is an animal body, and there is a spiritual body; but that body which is spiritual is not first, but that which is animal."

[23] Ver. 54. Ἐνδύσεται ἀφθαρσίαν, Shall put on incorruption.] The scripture and all the ancients speak of a clothing which our raised bodies shall put on. Thus Psellus,* in his commentary on the Chaldaic Oracles, saith, "The Chaldees give the soul two clothings; one of the spiritual body, weaved out of that which is subject to sense; the other a shining, thin body, not subject to the touch, which they call the superficies;" and the conjecture of the Jews is this, that it shall be "a clothing of light," or "of a pure flame." So the ancient book Zohar† saith, that "the bodies of the just shall be clothed with the light of glory." R. Phineas saith that the blessed God will give to the bodies of the just תפיר, "an ornament," according to that of Isaiah, lviii. 11, "He shall satisfy the soul, בצהצחות, with white or splendid things;" and R. Levi, that "the soul, in the state of its glory, sustains itself by the superior light," and when it returns to the body, "it shall come with this light, and then the body shall shine as with the brightness of the heavens." And this agrees with the transfiguration of our Lord's body, Matt. xvii. 2, and with his appearance to Paul, Acts ix. 3, and to John, Rev. i. 14, 15, and to the descriptions made in the Old Testament, of the just rising from their graves, that "they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars for ever," Dan. xii. 3, Wisd. iii. 7; and in the New, that "they shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of the Father," Matt. xiii. 43, and thus may they be "salted," and preserved from corruption "by fire," Matt. ix. 49.

[24] Κατεπόθη ὁ θάνατος εἰς νῖκος, Death is swallowed up in victory.] Or, "for ever," εἰς νῖκος often signifies; so, "Shall the sword devour εἰς νῖκος for ever?" 2 Sam. ii. 26; Job xxxvi. 7, "He will set them on the throne εἰς νῖκος for ever;" Jer. iii. 5, "Will he keep his anger εἰς νῖκος for ever?" Lam. v. 20, "Why dost thou forget us εἰς νῖκος for ever?" Amos i. 11, "His anger did tear for ever," εἰς νῖκος· and viii. 7, "He will not forget their works εἰς νῖκος for ever." Nor is the phrase εἰς νῖκος used in any other sense in the Septuagint. Though therefore death is represented as the last enemy to be vanquished, ver. 26, and the apostle asks, "O grave, where is thy victory?" and gives thanks to God "who giveth us the victory," ver. 55. 57, yet seeing he hath given us this victory by swallowing death up for ever, by swallowing up death of life eternal, 2 Cor. v. 4, I see no reason why we should think

CHAPTER XVI.

1 Now concerning the collection for the saints (i. e. the suffering Christians in Judea), as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye.

2 [1] Upon the first day of the week (the day of your Christian assemblies) [2] let every one of you lay by him in store (on this account), as God hath prospered him, that there be no (farther need of) gatherings when I come.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XVI.

[1] Ver. 2. Κατὰ μίαν σαββάτων, Upon the first day of the week.] So we read in Matthew, that our Lord rose from the dead, τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων, "upon the first day of the week," Matt. xxviii. 1; in Mark, that "the sabbath being over, Mary Magdalene and others came early, τῆς μιᾶς τῶν σαββάτων, the first day of the week," xvi. 9, and found Christ risen from the dead; and in Luke, that "they rested on the sabbath-day, according to the commandment," and that they came to the sepulchre, τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων, "on the first day of the week," xxiii. 56, xxiv. 1, and so accordingly saith John, xx. 1: so that this phrase doth certainly import "the first day of the week," the day of our Lord's resurrection from the dead; and this the word μία usually signifies in the Septuagint, when it is joined with days, weeks, and months; as "the evening and the morning were ἡμέρα μία the first day;" so ἡμέρα μία τοῦ μηνὸς is "the first day of the month," Exod. xl. 2. Ezra iii. 6, x. 17, and μία τοῦ μηνὸς is "the first day of the month," Lev. xxiii. 24, Numb. i. 1. 18, xix. 1, xxiii. 38, Deut. i. 3, Ezek. xxvi. 1, xxxii. 1, xlv. 18, Hag. i. 1, ii. 2.

Moreover, κατὰ μίαν may be rendered "every first day," as κατὰ πόλιν,* "in every city;" κατ' οἶκον, "in every family;" κατ' ἄνδρα, viritim, "man by man;" κατὰ μῆνα, "every month;" and κατὰ μίαν, sigillatim.

Secondly, Observe, that the Jews in every city where they dwelt had their collectors of alms,† who in the week days went about the city collecting alms, according to the quality and wealth of every Jew; and "in the evening of the sabbath" distributed to the poor among the Jews as much as was needful for the following week: and after this example, the apostle seems to have ordained that the Christians should lay up for the poor, or make provisions for them on the Lord's day.

Thirdly, Observe, that from the beginning the Christians did assemble on the first day of the week, called by them "the Lord's day," to perform their religious worship,‡ "to read the scriptures, to preach, and celebrate the Lord's supper." "This being the Lord's day, we keep it holy," saith Dionysius,§ bishop of Corinth. "On Sunday," saith Justin,* "all Christians in the city or country meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we read the writings of the prophets and apostles; this being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate and do the things they heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament."

Fourthly, Observe, that the apostle gave orders, that here and in the churches of Galatia collections should be made for the poor on that day; and that all Christians, in compliance with that precept, still offered their alms upon that day. So Justin Martyr,† "Then they that are able and willing give what they think fit, and what is thus collected is laid up in the hands of the president, who distributes it to orphans and widows, and other Christians, as their wants require."

Fifthly, Observe, that no good reason can be given why the apostle should limit the collections of the churches of Corinth and Galatia to "the first day of the week," but this, that this day was appointed for the worship of our Lord, and so more fit for the performance of those duties which concerned his distressed members in those times; for as the works of charity and mercy are proper duties of this day, so doth the day contain a special motive in it to enlarge their charity, as being the day in which they were "begotten to a lively hope, through the resurrection of Christ Jesus from the dead, of an inheritance incorruptible," 1 Pet. i. 3; and in which they constantly participated of his precious body and blood, and therefore, having received spiritual things so plentifully from Christ, must be more ready to impart somewhat of their temporals to his needy servants.

[2] Ἕκαστος ὑμῶν παρ' ἑαυτῷ τιθέτω, θησαυρίζων, &c. Let every one of you lay by him in store, that there be no gathering when I come.] From these last words is gathered that θησαυρίζειν is to put into a common box his charity; because if they had kept it at home, there would have been need of gathering it when the apostle came. But the words ἕκαστος παρ' ἑαυτῷ τιθέτω, "let every one place it with himself," admit not of this sense; nor when this was done could there be any necessity of making collections, as that imports soliciting the charities of others, but only of receiving the charity thus laid by for the use of the saints; and yet that such need there was, is evident from the eighth and ninth chapters of the Second Epistle: for why is so much care taken that they

3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, [3] them will I send (or them will I with my letters send) to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem.

4 And if it be (thought) meet that I go also, they shall go with me (to be witnesses of the distribution of your charity).

5 Now I will come unto you, when [4] I shall pass (or shall have passed) through Macedonia: for I do (intend shortly to remove hence and to) pass through Macedonia.

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust (hereafter) to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry (still) at Ephesus [5] until Pentecost.

9 For a great door and effectual is opened unto me (for propagation of the gospel there), and there are many adversaries (of the truth, especially those of the circumcision, which makes my stay there necessary).

10 Now [6] if Timotheus come (to you), see that he may be with you without fear (of disturbance from the factious): for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do.

11 Let no man therefore despise him (because of his youth, 1 Tim. iv. 12): but [7] conduct (ye) him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren (or, I and the brethren look for him).

12 As touching our brother Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but [8] his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he shall have convenient time.

13 Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you (yourselves) like men, be strong.

14 Let all your things be done with charity (or a sincere desire of your brother's weal).

15 I beseech you, brethren, (seeing) (ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the firstfruits of (the gospel in) Achaia, and that they have (ever since) addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints,)

16 That ye submit yourselves unto such (giving reverence and honour to them), and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth.

17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus (whom you sent with your letters of inquiry to me): for that (account of your affairs) which was lacking on your part (in your letter) they have supplied.

18 (I am glad, I say,) For they have refreshed my spirit (with their presence and discourse,) and (will at their return refresh) your's: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

19 The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, [9] with the church that is in their house (i. e. their Christian family).

20 All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiss (see note on Rom. xvi. 16).

[3] Ver. 3. Οὓς ἐαν δοκιμάσητε δι' ἐπιστολῶν, τούτους πέμψω, Them with my letters will I send.] That this is the true sense is evident, because the apostle, supposing himself then to be come to them, could not need their commendatory epistles.

[4] Ver. 5. Μακεδονίαν διέρχομαι, I do pass through Macedonia.] Not presently, but after I have finished my stay at Ephesus (ver. 8): for that Paul writ this epistle from Ephesus, and not from Philippi, may be gathered from the salutations in the close of it, not from the churches of Macedonia, but of Ephesus; and in his Second Epistle he saith, he passed from Troas to Macedonia, and that there Titus came to him, 2 Cor. ii. 13 and vii. 5, 6, who was not come to him when he writ his First Epistle.

[5] Ver. 8. Ἕως τῆς πεντηκοστῆς, Till pentecost.] It therefore was the following pentecost that he hastened to be at Jerusalem, Acts xx. 16.

[6] Ver. 10. Ἐὰν δὲ ἔλθῃ Τιμόθεος, If Timothy come to you.] Hence it appears that this epistle was not sent by Timothy, for then he must have come to them.

[7] Ver. 11. Προπέμψατε αὐτὸν, Conduct him forth.] It is the observation of the reverend and learned Dr. Hammond, that the word προπέμπειν signifies not only to accompany one, and bring him on his way, as ver. 6, but also to provide for the necessaries of his journey. But this seems not suitable to the inquiry of the apostle, "Did I make gain of you by any of them whom I sent to you? Did Titus make a gain of you?" 2 Cor. xii. 17.

[8] Ver. 12. Οὐκ ἦν θέλημα ἵνα νῦν ἔλθῃ, He was not willing to come now.] Perhaps, because he would not countenance a faction that was begun under his name, by his presence with them, which, saith Aquinas, shows he was not their bishop, as some of the ancients have represented him; for then he ought not to have left his flock under so great disorders.

[9] Ver. 19. Σὺν τῇ κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίᾳ, With the church in their house.] This phrase doth not import that the whole church of Corinth, &c. met in such a family; for then this salutation would be the salutation of all the Christians in that place; but that this is not so, is evident from so many salutations directed to other persons and families in the same place: so Rom. xvi. 5, "Salute Aquila and Priscilla, and the church in their house" (see the note there); and then follow salutations to many other persons and brethren of the church: so Col. iv. 15, "Salute the brethren in Laodicea, and Nymphas, with the church in his house" (see the note there): so Philem. 2, we read thus, "Paul, a prisoner, to Philemon—to Apphia, to Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to the church in thy house:" and here, after this salutation, follow the words, "All the brethren greet you."

It rather seems to signify, as all the Greek scholiasts and Grotius say, "a family consisting wholly of Christian converts," as was the gaoler's house, Acts xvi. 31, 32, and that of Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, Acts xviii. 8, for when it was otherwise, and the family was not entirely converted, the apostle alters his style, and saith only, "Salute them which are of Aristobulus's household, and of the household of Narcissus in the Lord," Rom. xvi. 10, 11; "Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, &c. and the brethren that are with them," ver. 14; 15, "The saints that are with them;" "They of the house of Cæsar salute you," Phil. iv. 22.

[10] Ver. 21. Τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ, With my own hand.] He writing by an amanuensis, Rom. xvi. 22, still closed his epistle with his own hand, as a token that it came from him, 2 Thess. iii. 17.

A DISCOURSE

ONCERNING THE

IMPUTATION OF CHRIST'S PERFECT RIGHTEOUSNESS, OR OBEDIENCE TO THE LAW, TO US, FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS, OR JUSTIFICATION.

IN WHICH

I. The opinion of the necessity of this imputation is delivered, in the words of the Rev. Bishop Beveridge.
II. It is proved that this opinion hath no foundation in the holy scripture. And,
III. It is proved to be fully and expressly contrary both to scripture and reason.

TO THE READER.

I do not think it an insult upon the sacred character of this great and good man, that I make bold to examine one article of his "Private Thoughts," which, in my settled judgment, is of evil consequence to the souls of men. For though he died a bishop, yet, saith the preface, "The following sheets were written by him in his younger years, upon his first entrance into holy orders:" and this article is considered by one who hath already passed the age of man. I could have reflected upon twenty other passages, which, in my judgment, might have kept these "thoughts" still "private," as the good bishop, in his lifetime, did: but what I have said upon this article will, I hope, be sufficient to show they are not so perfect and correct as to be deemed a standard of the truth of doctrines, though his pious resolutions are very proper to produce in us that holiness of life which will hereafter be of more value to us than the most refined notions. Though therefore I cannot comply with him in his "private thoughts," to imitate him in his pious resolutions is the desire of,

Thy friend and servant,

D. W.

SECT. I.

The imputation of Christ's active and perfect obedience to us being, in my judgment, a very false and pernicious doctrine, and yet being of late propounded by an eminent and good bishop, as a thing absolutely necessary to our justification, and to obtain a title to eternal life; I shall,

First, Lay down this doctrine in the bishop's own words.

Secondly, I shall endeavour to show that it hath no foundation in the holy scripture; and that the good bishop hath produced nothing, either from scripture or from reason, which is sufficient to confirm it. And,

Thirdly, That it is fully and directly contrary to scripture and to reason.

And, first, the bishop, in the eighth article concerning his "Private Thoughts of Religion," delivers this doctrine in these words (p. 89): "He (viz. the Son of God) being in and of himself perfectly co-equal, co-essential, and co-eternal with the Father, was in no sort bound to do more than the Father himself did, and so whatsoever he should do which the Father did not, might justly be accounted a work of supererogation, N. B. which, without any violation of divine justice, might be set on the account of some other persons, even of such as he pleased to do it for. And hereupon, out of mercy and compassion to fallen man, he covenanted with his Father that, if it pleased his majesty to accept it, he would take upon him the suffering of those punishments which were due from him to man, and the performance of those duties which were due from man to him: N. B. so that whatsoever he should thus humble himself to do or suffer, should wholly be on the account of man; himself being not anyways bound to do or suffer more in time than he had from eternity.

"This motion the Father, out of the riches of his grace and mercy, was pleased to consent unto: and hereupon the Son, assuming our nature into his deity, N. B. becomes subject and obedient both to the moral and ceremonial laws of his Father, and at last to death itself, 'even the death of the cross;' in the one he paid an active, in the other a passive obedience, and so did not only fulfil the will of his Father, in obeying what he had commanded, but satisfied his justice in suffering the punishment due to us for the transgressing of it. His active obedience, as it was infinitely pure and perfect, did without doubt infinitely transcend all the obedience of the sons of men, even of Adam too in his primitive state (p. 88); for the obedience of Adam, make the best of it, was but the obedience of a finite creature, whereas the obedience of Christ was the obedience of one who was infinite God as well as man. By which means the laws of God had higher obedience performed to them, than themselves in their primitive institution required; for being made only to finite creatures, they could command no more than the obedience of finite creatures; whereas the obedience of Christ was the obedience of one who was the infinite Creator as well as a finite creature.

"Now this obedience being more than Christ was bound to, and only performed on the account of those whose nature he had assumed, as we by faith lay hold upon it; so God, through grace, N. B. imputes it to us as if it had been performed by us in our own persons. And hence it is, that as in one place Christ is said to be 'made sin for us,' 2 Cor. v. 21, so in another place he is said to be 'made our righteousness,' 1 Cor. i. 30; and in the forecited place, 2 Cor. v. 21, as he is said to be 'made sin for us,' so are we said to be 'made righteousness' in him; but what righteousness? our own? No, 'the righteousness of God,' radically his, but imputatively ours; and this is the only way whereby we are said to be made 'the righteousness of God,' even by the righteousness of Christ being made ours, by which we are accounted and reputed as righteous before God. These things considered, I very much wonder how any man can presume to exclude the active obedience of Christ from our justification before God; as if what Christ did in the flesh was only of duty, not at all of merit, or as if it was for himself, and not for us; especially when I consider that suffering the penalty is not what the law primarily required, for the law of God requires perfect obedience, the penalty being only threatened to, not properly required of, the breakers of it; for let a man suffer the penalty of the law in never so high a manner, he is not therefore accounted obedient to it, his punishment speaks not his innocence, but rather his transgression of the law. Hence it is that I cannot look upon Christ as having made full satisfaction to God's justice for me, unless he had performed the obedience I owe to God's laws, as well as borne the punishment that is due for my sins: for though he should have borne my sins, I cannot see how that should denominate me righteous or obedient to the law, so as to entitle me to eternal life according to the tenor of the old law (p. 89), 'Do this and live:' N. B. which old covenant is not disannulled or abrogated by the covenant of grace, but rather established (Rom. iii. 31); especially as to the obedience it requires of us in order to the life it promiseth, otherwise the laws of God would be mutable, N. B. and so come short of the laws of the very Medes and Persians, which altered not. Obedience, therefore, is as strictly required under the New, as it was under the Old Testament, but with this difference—there obedience was required in our own persons, as absolutely necessary; here obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient: but now, if we have no such obedience in our surety (as we cannot have, if he did not live as well as die for us), let any man tell me what title he hath, or can have, to eternal life? I suppose he will tell me he hath none in himself, because he hath not performed perfect obedience to the law, N. B. and I tell him he hath none in Christ, unless Christ hath performed that obedience for him, which none can say he did, who doth not believe his active as well as passive obedience to be wholly upon our account." Now these words contain these several propositions:

First, "That the Son of God covenanted with his Father, that he would take upon him the obedience which was due from man to him (p. 86), so that whatever he should do should be on the account of man, and that to this motion the Father, of his rich grace and mercy, was pleased to consent.

Secondly, "That he, in pursuance of this covenant, became obedient and subject both to the moral and ceremonial laws of his Father, and so, by his active obedience to these laws, fulfilled the will of his Father in obeying what he had commanded.

Thirdly (p. 86, 87), "That this obedience of Christ was perfect, and did infinitely transcend all the obedience of the sons of men, even of Adam in his primitive state, and so Christ performed higher obedience to the laws of God than was required of man in the primitive institution.

Fourthly, "That this obedience being more than Christ was bound to do, and being only performed on the account of those whose nature he had assumed (p. 87), it is by virtue of our faith imputed to us, as if it had been performed by us in our own persons.

Fifthly, "That we are to be entitled to eternal life according to the tenor of the old law, Lev. v. 8. 15, that old covenant being not disannulled (p. 89) and abrogated by the covenant of grace, but rather established (Rom. iii. 31), especially as to the obedience it requires from us, in order to the life it promiseth." And,

Sixthly, ibid., "That therefore obedience is as strictly required under the New, as it was under the Old Testament, but with this difference: there obedience in our own persons was required as absolutely necessary, here obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient.

Seventhly, "That no man hath, or can have, a title to eternal life, unless Christ hath paid perfect obedience to the law for him, and so Christ could not have made full satisfaction to God's justice for us, unless he had performed the obedience due to God's laws, as well as borne the punishment due to our sins.

Eighthly, "That therefore the only way whereby we are said to be made righteous with 'the righteousness of God,' is by the righteousness of Christ being made ours, by which we are reputed and accounted righteous before God."

Having thus given you the state of the question in the bishop's own words, I shall proceed briefly to consider what he hath laid down as the foundation of his doctrine, and then to make some brief reflections upon these several propositions.

Now the foundation of this doctrine is laid down in these words:—"He (i. e. the Son of God) being co-equal, co-eternal, and co-essential with the Father (and so depending not upon him either for his existence or actions, p. 83), was in no sort bound to do more than the Father himself did, and so whatsoever he should do, which the Father did not, might justly be accounted as a work of supererogation, which, without any violation of divine justice, might be set upon the account of some other persons, even of such whom he pleased to do it for." Now this is such a scheme of new divinity as cannot easily be matched.

For, (1.) here is a God, "co-equal and co-essential with the Father, and who depends not on him either for his existence or his actions," and therefore not God of God, but plainly another God, existing and acting independently of the Father; and so the Father cannot be (as, saith Dr. Bull, de Subord. Filii, §. 4, all the fathers without fear pronounced him) principium, causa, ἀρχὴ, αἰτία, auctor filii, et αἴτιον τοῦ εἶναι.

(2.) We have this God "independent in existence" (which is the same with essence) and "actions on the Father," bound to do so much as the Father: now all obligation arising from a law to which the person bound is subject, by whose law must this co-equal person be "bound to do so much?"

(3.) This independent God is said to supererogate by doing more than he was bound to do. Now supererogation supposes the person supererogating under a command, and exceeding the virtuous action commanded; but how can he, who is independent on any, both as to existence and actions, be subject to the commands of another? Moreover, seeing the Father was not bound to create the world, or send his Son to be the Saviour of it, or to do any other thing which it was not necessary from the perfection of his nature to perform, why must not he in all these actions supererogate as well as his co-equal, independent Son?

Secondly, That which merits from God must be something from which he receives some benefit or advantage; but the Father is incapable of receiving any advantage from this supposed supererogation of his Son. And,

Thirdly, That which merits for another must oblige the person of whom he merits in justice to accept his action for another: now God the Father cannot be obliged to accept this action of his Son for us, because it was not done by us: and so, if he doth accept it as if it had been done by us, this must be perfectly of his free grace, or, as the bishop saith, p. 86, "out of the riches of his grace and mercy." For the obedience of man to the laws of God was certainly a personal due, it being that which God required of him in person; and therefore the obedience of another to the law given to him and not to another, can do nothing to acquit him from the performance of what God personally required of him and not of another, but by a pure act of grace: nor can the action of another be reckoned as done by him but by a false imputation; for such must that be which imputes that as done by me, which indeed was not done by me, but by another. As therefore, to speak exactly, God doth not impute Christ's passive obedience to us, or account that we have suffered because he did, but only doth exempt us from suffering, because he hath suffered instead; so neither can he impute the obedience of another to us, or account that we have obeyed because another hath done it upon our account, but only exempt us from obedience in person upon that account.

Lastly, Here is a rich fund for the pope's treasury of meritorious supererogating actions, that which the papists have imagined to fill up their treasury being only the merits of finite men; whereas, saith the good bishop, p. 87, "The obedience of Christ was the obedience of one that was infinite God as well as man, the obedience of one who was the infinite Creator, as well as a finite creature." Yea, if any thing could be meritorious in respect to God, this doctrine would render every good action of a believer meritorious, or an act of supererogation; for if, as the bishop saith, p. 89, "under the new covenant obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient," and Christ hath performed that obedience for us by which we have a title to life eternal, all believers "who have by faith laid hold on Christ," and so have his obedience imputed to them as if performed by them in person, must be entirely exempted from any obligation to perform personal obedience, and so all the obedience they perform must be so many acts of supererogation.

To proceed now to the consideration of the propositions plainly collected from his words; of which the first is this:—

"That Christ covenanted with the Father that he would take upon him the obedience which was due from man to him; so that whatever he should do should wholly be on the account of men, and that to this motion the Father was pleased to consent."

This proposition is founded on a chimerical covenant betwixt God the Father and the Son, of which there is not the least item in the holy scripture; and so the whole scheme of this doctrine, being built upon this vain imagination, must be also vain.

(2.) This covenant is also both in the nature of the thing impossible, and in the immediate consequences of it irreligious. It is in the nature of the thing impossible, that Christ should covenant to perform the obedience due from man to God's law, for him, or in his stead, and that God the Father should accept and repute what he thus did for him, as if performed by man personally; because the moral law, the law engraven on the heart of man, is indispensable; it being absolutely necessary that man should be obliged, personally, to obey the moral law, and that God should require him, in person, so to do; and so no promise of another to perform it for him can avail any thing to exempt him from the obligation he was, is, and ever will be under to perform it personally: this is apparent from those words of Christ, in which he gives us the abridgment of the law and the prophets; viz. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy soul; and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Matt. xxii. 37. 39): from the personal observance of which laws, who ever thought he was, or he could be, exempted by any thing which Christ had done for him? It therefore is profane and irreligious to say that either the holy Jesus made such a covenant, or that the righteous God ever consented to such a motion, or that the obedience of our surety to the moral law should be accepted in the new covenant, as completely sufficient to give us a title to eternal life; this being in effect to say that Christ, by his obedience to the moral law, hath freed every one that believes in him from his whole duty to God, his neighbour, and himself; and that God the Father hath consented that all such persons should be free from any obligation personally to "live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world;" because what hath already been performed by their surety, pp. 88, 89, is completely sufficient to denominate them righteous, or obedient to the law, so as to entitle them to eternal life; and so they cannot be obliged to a personal performance of those duties in order to that end, though the apostle plainly saith they are, Tit. ii. 12, 13.

Secondly, When he saith, in the second proposition, that Christ, "by his active obedience to God's moral and ceremonial laws, fulfilled the will of his Father in obeying what he commanded;" doth he mean what the Father had personally commanded him? If so, Christ himself must lie under a personal obligation to fulfil both the moral and the ceremonial law; and so, in doing this, he could do only what he himself was commanded to do, and could not merit for another; and so the only reason why the bishop "wonders at them who say that what Christ did in the flesh was only of duty," must be this, because, as he observes, p. 88, "that would exclude Christ's active obedience from our justification before God." If he means what the Father had not commanded him, but only had required us to obey, then can he not be properly said to have herein obeyed at all; obedience, of necessity, importing a relation to a command laid upon him who is obedient; and much less could he fulfil that command, which was never given to him, and so the Father might say to him, in the words of the prophet, "Who hath required this at thy hand?"* He himself declares he had "received a commandment from his Father to lay down his life for his sheep;"† and in pursuance of it, "he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross."‡ And he who saith, Christ also did perform his active obedience on our account, and by that "fulfilled the will of his Father, in obeying what he had commanded for us," must produce a like command of the Father, requiring him thus to obey for us; which is, first, needless, we being still of necessity under as strong an obligation of personal obedience to the moral law, as a rule of duty, as we were before Christ performed that obedience in his human nature. Secondly, It also necessarily infers a personal exemption of all believers from any obligation to obey the moral law; the pernicious consequences of which doctrine have been already shown. Thirdly, It is contrary to the words of the bishop himself; for he affirms, p. 89, that, "under the Old Testament, obedience was required in our own persons as absolutely necessary; and that this old covenant was not disannulled, but rather established by the covenant of grace, especially as to the obedience it requires in order to the life it promiseth." The obedience then required under the old law, as absolutely necessary, in order to the life it promiseth, being obedience to be performed in our own persons, to use the bishop's words, p. 88, "who can see" how the obedience of Christ, that is, of another in our stead, "could denominate us righteous, or obedient to the law, so as to entitle us to eternal life, according to the tenor of the old law, Do this, in your own persons, and live?" In a word, we neither are nor can be exempted from obedience to the moral law, as a rule of duty, but we are exempted from obedience to it as a means of justification; or, we are not exempted from an obligation to perform the righteousness of the law, but only from the curse of the law pronounced against them "who continue not in all things written in the book of the law to do them" (Gal. iii. 10). And from this curse we are delivered, saith the apostle, not by Christ's active and perfect obedience to the law, imputed to us, but by his sufferings on the cross for us.

Thirdly, Of the third proposition, that the obedience of Christ did "infinitely transcend all the obedience of the sons of men, as being the obedience of an infinite God," I shall only observe at present, that though the obedience of "an infinite God" and "infinite Creator" be absurd expressions (as importing a subjection of this infinite God and Creator to the laws of some superior, or paying infinite obedience to his infinite self); yet was it necessary to be asserted that Christ's active obedience might suffice, by reason of this supposed infinite excellency, to be imputed to all men; since otherwise it being only that which every individual man was personally obliged to perform, it could only have answered the obedience required of one single person.

Fourthly, To the fourth proposition, that "the obedience of Christ being more than he was bound to, it is, by virtue of our faith, imputed to us, as if it had been performed by us in our own persons:" I answer,

First, That it being certain that the obedience which God requires by law from us must be personal (for, where there is no law requiring personal obedience, there can be no personal transgression), hence it is evident that there can be no performance of personal obedience by a surety, and therefore no true imputation of his obedience to us, but only an exemption from any obligation to that obedience which hath been performed for us by our surety.

Secondly, When he saith that this obedience was "more than Christ was bound to do," if he means this of the obedience of the divine nature; this, if it be not that which was condemned in the Arian heresy, is a great absurdity in the supposition, that he, who is absolutely supreme, should be obedient, i. e. subject to the law of a superior; if of Christ's human nature, in that he was certainly obliged to "fulfil all righteousness," i. e. all things required of all men by the moral law; this also was absolutely necessary to the discharge of his priestly office, viz. that he should be perfectly righteous, and without sin in his own person; for "such a high-priest became us as was holy, ἄκακος, free from evil, undefiled, separated from sinners, who had no need to offer first for his own sins" (Heb. vii. 26, 27), since otherwise he must have died not for ours, but his own sins: now the personal righteousness which was absolutely necessary to render him a fit high-priest to offer a true expiatory sacrifice for our sins, could not be more than he was bound to do, as our high-priest.

Fifthly, That his fifth proposition, which affirms that "we are entitled to eternal life by the tenor of the old law, Do this and live," &c., is a flat contradiction to the doctrine of Paul in his Epistles to the Romans, to the Galatians, and to the Hebrews, will be hereafter fully manifested.

Sixthly, The difference betwixt the justification and obedience required by the old and new covenant doth not consist, as the bishop saith it is, in this, "that, in the first, obedience in our own persons was required as absolutely necessary; in the second, obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient:" but in this, that whereas the old law required perfect obedience, in order to our justification, allowing no pardon for sins committed, but leaving all under the curse, who "continued not in all things written in the law to do them" (Gal. iii. 10): the new covenant requires only faith in the blood of Christ, for the remission of our past sins, as will be fully proved hereafter. And though the new covenant doth not exempt us from the moral law, as a rule of duty; it being a contradiction to say that God permits us to omit our duty, or transgress his law (since that permission would render duty no duty, and transgression no transgression); yet doth it accept of sincere obedience, pardoning the sins of ignorance and infirmity which still cleave to our duties in this imperfect state, not for the active, but passive obedience of the blessed Jesus, according to these words of John, "If ye walk in the light, as God is in the light, the blood of Jesus Christ, N. B. cleanseth you from all sin," 1 John i. 8. And again, ii. 2, "If we sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins."

Seventhly, The seventh proposition will be proved false in every branch of it in the third section.

Eighthly, The eighth to be a gross mistake of the true sense of the apostle's words, 2 Cor. v. 21, section the second.

SECT. II.

Having, in the foregoing section, sufficiently declared what is the doctrine I reject, viz. that which asserts that Christ's active and passive obedience must be imputed to us to eternal life, or to justification; I proceed,

Secondly, To show that this doctrine hath not the least foundation in the holy scriptures. Now this I shall make evident, by a particular consideration of the texts of scripture produced by the good bishop, and other patrons of this doctrine, in favour of it. And,

First, Whereas the bishop saith, p. 87, that, as Christ is said to be "made sin for us," so are we said to be "made the righteousness of God in him" (2 Cor. v. 21), and thence concludes, that "the only way whereby we are said to be made the righteousness of God, is by the righteousness of Christ's being made ours, by which we are accounted and reputed as righteous before God:" I am sorry to find he was so unacquainted with the true import of either of these phrases, or so regardless of the context. For,

First, This phrase, "the righteousness of God," doth never signify the active obedience or righteousness of Christ, performed unto the law, but always hath relation to the righteousness of faith, in opposition to the law, or that righteousness which is procured by faith in the blood of Christ, and accepted by God to our justification; thus, Rom. i. 17, ἡ δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ ἐκ πίστεως, "The righteousness of God through faith, is revealed" in the gospel, "to beget faith in us, as it is written, The just shall live by faith:" now these very words the apostle useth to prove that "no man is justified by obedience to the law before God; for (saith the scripture) The just shall live by faith; but the law is not of faith; but (in opposition to it, saith, Lev. xviii. 5) The man that doth these things shall live by them;" which are the very words the bishop useth to prove against Paul, that "we must be denominated righteous, or obedient to the law, so as to have a title to eternal life, according to the tenor of the old law (p. 88, 89), Do this, and live," Lev. xviii. 5. So again, iii. 21, ἡ δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, "The righteousness of God, without the law, is manifested, being testified by the law and the prophets," to wit, the righteousness of God, communicated to all believers, by faith in Christ's blood (ver. 22); "We being justified freely, by the redemption which is in Christ Jesus" (ver. 23); "in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the remission of sins" (Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14); "God having set him forth for a propitiation, through faith in his blood;" p. 11, so evident is it, that "the righteousness of God," twice mentioned, is the justification God vouchsafes to us, through faith in Christ's blood, shed for the remission of our sins. Again, Rom. x. 3, the Jews "not knowing τὴν δικαιοσύνην τοῦ Θεοῦ, the righteousness of God, but seeking to establish their own righteousness," which was by the works of the law, "have not submitted, τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ, to the righteousness of God," which is the righteousness to be obtained by faith in Christ. Now this righteousness of the law, which the Jews seeking after, "submitted not to the righteousness of God," is, saith the apostle, that which Moses mentioned, Lev. xviii. 5, which saith, "The man that doth these things shall live by them;" so grossly doth the bishop mistake, in saying, p. 89, that "this very righteousness was established by the covenant of grace." What is the righteousness of faith the apostles preached in opposition to it? even a belief that God hath raised Christ from the dead (ver. 9), he dying for our sins, and rising again for our justification (Rom. iv. 24). Can then any thing be more clear from the apostle's words, than that "the righteousness of God through faith" stands in direct opposition to the righteousness of the law, which saith, "Do this and live;" and therefore cannot consist in Christ's perfect obedience to the law imputed to us, as our righteousness? And, lastly, Phil. iii. 9, ἡ ἐκ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνη, "the righteousness of God, through faith in Jesus Christ," stands directly opposite to the righteousness of the law, or to that righteousness which the Jews sought for by obedience to the law.

Secondly, The phrase, "He was made sin for us," is only capable of these two senses;—1. He was made guilty of our sins by imputation, which, I fear, is the bishop's sense; partly because the opposite imputation of Christ's righteousness to us, as if personally performed by us, is by him said to be meant by our being "made the righteousness of God in him;" partly because he plainly seems to own it in these words, p. 72, "His righteousness being as really by faith imputed to me, as my sins were laid upon him;" then, as his righteousness is imputed to me, as if it had been personally performed by me; so my sins must be imputed to him, as if they had been performed by him, and so he must be, by God's own imputation, guilty of doing murder, idolatry, adultery, and all the other sins committed by mankind; which blasphemy will be more fully rebuked in the following section; or, secondly, he was made ἁμαρτία, a sin-offering, or expiatory sacrifice for us, which is the frequent sense of the word ἁμαρτία, in the Levitical law concerning sacrifices; and is here put upon the words by all the commentators I have seen. Now this interpretation of the phrase relating to the death of Christ as an expiatory sacrifice, the proper and immediate effect of it cannot be the imputation of the obedience of Christ's life unto us, but our freedom from condemnation on the account of sin, in which our justification is still placed by the apostle; for such an effect must of necessity be signified by these words, "We are made the righteousness of God in him," which suits with the cause of it, viz. the death of Christ as an expiatory sacrifice for the remission of sin; now the proper and direct effect of such a sacrifice is deliverance from the guilt and punishment of sin, and not the imputation of Christ's active obedience unto men: for Christ offered this expiatory sacrifice, not that men might be made righteous by the righteousness of his life, but that sinners might be justified by his blood, shed for the remission of sins, and reconciled to God by the death of his Son (Rom. v. 9, 10). This, therefore, must be the true import of our being made the righteousness of God in him. And,

Thirdly, This is farther evident from the context; "for God was in Christ" (saith the apostle), "reconciling the world unto himself:" how hath Christ done this? he hath, saith the apostle, "reconciled us to God in the body of his flesh by death" (Col. i. 21). He adds, that God was thus "reconciling the world unto himself, by not imputing to them their trespasses;" why did he not impute them? because Christ, by his death, had made an expiatory sacrifice for the remission of them; for he saith, "he made him" a sacrifice for "sin, who knew no sin:" whence it must follow, that we are "made the righteousness of God in him," by the reconciliation purchased for us by his death, and the non-imputation of sin to us, as the consequent of that death.

And it may farther be observed, that every branch of this exposition is confirmed, and the sense imposed on these words by the bishop is plainly confuted, by the descants of the ancient commentators on this place. For,

First, They plainly say that by the word* ἁμαρτία, sin, we are to understand, τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν θῦμα, "a sacrifice for sin;"† non immeritò peccatum factus dicitur, quia et hostia in lege, quæ pro peccatis offerebatur, peccatum nuncupabatur, "the sacrifice offered in the law for sin, being so called."

Secondly, They add, that to be made the righteousness of God in Christ, is,‡ διὰ συγχωρήσεως δικαιωθῆναι δι' αὐτοῦ, "to be justified by a gracious pardon through him:" that this is the righteousness of God, ὅταν τις χάριτι δικαιωθῇ ἔνθα πᾶσα ἁμαρτία ἠφάνισται,§ "when a man is so justified by grace, that all his sin is made to vanish away."

Thirdly, They add, that we are then righteous with the righteousness of God, when we are justified, μὴ ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, "not by the works of the law, but by the grace of God."

Ἐκείνη γὰρ ἡ προτέρα νόμου καὶ ἔργων δικαιοσύνη, αὕτη δὲ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνη, "The first," saith Chrysostom, "is justification by the law; this, that of God." I conclude then in the words of Gataker against Gomarus, producing this very text for the same purpose as the bishop doth, Quid ferè clarius contra se producere poterat quàm illud, 2 Cor. v. 21.

The second text, produced by the bishop, contains these words, "Of him are you in Christ Jesus, who is made unto us of God, wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption."

Ans. From these words it is evident, that Christ is in no other sense said to be made unto us "righteousness," than he is said to be made to us "wisdom, sanctification, and redemption." Hence therefore, I retort the argument thus: Christ is not here said to be made unto us of God, wisdom, sanctification, and redemption, by his wisdom, sanctification, and redemption imputed to us; therefore he is not here said to be made our righteousness, by his righteousness or active obedience imputed to us. The consequence is evident; for they who hence say that Christ is made our righteousness by his righteousness imputed to us, have the same reason to say from this text, that he is made our wisdom by his wisdom, and our sanctification by his holiness, and our redemption by his redemption imputed to us. The antecedent is also evident: for,

First, It is evidently absurd to say we are made wise by the same wisdom with which Christ was, imputed to us.

And, Secondly, If we are made sanctification by the holiness of Christ imputed to us, there can be no necessity that we ourselves should "have our fruit unto holiness, that the end may be eternal life" (Rom. vi. 22); nor can it be true, that, "without (personal) sanctification, no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14); nor could it be necessary that he should give up himself to the death for his church, that "he might sanctify her" (Eph. v. 25—27); he having done this completely by the holiness of his life imputed to her.

And, Thirdly, The redemption here mentioned being distinguished from, and following justification and sanctification, it must import the redemption of the body from corruption; now, is it not absurd to say that the redemption of Christ's body from corruption is imputed to us? and will it not hence follow, that we are not to expect any personal redemption of our own bodies from corruption? It remains then to say, with the ancient commentators,* that Christ is made to us wisdom, by being αἴτιος τῆς σοφίας, "the author of our spiritual wisdom;" of our justification, τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν τὴν ἄφεσιν ἐωρησίμενος,† "by procuring for us, by his death," that "remission of sins," in which consisteth our justification; our sanctification, τὸ Πνεῦμα χαριζόμενος, "by giving us the Spirit of sanctification;" and our redemption, by procuring for us, τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιοικίδος, "the redemption of life," or of our bodies, "from corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 21. 23).

Thirdly, Whereas the bishop argues that "the old covenant which saith, Do this, and live, Lev. xviii. 5, is not disannulled or abrogated by the covenant of grace, especially as to the obedience it requires from us in order to the life it promiseth;" because the apostle saith, Rom. iii. 31, "Do we then make void the law through faith? nay, we establish the law, and because otherwise the laws of God would be mutable:" one would wonder how he could fall into so plain a contradiction to the express words of the apostle, in his plea for justification by faith, and not by the works of the law; in his frequent declarations, not only of the freedom of Christians from the yoke of the law, but also of the necessity of the change of the law; and much more how he could do it from those words, which, considered with the context, are a full confutation of his doctrine. For,

First, The apostle saith twice expressly, that the righteousness of the law which he disputes against, and by which "no man can be justified before God," is that very righteousness which saith, Lev. xviii. 5, "The man that doeth these things, shall live in and by them" (see Rom. x. 5, Gal. iii. 12).

Secondly, Paul having declared that the law was only given "till the promised seed should come," Gal. iii. 19, and that he being come, we were no longer under the pedagogy of the law; that Christians were "dead to the law, through the body of Christ," Rom. vii. 4, that it was "evacuated," 2 Cor. iii. 11, and they were "loosed from the law, that being dead wherein they were held," Rom. vii. 6, that they were redeemed from it by Christ, Gal. iv. 5, and ought no more to be subject to the "yoke of bondage," or return to those "beggarly elements," ver. 9, v. 1, that it was only to continue to the "time of reformation," Heb. ix. 10, that "the priesthood being changed, there was made of necessity a change also of the law," vii. 12, and that "there was a disannulling of the commandment going before, because of the weakness and unprofitableness of it," ver. 18, and that God by speaking of a new covenant, πεπαλαίωκε, "had pronounced the first old; and that that which decayeth and waxeth old was ready to vanish away," viii. 13, and lastly, that there was to be "a removal of those things which were shaken," i. e. of the law given with the shaking of the earth, xii. 25—27, with many things of a like nature; that, after all this, the bishop should so positively say, that "the covenant of grace had not disannulled, but established this old law," and speak of it as an absurdity, that those laws of his should be mutable, which he himself declared were only to continue "till the promised seed should come," and "till the time of reformation," is matter of just admiration. And,

Thirdly, This is still the infelicity of the assertors of this doctrine, that the texts they produce for it, considered with relation to the context, are the fullest confutation of it. For the apostle is proving, from ver. 14 of this chapter to the end of the fourth, that "no flesh can be justified by the works of the law," ver. 16, and that the justification, which is of God, is manifested to be "by faith, without the works of the law," and he concludes the argument of this chapter thus, λογιζόμεθα οὖν, "We reckon therefore," from the premises, "that a man is justified by faith, without the works of the law," ver. 28. Now, can he, who is only justified by the works of the law accounted as if performed by himself,

* Œcum. † Hilar. Diac. ‡ Œcum. § Chrysost. Theoph.

* Chrysost. † Theod. Theoph.

be justified by faith alone, without the works of the law? The ancient commentators here say,

First, That the apostle, by the word* ἱστῶμεν, "We establish," or make the law to stand, shows it to be, κείμενον, σαλευόμενον, καταλελυμένον, "fallen, shaken, and dissolved;" and that non evacuat legem cùm illam cessare debere jam docet;† and that "he doth not make void the law by teaching that it must now cease."

Secondly, They give two senses of these words; first, that he established the law, by establishing the work of the law, which was δίκαιον ποιῆσαι τὸν ἄνθρωπον, "to make man righteous;" for the law being not able to do this through the infirmity of the flesh (Rom. viii. 3), subjecting all men to sin, faith hath performed it, ὁμοῦ γάρ τις ἐπίστευσε καὶ ἐδικαιώθη, "for, as soon as a man believes, he is justified:" so Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact.

Thirdly, We establish the law by faith, saith Theodoret, because the law and the prophets have given in their testimony to the justification by faith, Rom. iii. 21, 22, the law by giving us the knowledge of sin, ver. 20, the prophets, by saying, Hab. ii. 4, "The just shall live by faith," and so becoming "our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, who is the end of the law, εἰς δικαιοσύνην, for justification," Rom. x. 4, Gal. iv. 24; δεχόμενοι τοίνυν τὴν πιστιν βεβαιοῦμεν τὸν νόμον, "so that, by embracing faith, we establish the law," saith Theodoret. And this I conceive to be the truest interpretation of the text.

Fourthly, The bishop argues from the title of "surety" given to Christ, Heb. vii. 22. "For," saith he, p. 90, "a surety is bound to pay our debt, in case we are insolvent. Now, there are two things we owe to God, first, obedience to his laws, as he is our creator and governor; and, secondly, and by consequence, the punishment that is annexed to the breach of those laws of which we are guilty. Now, though Christ should pay the latter part of our debt for us, by bearing the punishment that is due unto us; yet if he did not pay the former, and principal part of it too, i. e. perform the obedience which we owe to God, he would not fully have performed the office of suretyship, which he undertook for us, and so would be but a half Mediator, and half Saviour." Now here it may deserve to be observed,

First, That the bishop cites this passage to prove our obligation to perform obedience to the old law, from a chapter which expressly teacheth that, "the priesthood being changed, there was a necessity of the change of the law," ver. 12, and that "there was a disannulling of the commandment, by reason of the weakness and unprofitableness of it," ver. 18, and that "the law made nothing perfect," ver. 19.

Secondly, This passage is produced to prove that Christ was our surety for the performance of the old covenant; whereas the text saith expressly, he was "the surety of a better covenant," which introduced "a better hope," ver. 19, and was "established upon better promises," viii. 6, even "a new covenant" opposed to the old, as to that which was "ready to vanish away;" and which "through his death" procured the "remission of sins, committed under the old covenant," ix. 15.

Thirdly, Ἔγγυος, "a sponsor," say the civilians, is only one that promiseth for another, and so he is obliged to do no more for him than he promised: and I have shown already, that neither could Christ promise to yield perfect obedience to the law for us, nor could the Father consent that we should be accounted as obedient to it upon such a promise. And, lastly, his fancy, that we can stand bound to yield perfect obedience to the law, so as never to offend; and yet to undergo the punishment due to all our transgressions; and that, without doing both, no satisfaction can be made to justice, and no title to eternal life can be procured, will be proved false in the ensuing section; at present, therefore, I shall only add, that it seems to me as ridiculous, as to say a thief cannot satisfy the law by being hanged, unless he also did yield perfect obedience to the law, which saith, "Thou shalt not steal."

This is all that the bishop hath produced to confirm this doctrine; others produce some other arguments from scripture, which shall here briefly be considered; as, v. g.

First, That the apostle teacheth that "as by one man's (Adam's) disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one many shall be made righteous" (Rom. v. 19); but men were made sinners by the disobedience of Adam imputed to them; therefore by the active obedience or righteousness of Christ imputed to us we must be made righteous.

Ans. This is the only text of scripture which speaks of the obedience of Christ, and of our being justified, or made righteous by it, and so hath any true appearance of an argument; and yet that it is only an appearance, is evident from this one consideration, that the apostle, in that whole chapter, speaketh not one word of the antecedent obedience of Christ's life, but only of his passive obedience; i. e. his obedience to the death.

For the apostle having said (iv. 24) that "Christ was delivered to death for our sins, and raised again for our justification:" he adds (v. 1), that, being "justified by this faith" in Christ's death, "we have peace with God;" he dying "for sinners, and for the ungodly" (ver. 6. 8), and we "being justified by his blood," and "reconciled to God by his death" (ver. 9, 10), and then follows this comparison, with a δι᾽ ἑνὸς τοῦτο, intimating that it was made upon the account of our Lord's salutary passion, and ran thus: That as death, the punishment of sin, passed upon all men, by reason of one sin of one man; so, through one righteousness of one Jesus Christ, the free gift came upon all men to justification of life (ver. 18), and this justification is, saith the apostle, ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων, "from many transgressions;" and what can justification from offences signify, but freedom from the condemnation due unto us for them? now that can never be obtained for sinners by Christ's active obedience, for could we, after many offences committed, perform as perfect obedience as Christ did, we only could thereby perform our duty for the future, but could do nothing to procure the pardon of our past offences. Thirdly, The disobedience by which many were made sinners, is plainly declared by the apostle to be one single act of disobedience in Adam, and therefore the obedience opposed to it cannot in reason be the active obedience of Christ's whole life, but that obedience to the death which the apostle mentions, Phil. ii. 8. Now, by this passive obedience we cannot be made formally righteous, but only metonymically, by being made partakers of that freedom from the guilt and punishment of sin, and of that reconciliation which Christ hath purchased by his meritorious death and passion.

Secondly, I answer, that it was not by Adam's active disobedience imputed to us, that death or condemnation to it passed upon all men, but by the punishment he suffered for that disobedience, as will be fully proved hereafter; for he being by that disobedience made mortal, and obnoxious to death, γεγόνασιν ἐξ ἐκείνου πάντες θνητοί, "all, that were begotten of him, became mortal," say all the Greek commentators here; and so by the obedience of Christ to the death in their stead who were thus obnoxious to death, or by his suffering that death which was the punishment of sin, we became justified; i. e. exempted from that punishment.

Obj. 2. Secondly, Whereas it is said, Rom. viii. 3, 4, that Christ by being "made sin for us," i. e. a sacrifice for sin, "condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us," &c., hence some conclude that Christ's active obedience must be imputed to us; for, say they, the righteousness of the law can in no sense be said to be fulfilled, in or by us, but only by Christ's perfect obedience to the law imputed to us.

Ans. The text by no means will admit of this interpretation. For,

First, The righteousness here mentioned is not to be fulfilled, ἐν Χριστῷ, in or by Christ, but ἐν ἡμῖν, by us personally.

Secondly, It is not to be fulfilled by the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us, but by our "walking in the Spirit," for "to be spiritually minded is life," ver. 6, "and if through the Spirit we do mortify the deeds of the flesh, we shall live," ver. 13, "for as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are sons of God," ver. 14, and, being sons, are "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ, and to be glorified with him," ver. 17. Whence it is exceeding evident, that the righteousness here mentioned is to be fulfilled, not by the imputation of the righteousness of another to us, but by our own obedience performed by the assistance of God's Holy Spirit.

SECT. III.

I hope I have returned a sufficient answer to the texts alleged to prove the necessity of the imputation of Christ's active and perfect obedience to the law to us for righteousness.

It remains now that I should propound those arguments which, in my judgment, seem fully to confute that doctrine, and they are these.

Arg. 1. (1.) This doctrine is contrary to all those scriptures which expressly say, that faith is imputed to us for righteousness, and which prove this from the example of Abraham, the father of the faithful; for they inform us that "Abraham believed in God, and it (i. e. this faith of his) was imputed to him for righteousness," Rom. iv. 3, and ver. 5, that "to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifies the ungodly" (that is, in God the Father, for "it is God that justifieth," Rom. viii. 33), "his faith is imputed to him for justification;" and ver. 9, "We say then that faith was imputed to Abraham εἰς δικαιοσύνην, for justification;" and, ver. 20. 22, "He was strong in faith, giving glory to God, wherefore it (i. e. this faith) was imputed to him for justification." Whence the apostle makes this general conclusion, that what the scripture saith of Abraham, viz. that his faith was imputed to him for righteousness, "was not written for his sake alone, but for us also, to whom it (that is, the like faith) shall be imputed (for righteousness), if we believe on him who raised up Jesus from the dead" (that is, on God the Father). In the third chapter of the Epistle to the Galatians he repeats the same example of the faith of Abraham, saying, "Abraham believed in God, and it (i. e. his faith in God) was imputed to him for righteousness" ver. 6, and thence he makes this inference: "Know, therefore, that they who are (the children) of faith, are the sons of Abraham;" and ver. 9, that "they who are of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham:" and ver. 24, he adds, that "the law was our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith, the scripture foreseeing that God would justify the gentiles through faith." Now hence,

First, It is evident that the doctrine of justification by the very act of faith is expressly and frequently delivered in the holy scriptures, whereas it hath been proved already, that the doctrine of the imputation of Christ's active righteousness to us for justification hath no ground in scripture.

Secondly, What interpretation of the apostle's words can be more uncouth and unsound than this, "Faith is imputed to us for righteousness;" i. e. it is not faith, but Christ's active righteousness, which is imputed to us for righteousness? Is not this evidently to convert the apostle's affirmative into a negative, to deny constantly what he as constantly asserts, and to make him always mean what, in relation to justification, he doth never say? "To him that believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith," saith the apostle, "is imputed;" it is not his faith, saith this interpretation, but Christ's righteousness which is thus imputed. And how then doth God justify the ungodly, if he only justifies them who have as true a title to Christ's perfect obedience, as if they had personally performed it, and upon that account alone are justified; can they be styled "the ungodly," who are and must be as righteous as Christ was, before they can be justified?

Thirdly, This interpretation cannot possibly agree to the faith of Abraham; for it is not only said that "he believed in God," not in the righteousness of Christ, but that his faith was in that "God who quickens the dead, and calleth the things that are not, as if they were" (ver. 17); "that he was strong in faith, being fully persuaded, that what God had promised, he was able to perform." It therefore is evident, that it was faith in God's promise, and in his power to perform it, by which Abraham was justified. Now what affinity hath this faith with Christ's obedience to the law, not yet given, as the apostle argues, Gal. iii. 17, though it hath an evident affinity with God's promise, of justifying him that believeth in Jesus, and who believeth "in that God who hath raised up Jesus from the dead?" (Rom. iv. 24.)

Arg. 2. (2.) This will be farther evident from all those places which show that our justification consists entirely in the remission of sin, and that to be justified and to be freed from condemnation, or to have the guilt and punishment of our sins remitted, are phrases of the same import. This we may learn,

First, From those arguments by which the apostle proves that Jew and gentile are to be justified by faith without the works of the law; viz. (1.) because both Jew and gentile lay under sin (Rom. iii. 9), and so both needed to be justified by faith, or by an act of grace, pardoning their sins, through faith in Christ (ver. 24); that therefore "by the law no flesh can be justified, because by the law is the knowledge of sin," rendering us obnoxious to condemnation; where then there remains the guilt of sin, there can be no justification; where therefore there is a remission of the guilt of sin by God, there is our justification. Again, "All have sinned, saith he, and fallen short of the glory of God," therefore absolution from this sin must be sufficient to make us obtain this glory of God. We who have thus sinned "are justified," saith he, "freely by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus" (ver. 24). Now, what is this redemption? It is, saith the apostle twice, "remission of sins," Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14. To the same effect, he saith, Gal. iii. 21, 22, that justification cannot be by the law, because the law cannot give life; and this it cannot do, because the scripture hath "concluded all under sin," and so hath shut out that way of being justified: our freedom therefore from the guilt of sin must be sufficient for our justification to life. In the fourth chapter to the Romans he describes that justification in which faith is accounted to us for righteousness, by the non-imputation and forgiveness of sin, and proves this from the words of David, saying, "Blessed is the man, whose iniquity is forgiven, and whose sin is covered; blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth no sin" (ver. 4—8). Since then the blessedness, of which the apostle there discourseth, is that of justification of the ungodly by faith; and since this blessedness is said to consist in the remission, the covering, the not imputing his sin to him, it cannot reasonably be denied, that the blessedness of a justified person is here described by the blessedness of a pardoned person, as being one and the same thing.

Secondly, This will be farther evident from the consideration of the phrases the apostle useth as equivalent to justification, and interpretative of it. As,

First, Reconciliation to God; that this is the same with justification, appears by these words, "Much more, being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath by him: for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life," Rom. v. 9, 10, where, being justified by his blood, and being reconciled by his death, seem plainly the same thing; now, that reconciliation is effected by the remission of sins is evident from these words, 2 Cor. v. 19, "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses to them," and therefore justification must be so obtained.

Secondly, Justification stands directly opposed to condemnation in these words, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? τίς ἐγκαλέσει κατὰ, who shall object a crime against them? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth them?" Rom. viii. 33, 34. And again, "If the ministration of condemnation," i. e. the law which renders us obnoxious to condemnation, "was glorious, much more the ministration, τῆς δικαιοσύνης, of justification exceeds in glory:" now, what is it that mankind is accused of, or charged with by the law, but sin? What do they stand condemned for at God's bar, but the transgression of his law? Justification therefore, which stands opposed to it, must be a clearing and discharging them from the guilt or the condemning power of sin.

Thirdly, Justification is said to be from sin; "By him all that believe are justified, ἐκ πάντων, from all those sins from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses," Acts xiii. 39, and again, "The judgment was from one sin to condemnation, but the free gift to justification, ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων, from many sins," Rom. v. 16. Now, what can justification from sin signify, besides our absolution from the guilt of sin?

Fourthly, The justifying the believer, and the remission of his sins, are only different expressions of the same thing, as is apparent from these words, "God hath justified us freely by his grace, having set forth Christ to be the propitiation for our sins, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness in the remission of sins to those who have this faith" (Rom. xxiii. 24, 25); i. e. to manifest the way of justification by faith, which he alone admits of for the remission of sins.

Fifthly, "We are justified," saith the apostle, "through the redemption that is in Jesus, through faith in his blood," Rom. iii. 24, 25, "through his blood," Rom. v. 9. Now what doth this blood procure for us? "Remission of sins," Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14, it being "shed for the remission of sins," Matt. xxvi. 28. What benefit have believers by it? "He hath loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood," Rev. i. 5. "He hath made peace for them by the blood of the cross," Col. i. 20, with a God only angry for sin; he hath obtained eternal redemption from transgressions by it, Heb. ix. 12. 15, by all which equivalent expressions it appears that God's justifying the sinner, in Paul's sense of the expression, is his absolving him from the guilt of his past sins, from punishment and condemnation by the law for them, by an act of grace, and free pardon of them through the blood of Jesus, his being as fully reconciled to us as if we never had offended against the former covenant we were all under, till that new covenant was established in the blood of Jesus, which promises God would be "merciful to our iniquities," and would "remember our sins no more," Heb. viii. 12.

Now this observation perfectly destroys the imputation of Christ's active obedience to us for righteousness, since they who contend for that doctrine do make remission of sins but one half of justification, and Christ's active obedience imputed to us still necessary to procure us a title to eternal life; and that by the first, p. 72, "God only looks upon us as perfectly innocent, and therefore not fit to be cast down to hell; whereas, by the other, he looks upon us as perfectly righteous, and therefore fit to be brought up to heaven." Secondly, These two things are plainly needless and inconsistent: for he that is discharged from the guilt of all his sins must also be discharged from that penal death which is the wages of sin, and so must, by that freedom, have a title to life; for, between freedom from condemnation and absolution, freedom from the death due to sin and the gift of life, in subjects capable of either,* there is no medium. Moreover, either this want of righteousness is our sin, or it is not; if it be not, then, as it is not our duty to be thus righteous in order to our justification before God, so neither can we be under that covenant which saith, "Do this, and live," nor can Christ's active obedience be necessary on that account; if it be our sin, then must the want of it be forgiven by the remission of all our sins: whereas, if God requires that Christ's perfect obedience should be imputed to us, the want of it neither is nor can be forgiven, since then God must impute that as sin to us. And hence ariseth a third argument against the imputation of Christ's active and perfect obedience to us for justification, viz.

Arg. 3. (3.) That it renders the death of Christ to procure the remission of our sins vain, and that upon many accounts.

First, Because the perfect righteousness of Christ, imputed to us, doth render his death unnecessary to procure any farther righteousness or justification in our behalf; for, if by virtue of this imputation we be as righteous as Christ was in his life, there can be no more need that Christ should die for us, than that he should die for himself, or any other should die for him; yea, then Christ, dying only for the benefit of believers, could not have died for the unjust, but only for the just, i. e. for them for whom there could be no necessity that he should die, but only that he should live for them; seeing faith in him as a Mediator, performing perfect obedience to the law for them, must make them persons for whom there could be no necessity that he should die, but only that he should live for them; seeing faith in him as a Mediator, performing perfect obedience to the law for them, must make them for whom he thus obeyed perfectly obedient, and therefore must have given them a full title to the promise, "Do this, and live." Add to this, that perfect obedience is unsinning obedience, and sure there can be no necessity that Christ should die for the sins of them who by his life had performed unsinning obedience. To strengthen this argument, consider that Christ performed his active obedience to the law entirely before he suffered for our sins; and so this righteousness, being first performed and purchased for us, should be first imputed, and made over to us; and might, for any thing I can perceive to the contrary, have been imputed to all that believed in him before he actually suffered; yea, to all such persons, though he had returned to heaven without dying. For seeing nothing more can be required to a perfect justification from the condemnation of the law than a perfect righteousness, i. e. a perfect fulfilling of the law, there could be no need of satisfaction made to divine justice, for any violations of it, since that must necessarily suppose that law not perfectly fulfilled by Christ upon their account.

Secondly, According to this doctrine there remains no place for the remission of sins to believers, for God neither did nor could forgive any sin in Christ, because he was perfectly righteous, "and in him was no sin;" if then believers be righteous, with the same righteousness imputed to them with which Christ was righteous, they must be as completely righteous as Christ was, and so have no more sin to be pardoned than he had, and so no more need to be pardoned than he had; whereas the apostle saith that "if we (Christians) sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins" (1 John ii. 1): thus doth that doctrine destroy Christ's intercession for us, according to the words now cited; and also the necessity of his salutary passion, according to those words of Paul, "If righteousness (i. e. justification) come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain:" for if righteousness cannot come by the law, it cannot come by Christ's perfect obedience to the law; but if it can, then the apostle's inference is plainly this, that "Christ is dead in vain," i. e. there could be no necessity of his dying upon this account, that we had personally transgressed the law, since he who hath a righteousness, or an obedience to the law, imputed to him, as perfect as was that of Christ, can be no more condemned for transgressing the law than Christ himself.

Thirdly, According to this doctrine God can see no sin in believers; for certain it is, he saw no sin in Christ: if then believers be righteous, with a righteousness as perfect as Christ's was, imputed to them, he can see no more sin in them than he beheld in Christ.

Fourthly, This doctrine renders it unnecessary for a believer to repent, at least, of sins committed after he truly hath believed: for our repentance must suppose an antecedent failure, since that time, in our obedience; whereas, there being no such failure in the active obedience of Christ, if that, by imputation, be made as much and truly the obedience of believers as if they personally had performed it, there can be no failure in the obedience of a believer, and so no place for his repentance. The perfect obedience which Christ performed to the law, was the reason why he needed no repentance; if then, through faith, it be as much theirs by imputation as if they personally had performed it, must it not be equally a reason why they need no repentance? Lastly, The assertors of this doctrine say, Christ's perfect obedience must be imputed to believers, that they may have a just title to eternal life by virtue of this precept, "Do this, and live:" this title he who is a sinner, i. e. a violater of the law, requiring perfect obedience, can never have; and therefore he who needs repentance cannot have it, that being only needful for the remission of sins, and that we may live and not die.

Arg. 4. (4.) This doctrine renders it unnecessary to have any personal inherent righteousness; for as Christ's passive obedience, sustained in our stead, makes it unnecessary, if not unjust, that we should personally suffer any punishment for the remission of those sins which render us obnoxious to death; so in like manner must Christ's active and perfect obedience to the law, imputed to us, render it as unnecessary that we should personally be righteous, by doing righteousness, that we may live; for if we can be as righteous as Christ was without doing righteousness, sure we need not be more than so: yea, then we may have a title to life eternal, without any inherent righteousness; and so there can be no need of "having our fruit unto holiness," that the end may be eternal life.

* Inter privativa opposita non datur medium.

The good bishop saw the absurdity of a consequence so obstructive of all practical Christianity, and so plainly excusing all men from any necessity of living "righteously, soberly, and godly in this present world:" he therefore saith, p. 89, "I believe the active obedience of Christ will stand me in no stead, unless I endeavour after sincere obedience in my person; his active as well as his passive obedience being imputed to none but only to them who apply it to themselves by faith, which faith will certainly put such as are possessed with it upon obedience." Where the bishop did well to deny the conclusion, seeing the consequence was so evident from his own words that he could not formally deny it; for if, as he saith, p. 86, "Christ covenanted to perform those duties which were due from man to God, provided what he thus did should wholly be put on the account of man; and the Father was pleased to consent to this motion:" can the Father, after this consent, require that man himself should perform all or any of those duties to God which Christ already had performed on his account? If, as he saith, p. 87, "Christ performed that obedience only on the account of those whose nature he had assumed, as they, by faith, lay hold upon it; and God, by grace, imputes this obedience to them, as if it had been performed by them in their own persons:" can God require that, after Christ's performance of it perfectly, they should imperfectly perform the same again! Or, after the imputation of Christ's perfect obedience to them, as fully as if they had performed it personally, require that they should perform it personally? When Christ, "by his obedience imputed to them, hath entitled them to eternal life;" as he saith, p. 88; can it be still necessary that they should have their fruit unto holiness, that the end may be eternal life? (Rom. vi. 22;) when, as he saith, p. 89, under the new covenant, "obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient;" can personal obedience be required of us by the same covenant?

To say, that "faith will put the person that is possessed of it upon obedience to God," is nothing to the purpose; for the question is, not what faith will do, but what he is obliged to do, who by this faith is as much entitled to Christ's perfect obedience, as if it had been personally performed by him; and what God, after this perfect obedience imputed to him, can require him to do, in order to that eternal life which this perfect obedience imputed hath given him a certain title to, whether it be necessary for him, after this, "by patient continuance in well-doing, to seek for glory and immortality, that he may have eternal life,"* and, "through the Spirit, to mortify the deeds of the flesh, that he may live;"† and to "live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world, that he may comfortably expect the blessed hope."‡ I conclude then in the words of the beloved apostle, Good Christians, "let no man deceive you," not he who applies Christ's active righteousness to himself, though he never did it, but "he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he (i. e. Christ) is righteous."§

Arg. 5. (5.) It is a thing impossible, that, by the obedience of another imputed to us, we can obtain a title to the life promised by that law, which saith, "Do this, and live."

1. Because the law requires personal obedience that we may live, by saying, "The man that doeth these things shall live by (doing) them;" and this the bishop grants by saying p. 89, "The obedience the old covenant required as absolutely necessary, was that of our own persons;" whereas the obedience of another cannot be our personal obedience, nor can it be imputed to us but by the relaxation of the law, which requires of us personal obedience; and so our personal obedience, which is the only thing required by the law must be remitted, that we may be made righteous with the righteousness of another. To make this farther evident, let it be noted, that men do generally mistake, when they say Christ, by his sufferings in our stead, made satisfaction to the law, which said, "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die the death:" this he could not possibly do, because the law expressly saith, "The soul that sinneth he shall die;" and only threatened death to the person that violates the law. He indeed made a satisfaction to divine justice, by suffering, in our stead, that death which justice might have personally inflicted upon us; but then this admission of another to suffer in our stead is a full relaxation of that law, which required us personally to suffer, and an entire remission of the punishment of the law required of us personally; and so it is also in this case.

2. Because the law requires unsinning obedience, saying, "Cursed is the man that continueth not in all things written in the law to do them,"* not promising any pardon to the sinner; so that, unless Christ's righteousness imputed to us can make us never to have been sinners, and so never to have needed forgiveness of sin, it cannot afford us a legal righteousness. Hence the apostle saith, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law," not by his continuance in all things written in the law to do them, but by suffering the punishment which the law threatened to offenders, to wit, by being hanged on the tree.

Arg. 6. (6.) This doctrine partly answers and partly confutes all the arguments which the apostle useth in his Epistles to the Romans and the Galatians, to prove that justification must be by faith only, and not at all by the works of the law. For,

First, This doctrine destroys that argument of Paul, by which he proves, that no man can be justified by the works of the law, because all men have sinned, and therefore stand condemned by the law of works; affording a full answer to it by saying, that though we could not be thus justified by our own personal obedience, we might be justified by Christ's active obedience imputed to us, that being perfect obedience to the law.

Secondly, Whereas neither the apostle nor the holy scripture saith, that Christ was righteous or obedient to the law for us, or that by his obedience to the law imputed to us we are made legally righteous, but absolutely denies that righteousness could have been by the law, because the law could not give life: "for," saith Paul, Gal. iii. 21, "had there been a law which could have given life, verily righteousness (i. e. justification to life) should have been by the law:" this doctrine plainly contradicts those words of the apostle, by introducing a necessity of perfect obedience to the law, that we may live; and contending that we must be entitled to eternal life, according to the tenor of that law, which saith, "Do this, and live," p. 88, 89.

Thirdly, Whereas this doctrine makes it necessary that the reward should be of works as well as of grace, yea, of the works of that law which saith, "Do this, and live;" Paul put these things in an absolute opposition to each other: and represents the one as entirely destructive of the other. "For," saith he, "to him that worketh, a reward is not reckoned, κατὰ χάριν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὸ ὀφείλημα, of grace, but of debt; but to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifies the ungodly, his faith (without works) is imputed for righteousness, even as David speaketh of the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness, χωρὶς ἔργων, without works" (Rom. iv. 4—6); whereas God cannot impute justification or righteousness to any without works, if he impute it to them only to whom Christ's perfect works of righteousness belong: nor can this righteousness be "of grace, through faith," and "not of debt," if it belongs to them only who are "debtors to fulfil the whole law;" since the apostle saith expressly, that they who are thus debtors to fulfil the law, or sought for justification by fulfilling it, are "fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4): nor can it be here said that they were not indeed debtors to fulfil it personally, but only to have that obedience by which Christ fulfilled it imputed to them: for the apostle saith, in the immediate preceding words, "Christ is become of none effect to you, whosoever of you are seeking to be justified by the law;" whereas he could not be of none effect to them, who was the only person by whom they were enabled to perform that law to their justification. Again, the apostle puts this plain difference betwixt that righteousness which is by faith, and by the works of the law, that the first requires only believing from the heart to salvation; the second requires works excluding grace, by saying, "He that doeth these things shall live by (doing) them" (Rom. x. 5. 9, 10); whence he argues thus, that "if justification be of grace, it is not of works, otherwise grace is no more grace; and, if it be of works, it is not of grace, otherwise work is no more work" (Rom. xi. 6).

Fourthly, This doctrine flatly contradicts all the places in which the apostle positively asserts, that "by the works of the law can no man be justified, but by faith only, or by faith without the works of the law;" as Rom. iii. 20. 22. 24; for, if a man be justified by the righteousness of Christ imputed to him, he must be justified by the works of the law, because the active obedience of Christ consists as truly in the performance of those works, as our own personal righteousness would have done. Moreover, if the righteousness of God consisted in the imputation of Christ's legal righteousness, it could not be manifested, as the apostle saith it is, "without the works of the law;" because, to such a righteousness, the works of the law are plainly necessary.

So again, when he saith, Gal. ii. 16, "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we ourselves have believed in Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law:" doth not this doctrine contradict these words, by teaching that we are to be justified by the works of the law performed by Christ, and imputed to us, as if we personally had performed them? For Christ's performance of them alters not the nature and property of the works, they being still the works of the law, whosoever doeth them: and so he that is justified by them, done by another in his stead, must be still justified by the works of the law.

Note also here, that the apostle doth not say a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the works of Jesus Christ, or not by the works of the law, as performed by us, but only as performed by Christ; but on the contrary saith, "We have believed that we might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law," excluding the works of the law from justification by faith in Christ; whereas this doctrine makes faith entitle us to the works of the law, performed by Christ, and made over to us for our justification.

Thirdly, When the apostle argues thus, "That no man is justified by the works of the law is manifest, because the scripture saith, The just shall live by faith, but the law is not of faith," i. e. it speaks nothing of, and promiseth no justification to any man by faith, but only saith, "The man that doeth these things (which are required of him by the law) shall live by (doing) them" (Gal. iii. 11, 12): doth not that doctrine fully contradict these words, which saith, The man that is justified by faith must do the things required by the law, that he may live, and must have a true title to a perfect observance of the law, in order to that end?

Fourthly, When the apostle saith, "If they who are (observers) of the law be heirs (with faithful Abraham, who was justified by faith) faith is made void," as being insufficient to justify us without the observation of the law (Rom. iv. 14): doth not this doctrine say also, that faith is insufficient to justify us, without the observation of the law, and so as plainly make void justification by faith? Doth it not also make them heirs who are observers of the law, as having life by virtue of a legal righteousness imputed to them, as fully as if it had been personally performed by them?

And though these things are so clear that they need no farther confirmation, yet may it here be noted, that whereas not one of these scriptures can be wrested from the plain sense they literally bear, or from asserting that no justification can be had by the works of the law, but by this distinction, that true indeed it is, that no justification can be had by the works of the law, personally performed by us, but it may be had by the perfect obedience of Christ imputed to us; the apostle, throughout this whole discourse against justification by the works of the law, never gives the least hint of this distinction: and whereas the bishop places the better half of justification, to wit, that which gives us a title to eternal life, in this perfect righteousness of Christ imputed to us by faith, the apostle mentions not one word of this in either of his epistles, but in both sums up the matter so as plainly to demonstrate that he meant no such thing. For in his Epistle to the Romans,* he thus concludes, τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; "What is it then that we say? (even this,) That Israel following after the law of righteousness hath not attained to the law of righteousness, because they sought it not by faith, but as (if) it were (to be obtained) by the works of the law." Now, might they not, according to this doctrine, that the works of the law, performed by Christ, are upon our faith imputed to us for righteousness, as truly as if they had been personally performed by us, have sought it both by faith and by the works of the law? In his Epistle to the Galatians,* he concludes thus, "Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty (from the observance of the law to justification) in which Christ hath made you free, and be not again entangled in the yoke of bondage: behold, I testify to you, that, if you be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing;" mark the reason, ver. 3, "For every one that is circumcised is a debtor to the whole law:" whence the argument runs thus: Him that is a debtor to do the whole law, Christ will profit nothing; but (saith the bishop) every Christian is a debtor to perform the whole law, for what else can be the import of these words, p. 89, "The old covenant which saith, Do this, and live, Lev. xviii. 5, is not disannulled, but rather established by the covenant of grace, especially as to the obedience it requires from us in order to the life it promiseth?" therefore (according to the apostle) Christ can profit him nothing. Now, how could the apostle have made this inference, had he believed, as the bishop did, that even faith itself could profit us nothing without entitling us to that obedience which the law requires from us, as performed by Christ our surety: surely this doctrine saith, in full contradiction to Paul, that nothing but Christ's active obedience can profit us as to the life which the law promiseth, and that for this very reason, that we are still debtors to perform the whole law. In fine, the great indignation of the Jews against the apostles, for teaching the doctrine of justification by faith, was this, that by it he made void the law as to justification; but had he only sought it in the sense of the bishop, he had, as the bishop contends, "not disannulled, but rather had established the law," even as to justification of life, and so must rather have ingratiated himself with, than so incensed the Jews against him; since then he must have said what would have been highly acceptable to them, viz. that their law was still of a perpetual and necessary obligation even in order to justification, and that Christ himself had so established it, as to enable both us and them to yield perfect obedience to it, in order to that life it promised.

Arg. 7. (7.) The apostle saith expressly, Rom. iii. 24, that "we are justified freely by God's grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus," i. e. through the remission of sins purchased by his blood, for "we have redemption through his blood, even the remission of sins," Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14, and ver. 25, that "God hath set forth Christ as a propitiation through faith in his blood, that he might be the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus;" and v. 9, that "we are justified by his blood, and reconciled to God by his death;" ver. 10, that "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law," by suffering that death the law pronounced accursed, Gal. iii. 11, that Christ "entering once into the holy place, by his blood hath purchased eternal redemption for us," Heb. ix. 12; and that, through Christ's will to suffer for us, "we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Christ," Heb. x. 10, ascribing our justification, our reconciliation to God, our propitiation, our redemption from the curse of the law, our eternal redemption, our sanctification in the sacrificial sense, i. e. our freedom from the guilt of sin, for which alone we can be condemned to die, to the death and blood of Christ. Now all this, saith the bishop, p. 90, "makes him but a half Mediator, or half Saviour;" this indeed, says he, frees us from death, but gives us no title to eternal life. "Hence it is," saith he, "that I cannot look upon Christ as having made full satisfaction to God's justice for me, unless he had performed the obedience I owe to God's laws, as well as borne the punishment that is due to my sins," &c., p. 88; so that, according to the bishop, Christ cannot have redeemed us from the curse of the law, by his death for us, or by his blood have obtained eternal redemption for us, that being certainly redemption from dying for ever, or ἀπολύτρωσις τῆς περιποιήσεως, "redemption of life," Eph. ii. 14. And, if our Saviour's blood and passion gives to believers no title to eternal life, why doth the apostle say that "we have freedom to enter into heaven by the blood of Jesus" (Heb. x. 19), and that "by his death," undergone for the redemption of transgressions, "we receive the promise of an eternal inheritance?" (Heb. ix. 15.) Moreover, when God justifies from the guilt of sin, i. e. from transgressing the law, what charge can the law lay against us, as having not performed what it required? Can God be propitious, and fully reconciled to us by the blood shed for us, and yet exclude us from his blissful presence? Can Christ have "brought us nigh to God, and made him at peace with us through the blood of the cross" (Eph. ii. 13. 15), and yet exclude us from the glory of God, who, having peace with him, "rejoice in the glory of God?" (Rom. v. 1, 2.)

Arg. 8. (8.) This doctrine renders it impossible that God should make a covenant of grace with man, and consequently asserts that Christians must be under the same obligations as ever to perform the covenant of works, and this the bishop, p. 89, not only asserts, but contends for. For, how can a man be more under the law, and under the covenant of works, than by being under the obligation to do all that the covenant of works requires, and to yield perfect obedience to the law, that he may be accounted righteous before God? whereas the apostle saith expressly, "We are not under the law, but under grace," Rom. vi. 1; that δικαιοσύνη, "justification, is by faith, that it might be of grace," Rom. iv. 16, that "we are justified freely by the grace of God," not through the active obedience, but "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus," i. e. through the remission of sins procured by his blood; that "by grace we are saved through faith, not of works," Eph. ii. 8, and, in fine, that "if justification be by grace, then is it not of works," Rom. xi. 6.

And this is still more evident from this consideration, that this doctrine plainly makes both the covenants the same; for, where the parties covenanting are the same, the thing covenanted for is the same, if the conditions of the covenants be the same, the covenants must be the same: now here it is certain that the persons covenanting, to wit, God and man, are the same; the thing covenanted for, life and acceptance with God, is the same; if then the condition of both, "Do this, and live," be the same (which is the thing asserted, p. 89), the covenants themselves must be the same.

Nor is it material to answer here in the bishop's words, that the condition of the first covenant was this, "Do this in your own persons, and live;" the condition of the new only, "Do this by yourself, or by your surety, and live;" for even this disjunctive was also contained in the first covenant, or it was not; if it was, then the condition of the first covenant could be only that which is said to have been the condition of the second also, i. e. Do this by thyself, or by another, and live; if it were not, then the doing this by another could not make us legally righteous; because "the law required this obedience in our own persons," saith the bishop, p. 89, "as absolutely necessary;" and so Christ's obedience to the law imputed to us, but not performed by us, could not fulfil that law, which only saith, "Do this in your own persons and live." And evident it is, that the allowing another to do that duty for me, or in my stead, which I owe personally to God, is as truly an exempting me from doing that duty in my own person, as the allowing another to suffer the punishment due to my sins in my stead is an exempting me from suffering that punishment in my own person. And had the bishop attended to his own words, he would have seen this consequence; for his argument, p. 82, "That one man can merit by that which another performs is a plain contradiction; for, in that he merits it is as necessarily implied that he himself acts that by which he is said to merit; but in that he depends upon another's action, it is as necessarily implied that he himself doth not do that by which he is said to merit," by changing the word merit into obey, runs thus, That one person can obey the law by the obedience which another performs, is a plain contradiction; for, in that he obeys, it is as necessarily supposed that he himself doth that by which he is said to obey; but, in that he depends on the obedience of another for the performing that which the law requires of him, it is as necessarily supposed that he himself doth not do that by which he is said to obey the law.

Arg. 9. (9.) As the foundation of this imputation is precarious, there being no evidence in scripture of such a covenant as is here mentioned, p. 86, but only a command laid upon Christ, that he should "lay down his life for his sheep;" so is there in the scripture no such notion of imputation as is here supposed. For,

1. Wheresoever this phrase occurs affirmatively, that such a thing was imputed to such a person, it is some personal action or thing which is thus said to be thus imputed: as when it is said, Rom. ii. 26, "If the uncircumcision (i. e. the uncircumcised person) keep the righteousness of the law, his uncircumcision εἰς περιτομὴν λογισθήσεται, shall be accounted for circumcision;" i. e. he shall be as well accepted, as if he was circumcised: so Rom. iv. 3, "Abraham believed God, and it (that is, his faith) was imputed to him for righteousness:" for so it is explained, ver. 5, in these words, "To him that worketh not, but believeth, his faith is imputed to him for righteousness;" and, ver. 9, "We say that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness:" so also, Gal. iii. 6, James ii. 23, and of our faith in him who raised Christ from the dead, it is said, Rom. iv. 24, "It shall be imputed to us for righteousness."

I also add, that the righteousness of one cannot be truly thus imputed to another by him who speaks of things as they really are. God indeed may and often doth good to one, especially in temporals, for the righteousness of another, as he did to the Jews for the sake of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and at the prayer of Moses and Aaron, in which sense, saith James, "the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much," v. 16; he also showeth mercy to the posterity of them that fear him, for their parents' sake, but he neither doth nor truly can λογίζεσθαι, reckon or repute them righteous, because Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or their parents, were so; because, as sin, so righteousness is a personal action or a habit inherent in the subject that doth it. And, therefore, to remove the common instances which are usually produced with relation to this matter, I add, as the conclusion of what I shall offer on this subject,

Lastly, That in the holy scripture there is no mention of the imputation of any man's sin or righteousness to another, but only of the imputation of his own good deeds for righteousness, or of his evil deeds for punishment. And therefore I say,

First, That it cannot be truly affirmed, that we all sinned in Adam, and by his disobedience were made sinners, because his sin and disobedience were imputed to us: for I have shown already, that the scripture nowhere maketh the least mention of any thing of any other's imputed to us, but only of some personal thing or action of our own, accounted to us for reward or punishment. Moreover, this imputation either makes the sin of Adam truly ours, or it doth not; if it doth not, how can we be made sinners by it? if it doth, then death came upon us for our own sin, and so not for the sin of one, but for the sin of all? whereas the apostle saith expressly, that death came upon us, τῷ τοῦ ἑνὸς παραπτώματι, "by the sin of one," Rom. v. 15. 17, δι' ἑνὸς ἁμαρτήσαντος, "by one man sinning," ver. 16, and δι' ἑνὸς παραπτώματος, "by the offence of that one man," ver. 18. Thirdly, I ask, whether this imputation made the posterity of Adam sinners, or whether it found them so before? if it found them so before, it must be plainly needless, seeing then they might have been condemned to death without it; if it made them so, then since this imputation is the act of God, and not of man, it plainly follows that God must be the author of that sin; because this imputation flows immediately from him, without the intervention of any action on the part of any of those men to whom it is imputed: moreover, then the imputation must be false, as charging them with sin, whom he did not find sinners, but only by his arbitrary imputation made them so. Now far be it from any Christian to assert that God should falsely impute sin to any man. In a word, λογίζεσθαι, imputare, is to reckon or account any thing to any man, to charge him with it, or lay the charge of it to him; this therefore on God's part must suppose, in the very nature of it, some action done by the posterity of Adam, which is blameworthy, and may be justly charged upon them, before there can be any ground for imputation of it; and this shows that it is impossible that this imputation should be the very thing that renders them blameworthy, or persons worthy to be charged with guilt; and yet, if the sin of Adam become ours only by imputation, it must be ours only because it is by God imputed to us, and not imputed because it is ours; that is, God by this imputation must make us sinners, and not find us such; for this imputation is the action of the judge, and not of the supposed criminal; remove or take away this action, and no crime can be charged upon him. In fine, if the sin of Adam becomes ours only by imputation, it deserves condemnation only by the same imputation, that is, by the action of God; that therefore we deserve condemnation for it, is to be ascribed directly to the action of God, and only by accident to the action of Adam. Whence, therefore, is our destruction, according to this opinion, but of God, who makes us worthy of condemnation, by imputing to us that sin which by his imputation only we stand guilty of?

Secondly, It cannot be truly affirmed that our sins were so imputed to Christ, when he became our surety, as that he became partaker of the guilt of them, but only so, as that he suffered the punishment which was due unto us for them, it being absolutely necessary, not only in the case of Christ, but of all vicarial punishments, to separate the punishment from the guilt; for though a man may become obnoxious to the punishment or sufferings of another by an innocent consent, he can never partake of the guilt of another's action but by a criminal consent unto it; and so far as he suffers for that action of him, he becomes guilty by this criminal consent, he suffers for his own sin, because that consent made the sin his own; whence in such cases he suffers not as a subtitute, but as a party. Seeing then our blessed Lord could not be guilty of any criminal consent to any of our actions, it is impossible that he should contract the guilt of sin by his consent to suffer for us; when therefore the prophet saith,* that God "laid on him the iniquity of us all," we are to understand this only of the punishment, or the chastisement of our sin; and to extend this farther, and say, with some, that, by his consent thus to suffer, he suffered for those sins which he had truly made his own, is not only false for the forementioned reason, but is contrary to the whole tenor of the scripture, which saith negatively that he was "such a high-priest, who was holy, undefiled, separate from sinners, and who needed not to offer up sacrifices for his own sins;" that "he was in all things like to us, χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας, sin only excepted;" that we "are redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without spot or blemish;" that "he did no sin," that "he knew no sin," that "he suffered, the just for the unjust:"* and affirmatively, that he died not for his own, but for our sins; that "he suffered for our sins, according to the scriptures;" he suffered "for the sins of the unjust;" he was "the propitiation for our sins," and "made reconciliation for the sins of the people."† In a word, this assertion borders upon blasphemy; for if Christ made all our iniquities his own, he made himself as guilty and as great a sinner as were all the sinners for whose sake he suffered. Nor is it any refuge here to say he was the greatest sinner only by imputation of sin to him, not by commission of sin personally: for as the righteousness of God cannot impute sin to him who did no sin, and gave no criminal consent to the sin of others; or whom he doth not first look upon as a sinner and a guilty person; so is it not consistent with the virtue, the intent, and nature of our Saviour's sufferings, that God should look upon him as a sinner, and a guilty person; for then he must have looked upon him as one who deserved to die for his own sin, or as one guilty of death, and then his death could have made no satisfaction for the sin of others; yea, then he must have suffered death, not for our sins, as they were ours, but as they were his own by imputation; whereas the scripture always saith he suffered death for our sins, but never for his own by imputation or inhesion. I conclude, therefore, in the words of Bishop Davenant‡ and Dr. Outram,§ "That Christ was willing so far to take our sins upon him, non ut inde peccator, sed hostia pro peccato constitueretur; not as to be made a sinner, but only a sacrifice for sin by and for them."

SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS,

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

That this epistle was written a year after the first is probably collected from these words, ix. 2, "Achaia was ready a year ago;" for he having given instructions for that collection he in these words refers to, only at the close of his First Epistle, they could not have the forwardness there mentioned before that time. Now that the First Epistle was written early in the year 55, or 57, appears from these words in it, "I will stay at Ephesus till pentecost" (xvi. 8): for he stayed some considerable time in Asia after his purpose to leave Ephesus and go to Macedonia (Acts ix. 21, 22), and yet making here his apology for not wintering at Corinth, as he thought to do (1 Cor. xvi. 6), this epistle must be writ after winter, and so when a new year was begun. It therefore seems to be written after his second coming to Macedonia, mentioned Acts xx. 3, for (1.) it was written after he had been at Troas, and had left that place to return to Macedonia; now that was at his second going thither: see note on ii. 12. (2.) It was written when Timothy was with him; now when he left Ephesus to go into Macedonia Timothy went not with him, but was sent before him (Acts xix. 22), but at his second going through Macedonia, Timothy was with him (Acts xx. 4). (3.) He speaks of some Macedonians that were like to come with him, ix. 4; now, at his second going from Macedonia, there accompanied him Aristarchus, Secundus, and Gaius of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia (Acts xx. 4). And (4.) the postscript saith, this epistle was written from Philippi, as we find it in Theodoret and Œcumenius, where St. Paul was till the days of unleavened bread (Acts xx. 6). It therefore seems to be sent from thence to them by Titus, and some other person, not long before Paul's coming to them, which he speaks of as instant, xiii. 1, and that which he was now ready to do, xii. 14, and did, saith Dr. Lightfoot, in his journey from Philippi to Troas, he sailing about from Philippi to Corinth, to make good his promise, whilst the rest that were with him (Acts xx. 4) went directly the next cut to Troas, and there waited for him.

CHAPTER I.

1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and [1] Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia (see note on 1 Cor. i. 1):

2 [2] Grace be (given) to you and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 Blessed be God, even (our God and) [3] the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort;

4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation (by that inward peace and earnest of the Spirit he gives under them), that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God (God's servants never wanting his comforts under all their sufferings).

5 For as the [4] sufferings of Christ abound in us, so [5] our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual (Gr. wrought) in (or by) the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer (and which by our example you are encouraged to endure): or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation, (which is accomplished by your patient perseverance under all your sufferings, to which patience you are animated by the experience of that consolation God affords his servants under all their sufferings, Matt. v. 12, xxiv. 13, 2 Cor. iv. 17, 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12, James i. 12.)

7 And our hope of you is stedfast, knowing, that as ye are partakers of the sufferings (we endure, 1 Cor. x. 13), so shall ye be also of the consolation (we enjoy in all our sufferings:

8 Our sufferings, I say,) For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life:

9 But we (therefore) had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead:

10 Who (then) delivered us [6] from so great a death, and (daily) doth deliver (us): in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Καὶ Τιμόθεος ὁ ἀδελφός, And Timotheus a brother.] I have observed, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that it is usual with St. Paul to call Timothy his brother (Col. i. 1, 1 Thess. iii. 2, Philem. 1, Heb. xiii. 23), and this he probably did, that he might not be despised for his youth, as he intimates he might be, 1 Tim. iv. 12, eight years after the writing of this epistle, this being written A. D. 57, that to Timothy A. D. 65.

[2] Ver. 2. Χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη, Grace and peace.] May that grace and favour of God on which your salvation and happiness depend (Tit. i. 1), and that peace which passeth understanding (Phil. iv. 7), and is the effect of the divine favour, be continually with you, and derived from God the Father, the fountain of all blessings, and from Jesus Christ, the procurer and dispenser of them (1 Cor. i. 4, Eph. i. 3) on you.

And from our Lord Jesus Christ.] See note on 1 Cor. i. 3.

Πατρὸς ἡμῶν, καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.] Dr. Mills saith these words are inserted into this place from other epistles; whereas Origen, in Matt. p. 500, Cod. Alexandrinus, all the Greek commentators, and all the ancient versions, own them (see Examen Millii).

[3] Ver. 3. Καὶ πατὴρ, The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.] Why, saith Schlictingius, should God be styled thus, "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," if Christ be God equally with the Father, seeing, by being thus distinguished from, he seems to be denied to be God?

I answer, He is by these words denied to be God the Father, since that would render him father to himself; but his being thus distinguished from God the Father hinders not his being God of God the Father, who by way of eminency is sometimes absolutely styled God, because he is the fountain of the Deity. For as the words "Our Lord," ascribed here to Christ, do not exclude the Father from being our Lord; so the word "God," ascribed to God the Father, excludes not Christ from being what Thomas styles him, "our Lord and our God," John xx. 28. And, as God was under the Old Testament styled "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," to confirm the faith of the Jews in the promises made to them and their seed, so is he usually in the New Testament styled "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," to confirm to us his love in Christ Jesus, his "beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased;" and to assure us that he is, as here it follows, "the Father of mercies," in the plural, to signify, according to the Hebrew way of speaking, the greatness and multitude of his mercies; and "the God of all consolation," as being the giver of that "Paraclete," or Holy Spirit, whence all our comforts are derived.

[4] Ver. 5. Τὰ παθήματα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, The sufferings of Christ.] The sufferings of Christ's members, for his sake, are styled "his sufferings," because they are evils inflicted on his members out of enmity to him, and by reason of their mystical union to him, and because of the sympathy he has with them in their sufferings (Luke x. 16, Acts ix. 4, Isa. lxiii. 9). Hence is he said, συμπαθῆσαι, "to suffer with us" in our infirmities, Heb. iv. 15. But when the Greek fathers add here, that* "Christ suffered more in his members than he did in his own person;" this sounds harsh in the ears of most divines, and shows they had not those thoughts of our Lord's sufferings and satisfaction which we have.

[5] Ἡ παράκλησις ἡμῶν, Our consolation] Abounds by Christ, because, as he promised, so he conferred the Spirit of consolation on those who suffered for his sake; so that, though they received the word with much affliction, they did it also with "joy in the Holy Ghost," 1 Thess. i. 6, having "the Spirit of faith," 2 Cor. iv. 13, "of glory, and of God, resting on them," 2 Tim. i. 7, 1 Pet. iv. 14 (see here, ver. 21, 22).

[6] Ver. 10. Ἐκ τηλικαύτου θανάτου, From so great a death.] Most interpreters refer what is said in these three last verses to the commotion raised against Paul by Demetrius at Ephesus, Acts xix. from ver. 26 to the end of that chapter. But we read not that in that commotion any hands were laid upon Paul, or that he suffered any thing. He therefore had no occasion from it to say that he was "pressed above measure, and above strength, so as to despair of life;" that he had "the sentence of death within him;" and that he was "delivered from so great a death," and as it were raised from the dead: these high expressions rather seem to signify, that he indeed was put to fight with beasts at Ephesus (as

11 [7] Ye also helping together by prayer for us, that for [8] the gift bestowed upon us (or the favour conferred on us) by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

12 For (in all our afflictions) our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but [9] by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.

13 And of the truth of this you may rest assured;) For we write none other things unto you (of it), than what ye read (Gr. know, remember) or [10] acknowledge; and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end;

14 As also ye have acknowledged us in part (i. e. as to the sounder part of the church; see note on ii. 5, though some have represented us as walking according to the flesh, x. 2), that we are (just matter of) your rejoicing, even as ye also are (at present, and much more will be) our's in the day of the Lord Jesus.

15 And in this confidence (of you) I was minded to come unto you before (this time), that ye might have [11] a second benefit (or grace);

16 [12] And to pass by you (though not so as to see you in that passage, 1 Cor. xvi. 7) into Macedonia, and to come again (Gr. and again to come) out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judæa.

17 When I therefore was thus minded (or, resolved thus), did I (afterward) use lightness (in changing this resolution)? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose (them) [13] according to the flesh (or, carnal interests), that with me there should be yea yea, and (again) nay nay? he speaks, 1 Cor. xv. 32, see the note there), and was by God delivered from them.

[7] Ver. 11. Συνυπουργούντων καὶ ὑμῶν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν τῇ δεήσει, You also helping together by prayer for us.] Hence note that the more public prayers are, the more prevailing they will be; and also, that God will be more glorified by the thanksgivings rendered for the success of them. But whereas Esthius hence pleads for prayers to the souls of saints departed, the practice of the apostle here and elsewhere is a strong argument against them: for he passionately entreats the Christians living at Rome to strive together with him in their prayers to God, Rom. xv. 30; the Corinthians, to help together with him in prayer, 2 Cor. i. 11; the Ephesians, to pray for him for all perseverance, Eph. vi. 18, 19; the Colossians, to continue in prayer for him, Col. iv. 1—3; the Thessalonians, to pray for him, "that the word of the Lord might have free course, and be glorified," 1 Thess. v. 25, and that he may be "delivered from unreasonable and wicked men," 2 Thess. iii. 1, 2, and the believing Jews to pray for him that he might sooner be restored to them, Heb. xiii. 18, 19. But, in all his epistles, we have not one petition of like nature directed to any saint departed; whereas, had he thought them capable of hearing him, and their addresses more effectual for the same ends, we may reasonably think his zeal would have prompted him to put up his requests to them, and leave us some examples of this nature.

[8] Τὸ εἰς ἡμᾶς χάρισμα, The gift bestowed upon us.] The word χάρισμα in the New Testament always importing a spiritual gift, must be interpreted here of the gifts bestowed on Paul for the discharge of his apostolical function; and if the right reading here be ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, "on our behalf," the sense of this verse may run thus, We trust that he will deliver us for the furtherance of the gospel, through the assistance of your prayers, that so the gift being exercised by us through the joint suffrage of many persons for the benefit of many, thanks may be returned by many for us. If ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, "on your behalf," as other copies have it, be the right reading, the sense runs thus: I hope to be still preserved by your prayers for the benefit of the church, that so the gift bestowed upon us, being made useful to the benefit of others by the prayers of so many, thanks may be given to God by many on your behalf. Whichsoever be the true reading, that he speaks of the spiritual gift conferred upon him will be evident from the following words, ver. 12.

Or, Secondly, Τὸ εἰς ἡμᾶς χάρισμα, may signify that wonderful deliverance vouchsafed to them from so great a danger, by the prayers of many persons.

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐν χάριτι Θεοῦ, In the grace of God.] Τουτέστι, σημείοις, καὶ τεράσιν ἅτινα χαρίσματα ἦν Θεοῦ, "i. e. by signs and miracles;"* that is, according to the wisdom of the Spirit, and the miraculous power given us by the gace of God for the propagation of the gospel. So Chrysostom. Which exposition, saith he, is confirmed from these words, "And more abundantly to you-ward;" for the apostle's sincerity and care to walk according to the rules of the gospel was every where the same, but the powerful operations and gifts of the Holy Ghost seem to have been more abundantly exercised by him in, and vouchsafed by him to, that church in which he staid so long, and of which he had so particular a promise, that Christ would be with him in his preaching to them (Acts xviii. 10, 11). The connexion of this with the former verse seems rather to be thus: And there is good reason why you should thus pray for us, who have acted with the same sincerity towards you, and so much to your advantage.

[10] Ver. 13. Ἀναγινώσκετε.] Ἃ αὐτοὶ ὑμεῖς ἴστε, "Which you yourselves know," Chrysostom. Τουτέστιν ὑπομιμνήσκεσθε, "Which you remember," Œcumenius, Theophylact.

[11] Ver. 15. Δευτέραν χάριν, A second benefit of grace.] I coming to establish you, Rom. i. 11, and to promote your joy, ver. 24. Hence it appears, that the apostle had been only once with them when he writ this.

[12] Ver. 16. Καὶ δι' ὑμῶν διελθεῖν εἰς Μακεδονίαν, And to pass by you into Macedonia.] Interpreters, ancient and modern, are much troubled how to reconcile these words with what the apostle hath said in his former epistle, "I will come unto you when I have passed through Macedonia," 1 Cor. xvi. 5, for there he expressly declares, his purpose was first to go into Macedonia, and then to come to Corinth from thence. Here, say they, he declares he purposed first to come to Corinth, and then to Macedonia, and return again from Macedonia to Corinth: but the apostle seems to say no more here than he did there. There he declares that he would first go to Macedonia; but he adds also, that he would go from Ephesus, passing by them into Macedonia; saying also, that he would not then see them ἐν παρόδῳ, "in his passage by them," ver. 7, and here he only saith he purposeth διελθεῖν, "to pass by them into Macedonia;" but saith not, that he would call upon them in that passage, but only when he came again from Macedonia, and intended to go to Syria; which he did not, partly by reason of Titus's absence, who was not yet returned to him to give an account of their affairs, but went again from Troas to Macedonia (2 Cor. ii. 12), where he met Titus (vii. 5, 6), and partly by reason of the Jews, who waylaid him in his passage to Syria (Acts xx. 3): and for this delay and nonperformance of his purpose, that he came not from Macedonia the first time he went thither, to winter with them, he makes this apology (see the preface to this epistle).

[13] Ver. 17. Κατὰ σάρκα, According to the flesh.] Perhaps the Judaizers might object this, because being in Greece (Acts xx. 2), and so near to Corinth, and having passed through Macedonia, he came not to go by them into Syria, because the Jews laid wait for him by the way, but returned back to Macedonia without seeing them (ver. 3); this, I say, they might interpret a consulting of his carnal interests.

* Cum multis donis spiritualibus. Grot.

18 No surely;) But [14] as (sure as) God is true, our word toward you [15] was not yea and nay (i. e. our preaching was not variable, we now saying one thing, anon another).

19 [16] For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

20 [17] For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen (i. e. true and certain through him), unto the glory of God (demonstrated in the confirmation of them) by us.

21 Now he which stablisheth us with you in (the doctrine of) Christ, and (who) hath anointed us (with the Holy Ghost), is God;

22 [18] Who hath also (thus) sealed us (up to the day of redemption, Eph. iv. 30), and given the earnest of the Spirit (to the pledge and assurance of it, 2 Cor. v. 5, Eph. i. 13, 14) in our hearts (see note on 1 Cor. i. 5—8).

23 Moreover (it was not therefore out of lightness, but) [19] I call God for a record upon my soul, that (it was merely) to spare you (that) I came not as yet unto Corinth.

24 (Yet this I say,) Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: [20] for by faith ye stand (τῇ γὰρ πίστει ἑστήκατε, for ye have stood in the faith).

[14] Ver. 18. Πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεὸς, But as God is true.] The phrase πιστὸς ὁ Θεὸς, "God is faithful," is used where there is no oath intended; as 1 Cor. i. 9, "God is faithful, by whom we are called;" and, x. 13, πιστὸς ὁ Θεὸς, "But God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above what you are able." But here the phrase, being used absolutely, seems rather to be a form of swearing: and then, πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεὸς, will signify, Dei fidem testor, i. e. "I swear by the faith of God;" so Dominus vivit, i. e. "I swear by the life of God;" or, "As the Lord liveth," Jer. xii. 16, xliv. 26, Hos. iv. 15, compared with Jer. xxxviii. 16, Judg. viii. 19, Ruth iii. 13, 1 Sam. xiv. 39. 46, xix. 6, xx. 3. So to swear, "as thy soul liveth," is to swear by the life of another.

[15] Οὐκ ἐγένετο ναὶ καὶ οὔ, Was not yea and nay.] i. e. It was not with any variance, but by his assistance we all said still the same thing, and promised the same advantages to those who should believe in Christ; or it was not the preaching of what was uncertain, but fully confirmed to you by the power received from him. That this is the true import of the phrase, "Yea, yea, nay, nay," we learn from the Jews from whom it is taken; for they say,* "There is a yea which is as nay, and a nay which is as yea," viz. when a man asserts and denies a thing ironically; but† "the just man's yea is yea, and his nay is nay;" that is, whatever he affirms or denies is true and certain. When a man gives a bill of divorce to his wife, we try him, say they, three times‡ "whether his nay be nay, and his yea be yea:" that is, whether he continue firm in his resolution to divorce her. And whereas the Hebrew saith, when Elijah said to the Jews, "How long will you halt betwixt two opinions? If God be God, follow him; if Baal, follow him: the people answered him not a word," 1 Kings xviii. 21: the Jewish gloss runs thus, "They would not say unto him, yea or nay, because they were doubtful." And whereas, Exod. xx. 1, we read thus, "And God spake all these words, saying," R. Solomon notes, that this word לאמר teacheth that "they answered to every yea, yea, and to every no, no;" that is, they engaged to do the affirmative, and not to do the negative precepts.

[16] Ver. 19. Ὁ γὰρ Θεοῦ υἱὸς—δι' ἡμῶν κηρυχθείς, For the Son of God Jesus Christ preached by us.] Here Theodoret well notes, that Christ preached is put ἀντὶ κηρύγματος, instead of preaching concerning him; the sense of these words being this, ὁ περὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγος, "the word concerning the Son of God" preached by me, Timothy, and Silvanus, was still the same without any variance from one another; we all saying the same things of him, and confirming them by the like miracles.

[17] Ver. 20.] Or, all the promises of God made to you are true and certain, through Christ, the author of the new covenant, established upon better promises, to the glory of that God who made them by us.

[18] Ver. 22. Ὁ καὶ σφραγισάμενος ἡμᾶς, Who hath sealed us.] Sealing was used not only as a mark of distinction of what belongs to us, from what is others', but also for confirmation; as when we set our seal to a bond, indenture, will, covenant, or ordinance; to a covenant, Neh. ix. 38, to an evidence, Jer. xxxii. 10, to an ordinance, that it may not be reversed, 1 Kings xxi. 8, Esth. viii. 8, Isa. viii. 16, in which sense the circumcision of Abraham is styled a "seal of the righteousness of faith," Rom. iv. 11, and the Corinthians, the seal of Paul's apostleship; for preservation and security, as when we seal up our treasures, Deut. xxxii. 34, so the servants of God were "sealed in their foreheads," Rev. vii. 3, ix. 4; so "the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth who are his," 2 Tim. ii. 19, and so the Jews made the sepulchre secure, "sealing the stone," Matt. xxvii. 66. In all which senses was the Holy Spirit given to believers as a mark that they belonged to Christ, Rom. viii. 9, and were the sons of God, Gal. iv. 6, as a confirmation of the covenant God had made with them, and of the blessings promised, he being the earnest and pledge of them, and so a security to them against doubting of them; and also a preserver of them in the faith against all temptations (2 Tim. i. 7, 1 Pet. iv. 14).

[19] Ver. 23. Μάρτυρα τὸν Θεὸν ἐπικαλοῦμαι ἐπὶ τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν, I call God to record upon my soul.] The apostle useth this form of speech so oft in this epistle, that I think it not amiss to give an account of the reason of his doing so; which may be best done from the consideration of the occasion, the reason, and the end of assertory oaths, which are the only oaths he uses.

First, Then, there must be some ἀντιλογία, i. e. some doubting of, or contradiction to, the thing asserted, which must give an occasion to an assertory oath (Heb. vi. 16), there being no need to confirm, in this solemn manner, what nobody doubts of. Now, in the church of Corinth, the authority and the sincerity of the apostle was much doubted of, he being acknowledged of them but in part (ver. 14), some seeking still "a proof of Christ speaking by him" (xiii. 3), and others looking on him as one that "walked after the flesh" (x. 2). This therefore gave occasion to the assertory oaths so frequent in this epistle.

Secondly, The end of an oath is εἰς βεβαίωσιν, "for confirmation" of the thing asserted (Heb. vi. 16); and if oaths were allowed, and thought necessary in civil matters for this end, they must be more allowable in sacred and spiritual matters, which concerned the truth of the gospel, and the salvation of souls for the same end, which manifestly was here the case.

Thirdly, The matter, thus confirmed by an oath, must be such as could not be sufficiently confirmed by other witnesses of the fact, he being only privy to them, who doth thus confirm them; for where sufficient testimonies of the matter of fact can be produced, an oath seems the less needful in the case. And that this was so, in all the instances in which the apostle thus confirms his sayings, will be easily discerned from the perusal of the places, in which the apostle thus asserts the truth of what he had affirmed, viz. i. 18. 23, xi. 10, 11. 31, xii. 19.

[20] Ver. 24. Τῇ γὰρ πίστει ἑστήκατε, For you have stood in the faith.] Τῆς μὲν πίστεως ἕνεκεν οὐδαμῶς ὑμῖν ἐπιμέμφομαι, τὴν γὰρ ταύτης ὑγίειαν περίκεισθε, Theodoret; that is, "I do not by this threat challenge to myself a power to exercise any dominion over you on the account of your faith," as I did upon Hymenæus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 12), and intend to do upon some of your false teachers, when your obedience is fulfilled (x. 6); for I acknowledge, you have generally stood firm in the profession of the Christian faith (though some among you once questioned the great article of the resurrection of the body, 1 Cor. xv. 12), but I design by it to excite you to cure your divisions and contentions, and reform your gross miscarriages (xii. 20, 21), that so I might not be found towards you "such as you would not," nor create to you any farther trouble, but may be a promoter of that joy which you will find in such a reformation of yourselves.

CHAPTER II.

1 (And indeed a helper of your joy I would gladly be,) But I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness (i. e. so as to make you sad, if possibly I could avoid it).

2 For if I (be constrained by your disorders to) make you sorry, [1] who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me? (i. e. What can make me glad but the reformation, and so the joy of the same persons? the apostle's chiefest joy being in the welfare of his converts, i. 14, Phil. ii. 2. 16, iv. 1, 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20.)

3 And I wrote this same unto you (or, this very thing have I written to you before my coming, to excite you to this reformation), lest, when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that (you stand so affected to me, that) my joy is the joy of you all.

4 (I say, lest I should have sorrow;) For out [2] of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you (my former epistle) with many tears; (which yet I say,) not that ye should be grieved (or made sorry), but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

5 But if any have caused grief (as the incestuous person hath already done), he hath not grieved me (only), [3] but in part: that I may not overcharge (or be too heavy upon) you all.

6 Sufficient to such a man is [4] this punishment, which was inflicted of many.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 2. Καὶ τίς ἐστιν, Who is he then?] The Hebrew ו rendered by καὶ, is very often in our translation, then. See Gen. xiii. 16, xxiv. 41, xxviii. 21, xxxi. 8, xlii. 34. 38, Exod. vi. 1, vii. 9. 11, Lev. iv. 3. 14. 23. 28, v. 5, vi. 4, Numb. v. 15. 21, Deut. vi. 21, viii. 10, Josh. i. 15, xxiv. 12, 1 Sam. i. 11, vi. 9. And thus also is καὶ translated by us in the New Testament, Matt. xxiii. 32, xxv. 27, Mark vii. 1. 10. 26, John iv. 35, vii. 33, xiv. 9, Acts xxvi. 20, Rom. viii. 17, xi. 5, 1 Cor. xv. 29, James ii. 4, Rev. xxii. 9.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἐκ πολλῆς θλίψεως, With much affliction, &c.] As the apostle's zeal for the good of souls made him rejoice at their welfare (ver. 2), so also did it cause him to weep for their miscarriages (Acts xx. 19. 31, 2 Cor. xii. 21, Phil. iii. 18).

[3] Ver. 5. Ἀπὸ μέρους, In part.] This phrase is commonly used by Paul for the distinction of one sort of persons from another: so Rom. xi. 25, "Blindness hath happened to Israel, ἀπὸ μέρους, in part," as to the unbelieving part of them; Rom. xv. 15, "I have written to you more boldly in part," ἀπὸ μέρους, i. e. as to that part of you who are gentiles, declaring that I was called by Jesus Christ to be "the apostle of the gentiles;" 2 Cor. i. 14, "You have acknowledged me ἀπὸ μέρους, in part," i. e. as to the sound part of you; and according to this use of the phrase, the words may be paraphrased thus, He hath not only grieved me, but, as to the sound part, you all; for there were some among them who grieved not for this crime, but "were puffed up," 1 Cor. v. 2; I therefore say in part, that I may not too much load that miserable person.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἡ ἐπιτιμία αὕτη ἡ ὑπὸ τῶν πλειόνων, This punishment, &c.] Some learned persons, who exclude the laity from having any share in the excommunication or absolution of public offenders, tell us, this punishment was inflicted only by the clergy or the presbytery of Corinth in the presence of the laity. But it seems clear in both these epistles, that the apostle writes to the church of Corinth in the general: for when he commands that the incestuous person should be excluded from their society, and be "delivered up to Satan," he speaks to all that were assembled together, 1 Cor. v. 4, to all that ought to have mourned for that fact, ver. 2, to all that were obliged to abstain from eating with him, ver. 11, and asserts the power they had of judging those that were within the church, ver. 12, and here, speaking of the execution of that sentence, he saith it was ἐπιτιμία, "a punishment inflicted," not πρὸ, before, only, but ὑπὸ τῶν πλειόνων, "by the community:" hence he exhorts them all to forgive and comfort him, ver. 8, adding, ver. 10, "To whomsoever you forgive any thing, I forgive also:" but there is not in this whole affair the least mention of any of the clergy separately from the church, either executing or relaxing this censure. Indeed Paul here carries the matter so high, that he alone, by his apostolical authority, passeth the sentence, saying, ἤδη κέκρικα, "I have already judged him," 1 Cor. v. 3, and also that of absolution, saying here, ver. 10, ἐγὼ κεχάρισμαι, "I have forgiven him," committing only the execution of each sentence to them: so that this instance gives no colour to the pretences of the independents and other sectaries, especially if we add, what is highly probable, that the Corinthian church had then no ordinary or settled governors, or pastors, but all their offices were performed by prophets, or men enabled to perform them by the gift of prophecy (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 29); and if so, it cannot be expected that the same practice should continue when these extraordinary prophets ceased, and bishops and pastors were every where appointed to rule over their respective flocks. In the primitive church, when any person was to be excommunicated, the laity were first consulted about the fact; the guilty person pleaded in their presence; they judged of the matter of fact, as do our juries in criminal causes, and by their suffrage they consented to his condemnation, as Cyprian* doth often inform us; but then he still asserts, that neither they nor the inferior clergy could pass the sentence of excommunication without the bishop,† who, as the president of the assembly, still pronounced the sentence. They also consented to the readmission of them into favour, and to the communion of the church, but then their actual admission was performed by the imposition of the hands of the bishop and clergy, the power of the keys, saith he, being given to them by Christ, saying, "Thou art Peter," &c.‡

[5] Ver. 7.] Note, Hence it appears, that in notorious crimes which give great cause of scandal to the church and to Christianity, the consolation of the offender depends not only on his inward grief and repentance towards God, but also on the relaxation of his censures by the church; for it is certain that the apostle is here speaking not, as Grotius thinks, of the taking off the disease which Satan had inflicted on the incestuous person, but of restoring him to communion by relaxation of the church's censures: for (1.) the word ἐπιτιμία, punishment, ver. 6, refers to the canonical censures of the church. (2.) He commands them not only χαρίζεσθαι, to "forgive" (ver. 7. 10), but also to "confirm their love to him;" both which expressions plainly seem to intimate, that he would have him restored to communion; and this he forgive him, and comfort him (by receiving him again into the church, which is the proper consolation to one cast out, than continue your aversion to him), [6] lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow (and so fall into despair).

8 Wherefore I (who commanded the inflicting this censure on him, do now) beseech you that ye would confirm your love toward him (by readmitting him, thus penitent, to your society; for the church ought, after the example of God, to do so).

9 For to this end also did I write (ἔγραψα, have I written this), that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient (to me) in all things.

10 (And be assured of this, that) To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive (it) also: for if I forgave any thing (Gr. have forgiven heretofore), to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it (though I did it) [7] in the person (i. e. by the authority) of Christ;

11 [8] (And this forgiveness of the incestuous person I therefore press,) Lest Satan should get an advantage of us (by hurrying him into despair, or representing the church-discipline as that which tendeth to men's ruin, and so tempting him to apostasy): for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12 Furthermore (that ye may know my great concernment for you), [9] when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord (for the propagation of it there),

13 I had (notwithstanding) no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother (whom I had sent to know the state of your affairs, returned): but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia (hoping to find him there, where he arrived, and gave me a very comfortable account of you).

14 Now thanks (therefore) be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in (and through) Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place (where we come).

15 For we are unto God a sweet savour (in our preaching) of Christ, (both) in them that are saved, and in them that perish:

16 To the one (viz. to them that perish for rejecting Christ preached to them) we are [10] the savour of death unto death; and to the other (who believe in him) the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these (great and weighty) things?

17 (We are, I say, very acceptable to God in this work;) For we are not as many, [11] which corrupt the would have performed according to the discipline now mentioned from Cyprian, with the consent of the pious laity.

[6] Lest such a one should be swallowed up with sorrow.] Hence also Chrysostom observes, that, in prescribing the measures of penance, regard is to be had, not only to the nature of the sin, ἀλλὰ καὶ πρὸς διάνοιαν καὶ ἕξιν τῶν ἁμαρτανόντων, "but also to the mind and temper of the sinner."

[7] Ver. 10. Ἐν προσώπῳ Χριστοῦ, In the person of Christ.] That is, saith Theodoret, Christ beholding and approving what was done; for as he delivered the incestuous person to Satan "in the name of the Lord Christ" (1 Cor. v. 4), so in his person and by his authority he relaxes the sentence. This places teaches us, saith Schlictingius, "that the providence of Christ reacheth to, and inspecteth, not only our actions, but even our minds and thoughts." Hence then I argue for his Godhead, God alone being the searcher of the heart, and of the secrets of it (1 Kings viii. 39).

[8] Ver. 11.] Note; Vain here is all the discourse of Esthius concerning indulgences, or the remission of the satisfaction required by the church; for the apostle here speaks only of the remission of this excommunication, and hath not one word of any satisfaction the incestuous person had voluntarily undertaken on the account of his offence, or any thing imposed on him to do on that account, but only of a delivery of him to Satan, and an exclusion of him from the church, in both which he was passive.

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐλθὼν δὲ εἰς τὴν Τρωάδα, But coming to Troas.] That this was not the first time of St. Paul's coming to Troas is plain, seeing we find him there long before, Acts xvi. 8, though then he seems to have staid there but a night: it was not the time mentioned Acts xx. 6, for then he came from Macedonia to Troas, here he goes from Troas to Macedonia. It remains then that it was some intermediate time, which all interpreters I meet with think was in his way from Ephesus to Macedonia, Acts xx. 1, but at his first journey from Ephesus to Macedonia he sailed, not by Troas, but by Corinth, though not touching there (see note on i. 16): it was then after passing through those parts he came by Troas into Greece; and if so, this epistle could not be written till after St. Paul's coming the second time to Macedonia (see the preface).

[10] Ver. 16. Ὀσμὴ ζωῆς, καὶ θανάτου, A savour of life and death.] Here is a continual allusion to the phraseology of the Jews, who speak from the prophets of סם המות,* "a mortal savour," or as the Chaldee saith, סמא דמותא, (Esth. i. 21, Jer. xi. 19), and of סם החיים, "a savour of life," or "a vital unguent," and saying of the law, that "it is to Israel a savour of life, but to the nations of the world a savour of death;" of which the apostle seemeth here to give the reverse, saying, the gospel was to them, as being the rejecters of it, the savour of death, but to the gentiles, who embraced it, the savour of life.

Καὶ πρὸς ταῦτα τίς ἱκανός;] Here the Vulgar ridiculously read, Et ad hæc quis tam idoneus, i. e. quàm ego? and this reading is defended by Dr. Mills, against all the Greek scholia, the Syriac and Arabic versions, Cod. Alex. and Hilary the deacon, and that by surmises little better than that version (see Examen Millii in locum).

[11] Ver. 17. Καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον, Who corrupt the word.] Here is an allusion to those hucksters of whom the prophet Isaiah speaks, saying, οἱ κάπηλοί σου μίσγουσι τὸν οἶνον ὕδατι, "Thy vintners mix wine with water" (Isa. i. 22); and so the meaning of the words is this, We do not adulterate the sincerity of the word, as your false apostles do. So Theodoret here.

Who these corrupters of the word of God were, we learn from xi. 22, where it is evident that they were not Samaritans, but Jews; not pretenders to be the Christ, or ministers of Simon Magus, but ministers of Christ, or such as owned our Jesus, not Simon Magus or Dositheus, to be Christ. Notwithstanding, a reverend persons asserts that they were Gnostics; and to this opinion he is inclined by two passages in the epistles of Ignatius: the first is in the Epistle to the Magnesians, where, saith he, "speaking of the Gnostic Judaizers, as enemies of the cross of Christ, whose God is their belly, who mind earthly things (Phil. iii. 18, 19), who were lovers of pleasure and not lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power of it, he adds, that they were οἱ χριστέμποροι, τὸν λόγον καπηλεύοντες, καὶ τὸν Ἰησοῦν πωλοῦντες, merchants of Christ, huckstering the word, selling Jesus." But,

1. The Gnostics were so far from being Judaizers, that they denied the God of the Jews, declared that he was not the supreme God, and taught men to despise the law and the prophets (see note on Col. ii. 12).

2. All these epithets or characteristics agree perfectly to the Jewish false teachers; they were the men of whom the apostle saith, "Their god is their belly," &c., as both Chrysostom* and Theodoret inform us. They were the men who were "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God," and who had "a form of godliness," which the impure Gnostics had not (see note on 2 Tim. iii. 5). The Jews also were the persons who bought Christ for thirty pieces of silver; they corrupted the word here, by mixing the law and their traditions with the gospel, and they made a gain of Christ (see note on 1 Tim. vi. 5). So that what is here cited from the ninth section of this epistle, agrees exactly to them.

3. It chiefly is to be observed, that these words are not in the true Ignatius, but are the additions of his interpolator. And (2.) there is not a word in this place to show that they belonged to the Gnostics, or any other persons, who, owning the profession of the Christian faith, corrupted it; but are expressly said to belong to such enemies of Christ as denied him:* whereas the true Ignatius is plainly in this place speaking of the Jews,† of whom we interpret this; and the same is also evident from the interpolator.

The second passage is cited from the Epistle ad Trallianos, where he saith, "There are some vain speakers and impostors, not Christians, but merchants of Christ, ἁπάτῃ περιφέροντες τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, carrying the name of Christ for deceit, and huckstering the word of the gospel." "And who these were he specifies in the process of the epistle, viz. Simon, the first-born of Satan, Menander, Basilides, the unclean Nicolaitans, τοὺς ψευδωνύμους, 'those that are falsely named,' that is, the Gnostics." But here again,

1. We have not the true Ignatius, but his interpolator imposed upon us.

2. This interpolator doth not say those persons, falsely named, were the Gnostics: no, that is the doctor's interpretation, against the true sense of the Greek; and the manifest words of the old interpreter, who says, they were the Nicolaitans,‡ so called, because they falsely bore his name, he being no such person as they represented him: and indeed, this is the common epithet of the Nicolaitans;† he himself, by Clemens Alexandrinus‡ and others being declared free from the doctrines these heretics vented in his name. And,

3. This interpolator plainly insinuates that, in the section cited by the doctor, he meant the Judaizers,§ as using the same words which he had used in the Epistle to the Magnesians concerning them.

CHAPTER III.

1 Do we (by speaking thus of our sincerity, ii. 16,) begin again to commend ourselves? or [1] need we, as some others (have), [2] epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you (to others)?

2 Ye are our epistle [3] written in our hearts, (you being always in our minds, and evidently appearing to us so to be, and) known and read of all men (who have heard the fame of your conversion):

3 Forasmuch as ye are (by this conversion) manifestly declared to be [4] the epistle of Christ ministered (or penned) by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone (as were the ten commandments), but in fleshy tables of the heart.

4 And such (confidence or) trust have we through (the grace and favour of) Christ to God-ward (viz. that he will still thus efficaciously assist our ministry):

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Εἰ μὴ χρῄζομεν; Do we need?] These particles εἰ μὴ often signify num in the Old Testament; εἰ μὴ ἔβαγες; "Hast thou eaten of the tree?" Gen. iii. 11 (see Gen. iv. 9, xviii. 4. 17. 23. 27. 38, xxx. 15, xxxi. 14, xli. 38, xliii. 7). So μὴ also signifies, 1 Cor. ix. 4, μὴ οὐκ ἐξουσίαν ἔχομεν; "Have we not power?" and ver. 8.

[2] Συστατικῶν ἐπιστολῶν, Letters of commendation.] That commendatory epistles were ancient in the church, we learn from Tertullian* and Cyprian.† And that they had their rise from the tesseræ hospitalitatis among the heathens, is the opinion of the reverend Dr. Hammond on the place. But others think these letters were derived from the Jews, among whom they were in use, as their writings, so this very place shows; for the persons here mentioned were the Judaizers.

[3] Ver. 2. Ἐγγεγραμμένη ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν, Written in our hearts.] This is a frequent phrase in the Old Testament, and among the Jewish doctors, importing (1.) the clearness and perspicuity of what is said to be thus in our hearts, Deut. xxx. 11. 14, 15, Rom. x. 8, 9, and (2.) our care to have it continually in our minds, and upon our spirits, Deut. vi. 6, Prov. iii. 3, vii. 2 (see this proved, note on Heb. viii. 10).

And thus the phrase is commonly used in profane authors, both Greek and Latin. Thus Antisthenes saith to one, who had lost his register or note-book, "Thou shouldest ἐν τῇ ψυχῇ αὐτὰ, καὶ μὴ ἐν ταῖς χάρταις γράφειν,* write these things in thy soul, and not in thy papers." So Seneca† saith of Portius Latro, who made use of no books or notes, Aiebat se scribere animo, "He said he wrote all things in his mind." So Terence,‡ Scripta illa dicta sunt in animo Chrysidis; which in Pindar§ is, πόσθι φρενὸς ἡμᾶς γέγραπται, "It is written in my mind."

So that these words may be thus paraphrased, We need no letters of commendation to you, for we well know, and have continually in remembrance, how powerfully God wrought with us for your conversion, so that "the seal of our apostleship are you in the Lord" (1 Cor. ix. 2); "the signs of an apostle being wrought among you in all patience, in signs, wonders, and in mighty deeds" (2 Cor. xii. 12); so that you are our best letters commendatory to yourselves: nor need we letters of commendation from you to others, the fame of your conversion by us, and of the gifts we, with the gospel, have imparted to you, being spread throughout the world.

5 Not (having any confidence in ourselves) that we are sufficient of ourselves [5] to think any thing as of ourselves (to bring men to the faith of Christ by our own reasonings, without the power and assistance of the Spirit of God); but our sufficiency (as to this matter) is of God (alone);

6 Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament (promised in opposition to the old, Jer. xxxi. 33, and so) not of the letter (only, as was that of Moses), but of the spirit, (promised, Ezek. xxxvi. 27): for [6] the letter (of the law condemns the disobedient, and so) killeth, but the spirit (ministered by the gospel) giveth life; (for if the Spirit of him that raised Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you, Rom. viii. 11.)

7 [7] But (then) if (that law which is) the ministration of death, (and was) written and engraven in stones, was glorious (in the ministry of it), so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory (yet was only such as) was to be done away (or vanish, as the law was to do):

8 How shall not (that gospel which is) the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious (both in itself and its ambassadors)?

9 For if (that law, which was) the ministration of condemnation (by pronouncing the sentence of death upon all that did not perfectly obey it) be (or was attended with) glory, much more doth (the gospel, which is) the ministration of righteousness (or of justification to life, Rom. v. 18) exceed in glory.

10 For even that (law) which was made glorious (at the first administration of it, may be said to have) had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory (of the gospel) that excelleth (and so eclipseth it).

11 For if that which is (now) done away (and abolished) was glorious, much more that which remaineth (for ever) is (to be) glorious (in the powerful operations of the Spirit of God assisting the dispensers of it).

12 Seeing then that we have such hope (of the glorious efficacy of our ministry, and of the power of God and ready to obey the word by the operation of the Holy Spirit, according to the promise, "I will take away the stony heart from you, and give you a heart of flesh," Ezek. xi. 19, xxxvi. 26.

[5] Ver. 5. Λογίζεσθαί τι, &c. To reason any thing as of ourselves.] The apostle, in the second chapter of his First Epistle, contends that there was a necessity of a divine revelation, to enable them to make known to us the truths contained in the gospel, because human reason, without it, was not able to know or to discern them; and therefore here also he disclaims this sufficiency as of themselves, without divine assistance for this work; that is, without those illuminations and powerful operations of the Holy Spirit which made them "able ministers of the New Testament." This text, therefore, is impertinently cited to show that no man is sufficient of himself to think a good thought, and might as well have been produced to prove him not sufficient of himself to think at all.

[6] Ver. 6. Γράμμα ἀποκτέινει, The letter killeth.] From the exposition of these words given in the paraphrase, it appears, how vain are the imaginations of those men who, by the killing letter, understand not the law condemning to death, but the literal and historical sense of the scriptures in general; and by the life-giving spirit, the mystical and spiritual sense of them. Vain also are they who by the letter understand the law as it was understood by the Jewish doctors in a literal or grammatical sense, by the Spirit, the mind of the lawgiver; it being evident from the whole chapter, that by the letter the apostle understands the law engraved in stones, ver. 3. 7, the law as delivered by Moses, and as at first administered with an appearance of the glory of the Lord; and by the Spirit, the Spirit of Christ, ver. 17, or the Holy Spirit given to the apostles to enable them to preach the gospel, and conferred on those that believed it.

[7] Ver. 7—11.] That the allusion here from ver. 7 to the eleventh may be the better understood, let it be noted:

First, that the glory of God, or of the Lord, in the Old Testament, imports a bright light or flame included in a cloud, styled "the cloud of glory;" and because this, whenever it appeared, was a symbol of God's glorious presence, it is styled by the Jews Shechinah,* "the habitation:" so Exod. xvi. 7, "In the morning ye shall see the glory of God;" and ver. 10, "The glory of God abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days, and the light of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire;" Exod. xl. 34, "A cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle, שכן, the habitation of God."—"This glory," saith the author of Cosri,† "is the divine light which God vouchsafeth to his people."—"By the Shechinah," saith Elias, "we understand the Holy Spirit," as it is evident they do in these sayings, "The Shechinah will not dwell with sorrowful or melancholy men. The Shechinah will only dwell with the strong, rich, wise, and humble man. The Shechinah dwells with the meek. When ten sit, and study the law, the Shechinah dwells among them" (see many other instances in Buxtorf's Lexicon, p. 2396, &c.).

Secondly, Observe, that after the covenant made with God at mount Sinai, Exod. xxiv. 7, 8, was broken, and the law given from mount Sinai violated by the idolatry of the Jews, in making and worshipping the golden calf, Exod. xxxiii., Moses is again called up into mount Sinai to renew it, Exod. xxxiv. 27, and God there descends to him again in the cloud of glory, ver. 5, and then was it that the skin of his face shone, to the terror of those that saw him, so that he was forced to put a veil over his face, ver. 29, 30. And the allusion here is chiefly to this glory, or shining brightness of the face of Moses, when he received the law the second time, as is evident from ver. 7, and from the words here used by Paul, οὐδὲ δεδόξασται τὸ δεδοξασμένον, "That which was made glorious was not glorious;" for they are the very words used by the Septuagint, concerning the shining of the face of Moses, δεδόξασται ἡ ὄψις τοῦ χρώματος προσώπου αὐτοῦ, Exod. xxxiv. 29; καὶ ἦν δεδοξασμένη ἡ ὄψις, ver. 30.

Thirdly, Observe, that as the glory of the Lord descended on the mount, at the delivery of the law, so, to enable the apostles to be "able ministers of the New Testament," the Spirit of God descended on the apostles at the day of pentecost, in the likeness of cloven tongues, or tongues of fire, sitting upon them (Acts ii. 3); and as the tabernacle and temple were filled with the glory of God, so were they all filled with the Holy Ghost (ver. 4); and as the shining of the face of Moses signified the glory of that law which he delivered to the Jews, so the gifts of the Holy Ghost, shining forth in these ambassadors of Christ, signified the glory of the gospel. Now, saith the apostle, this glory is more excellent than that which attended the law given by Moses:

1. Because the glory appearing on mount Sinai made the people afraid of death, saying, "Let God not speak to us any more, lest we die" (Exod. xx. 19), "neither let us see this great fire any more, that we die not" (Deut. xviii. 16). And when the face of Moses shone, the people were afraid to come nigh him (Exod. xxxiv. 30), for the law being the ministration of death and condemnation, even the glory of it struck a terror into their hearts, and left a fear of death upon their spirits; and thus received they "the spirit of bondage unto fear" (Rom. viii. 15), whilst we have given to us "the Spirit of power and love" (2 Tim. i. 7), and "the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father:" and to this difference the author to the Hebrews alludes, xii. 18—24.

2. Moses, with all his glory, was only the minister of the law, written in tables of stone; the apostles of the gospel, written in the heart of believers: he only gave the Jews the killing letter of the law, they with the gospel gave the quickening Spirit.

3. The glory which Moses received at the giving of the law did more and more diminish, because his law was to vanish away; but the glory which they received from Christ did increase "from glory to glory" (ver. 18), the doctrine they delivered by it being to remain for ever.

* Vide Buxt. Lex. p. 2396.
† Par. ii. §. 8.

so illustriously shining forth in it), we use great [8] plainness of speech:

13 And (act) not as Moses (the minister of the law), which put a vail over his face, (even that of types and shadows, so) that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the [9] end (or the accomplishment) of that which is (now) abolished:

14 But (that which hinders them from seeing through this veil, is this, that) their minds were (then and still are) blinded: for until this day remaineth the same vail untaken away in the reading of the old testament; which vail is (only) done away (by faith) in Christ.

15 But (or, whereas they not believing in him) even unto this day, when Moses is read, the vail is (still) upon their heart.

16 Nevertheless (as when Moses turned to the Lord, the veil was taken from his face, Exod. xxxiv. 34, so) when [10] it (the Jewish nation) shall turn to the Lord (Jesus), the vail shall be taken away (from them).

17 [11] Now the Lord is (the giver of) that Spirit (which is received by the gospel, and by which it is confirmed): and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty, (and so the law, which is as a yoke of bondage, Acts xv. 10, Gal. v. 1, is taken away, and we obtain our Christian liberty.

18 [12] And it is not with us as it was with the Jews, for they only saw the face of Moses shining through the veil, but received no impression from, or derivation of, his glory upon themselves;) But we all (under the gospel), with open (and unveiled) face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord (Jesus), are changed into the same image (with him) from (his) glory to glory (derived on us), even as by the Spirit of the Lord (or, as receiving it from the Lord and giver of the Spirit).

[8] Ver. 12. Παῤῥησία.] This word seems to import openness and plainness of speech. So, "he spake this, saying, παῤῥησίᾳ, openly," Mark viii. 32; "If thou art Christ, tell us παῤῥησίᾳ, plainly," John x. 24; "Having spoiled principalities and powers, he triumphed over them, ἐν παῤῥησίᾳ, openly," Col. ii. 15 (see John vii. 4. 13, xi. 14, xvi. 25. 29, xviii. 20). And to this sense the opposition in these words, "We use great plainness of speech, and do not put a veil before our face, as Moses did," seems to lead.

[9] Ver. 13. Εἰς τὸ τέλος τοῦ καταργουμένου, To the end of that which was to be abolished,] i. e. Either to Christ and his gospel, as the body veiled under these types and shadows (Col. ii. 16), or they could not look unto that Christ, who is the end of the law for justification (Rom. x. 4), that being only "our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ" (Gal. iii. 24, 25). And here is the Fourth excellency of the gospel above the law, that whereas that was veiled under types and shadows, the gospel was delivered with great perspicuity and plainness of speech; which is a confirmation of the perspicuity of the New Testament in all things necessary.

[10] Ver. 16. Ἡνίκα δ' ἂν ἐπιστρέψῃ πρὸς Κύριον, When it shall turn to the Lord.] The apostle discoursing, ver. 13, of the sons of Israel, of those to whom belonged the old covenant, and to whom the law of Moses was read, ver. 14, 15, must be supposed to speak here of the same persons; and then the apostle here plainly taketh it for granted, that there will come a time when the Jewish nation shall turn unto the Lord, or be converted to the Christian faith; and so, looking on Christ as the end of the law, and being enlightened by his Spirit, shall clearly discern the spiritual sense of the law, and the true meaning of their own prophecies concerning their Messiah. Nor is it any objection against this exposition that the word is ἐπιστρέψῃ, in the singular, for as that answers well to Israel, or the Jewish nation, so is it a known rule* that in the Hebrew tongue a verb of the singular number is joined to a noun or a participle plural.

[11] Ver. 17. Ὁ δὲ Κύριος τὸ Πνεῦμά ἐστιν, Now the Lord is that Spirit.] The Ethiopian version reads not ὁ δὲ but οὗ δὲ Κύριος, "Where the Lord is, there is the Spirit," which makes the sense of these words clear; but this reading hath no authority from any ancient copy, or Christian writer. Origen† cites the words, according to the common reading, thrice; nor is it suitable to the Greek, which should have been, according to that reading, οὗ δὲ Κύριος ἐκεῖ τὸ Πνεῦμα. I therefore prefer the other interpretation, which saith, The Lord is the Spirit, as he is the way, the life, John xiv. 6, the resurrection and the life, xi. 15, as being the author and giver of them. He it is who "baptizeth with the Spirit and fire" (Matt. iii. 11), who giveth this good Spirit to all believers, and sends him to them from the Father (John vii. 38, 39, xv. 26, xvi. 7): he is ὁ Κύριος, the Lord who ministers to his church all the gifts and operations of the Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 5, Eph. iv. 8). And this interpretation is favoured by the last words of the chapter, ἀπὸ Κυρίου Πνεύματος, "from the Lord of the Spirit;" for, through the New Testament, wherever the Spirit of the Lord is mentioned, τὸ Πνεῦμα is put before, but never follows, the word Κύριος, as according to the common interpretation here it doth (see also Examen Millii in locum).

[12] Ver. 18.] Here are two farther excellencies of the glory of the gospel above that of the law, viz.

5. That the Jews only saw the shining of the face of Moses through a veil; but we behold the glory of the gospel of Christ in the person of Christ, our lawgiver, with open face.

6. They saw it through a veil, which hindered the reflection or shining of it upon them, and so this glory shone only on the face of Moses, but not at all upon them; whereas the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ shines as in a glass, which reflects the image upon us Christians, so that we all are transformed into the same image, deriving the glorious gifts and graces of the Spirit, with the gospel, from Christ the Lord and great distributer of them (1 Cor. xii. 5), and so the glory which the Father gave to him he hath given us (John xvii. 22). It is therefore rather with us as it was with Moses himself, concerning whom God speaketh thus, "To whom will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, and the similitude, τὴν δόξαν Κυρίου, the glory of the Lord shall he behold," Numb. xii. 8. For as he saw the glory of God apparently, so "we, with open face, behold the glory of the Lord:" as he by seeing of this glory was changed into the likeness of it, and his face shone, or was δεδοξασμένη "made glorious;" so we, "beholding the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (iv. 6), are changed into the same glory." But then, though this may in some measure be enlarged to the church in general, in which these gifts were exercised, I think it chiefly, and more eminently, refers to the apostles mentioned ver. 12, and iv. 1.

CHAPTER IV.

1 Therefore seeing we have this (glorious) ministry, as we have received mercy (from God, in committing it to us, 1 Tim. i. 12, so) we [1] faint not (under the pressures to which it doth expose us);

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. Οὐκ ἐκκακοῦμεν,] Is not to slacken in, or cease from, the performance of an enterprise (Luke xviii. 1, Gal. vi. 9, 2 Thess. iii. 13), particularly μὴ ἐκκακεῖν ἐν θλίψεσι, "not to faint under tribulations," Eph. iii. 13, and here, ver. 16. And this sense is confirmed by the words following, from ver. 7 to 16.

2 But have renounced [2] the hidden things of dishonesty (or shame), not walking in craftiness (and guile), nor handling the word of God deceitfully, (as do your false apostles and deceitful workers, xi. 13;) but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience (as persons acting) in the sight of God.

3 [3] But if (notwithstanding this manifestation of the truth) our gospel be hid (from any to whom it is preached), it is hid (only) to them that are lost:

4 In (or among) whom [4] the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the

[2] Ver. 2. Τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς αἰσχύνης, The hidden things of shame.] The apostle often speaks of some deceivers crept into the church, "whose glory was in their shame," Phil. iii. 19, whose exhortation was attended with uncleanness, deceit, and guile, 1 Thess. ii. 3, and here, who did "the hidden things of shame." Now these, say all the Greek scholiasts, were the "false apostles, τῇ τοῦ νόμου ἐπιμιξίᾳ τὸ θεῖον κήρυγμα διαβεβαιοῦντες, who corrupted the gospel, by mixing it with the law," as is apparent from the apostle's words; for speaking of these "false apostles and deceitful workers," xi. 13, he saith, ver. 22, "Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I." And that the Jewish doctors were prone to fornication, uncleanness, and adultery, we learn from the apostle's question, "Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery?" Rom. i. 22, and from the testimony of their Josephus concerning their zealots, who professed great sanctity, but were indeed guilty of "theft, treachery, adultery, the hidden things of sin:"* from the exhortation of Paul to them to look diligently, "lest there be among them any fornicator, or profane person," Heb. xii. 16. And again, "Let marriage be honourable among all, and the bed undefiled; for whoremongers and adulterers God will judge," Heb. xiii. 4 (see the note there). But this is still more evident from these Epistles to the Corinthians, among whom these deceivers had taught that fornication was a thing lawful, 1 Cor. vi. 12, and so had taught them to "corrupt the temple of God," 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; whence he says to them, "Let no man deceive you," ver. 18, and demonstrates to them by many arguments, that fornication was a sin inconsistent with the profession of Christianity, 1 Cor. vi. 13—20, that it excluded persons "from the kingdom of God," ver. 9, 10, and should exclude them from the society of Christians, v. 11. Upon all which accounts he saith, "Neither let us commit fornication, as some of the Jews did," 1 Cor. x. 8. And in his Second Epistle, and twelfth chapter, he expresses his fears, lest, when he came among them, he should find many who, through the seduction of those men, "had sinned, and had not repented of the uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness, which they had committed." That these men might be followers of Cerinthus, or of the Ebionites, see note on xi. 22. But these things do more plainly agree to the sect of Nicolas, one of the seven deacons resident at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 5), they being, saith Peter, "men walking after the flesh, in the lusts of the flesh," 2 Pet. ii. 10, and "alluring others through the lusts of the flesh," ver. 18, and, saith Jude, "men walking after their own lusts, and foaming out their own shame," ver. 13. That these men were at Pergamus, "teaching men to commit fornication," we learn from Rev. ii. 14, 15, that they were also at Ephesus, and so near to Corinth, from Rev. ii. 6, and so might probably be the persons noted by Paul, saying, Eph. v. 11, 12, "It is a shame to speak of τὰ κρυφῇ γινόμενα ὑπ' αὐτῶν, the things done by them in secret;" and that they were at Corinth, see note on 1 Cor. vi. 13—15.

[3] Ver. 3. Εἰ δὲ καὶ ἔστι κεκαλυμμένον τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἡμῶν, If our gospel be hid.] Hence we learn, that the apostles delivered the gospel, in all things necessary to be believed or done, with sufficient plainness and perspicuity; for otherwise they could not be truly said to have "manifested the truth to every man's conscience." The apostle also, by declaring, that if this gospel was hid from any to whom it was preached, it was only hid to them "whose minds the god of this world had blinded, lest the light of the glorious gospel should shine in upon them," doth plainly teach, that the gospel was not hid from them for want of clearness on the part of them who preached it, but only by reason of that blindness which Satan had wrought in them that heard it; so that, if it were not manifest to all, "the fault is not in us, or in the obscurity of the gospel, but in their own blindness, for we hide nothing from them."* So the fathers.

But here, saith Esthius, the apostle speaks not of the scriptures to be read or understood by us, but of the gospel preached by him.

Ans. To this I answer, That the scriptures writ and read to them, contain the same gospel of Christ which they preached; and as the reading of the law of Moses is styled "the preaching of Moses every sabbath-day," Acts xv. 21, so is the public reading the scriptures of the New Testament, the preaching Christ and his gospel: what reason then can be assigned why they, who confessedly preach the gospel plainly, should write the same things to the same persons obscurely; especially if we consider that they did τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν, "write the same things to them for their safety," Phil. iii. 1, to "put them in remembrance of those things which they knew, and in which they were established" by their preaching, 2 Pet. i. 13, 14, and to "stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance, that they might be mindful of the commandments of the apostles of our Lord," iii. 1, 2, that by "reading them they might understand their knowledge in the mystery of Christ!" Eph. iii. 4. And were these ends best prosecuted, or to be obtained, by writing that obscurely which they had plainly preached to them? Moreover, "whatsoever things were written aforetime," saith the apostle, "were written for our learning," Rom. xv. 4. And surely they, who writ after by the same Spirit, writ to the same end, that they to whom they wrote might be "wise to that which is good," Rom. xvi. 19, that they might "understand what the will of the Lord is," Eph. v. 17, or might "prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God," Rom. xii. 2. And if they writ "for our learning and instruction" in these things, to be sure they writ plainly and clearly as to them, since otherwise they writ not so as to instruct and teach, but to confound the reader. Seeing therefore the great end of writing the scripture was to instruct the world in the will and mind of God, and the great things of the Christian faith; either we must say, that both the writers of the scripture, and the Holy Ghost that inspired them, were defective in skill, or in care, so to write as to obtain this end, or that their writings are an effectual means to obtain it, which yet they cannot be, unless they are plain and clear, as to the great things of religion.

In short, every wise agent pursues his end by the most proper and effectual means: now surely, to write plainly, and not obscurely, is the most proper means to instruct men by writing; and so the apostles must have used this means of instructing in their writings, or else they cannot be esteemed wise agents.

[4] Ver. 4. Ὁ θεὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, The god of this world, &c.] Here observe (1.) an hyperbaton, the true sense and position of the words being thus, "Among whom are the unbelievers, whose eyes the god of this world hath blinded," &c. Note (2.) that Satan here is called by Paul "the god of this world," and Eph. vi. 12, "the ruler of the darkness of this world," agreeably both to the Jewish and Christian notion; the first ascribing to him the dominion over all that were not of the religion of the Jews, and introducing God speaking to the angel of death, or Satan, thus, "Though I have made thee κοσμοκράτορα, a ruler among the creatures of the nations, thou shalt have nothing to do with this people, because they are my sons;"† where also it presently follows "This is the angel of death, which is called Darkness."

light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the [5] image of God, should shine unto them.

5 (I say the gospel of Christ;) For we preach not ourselves (as aiming at our own glory or profit in this work), but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.

6 (And this gospel I style the gospel of the glory of Christ;) For God, who (by saying, Let there be light, and there was light) commanded the light to shine out of darkness, [6] hath (also) shined in our hearts, to give (us) [7] the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face (or person) of Jesus Christ (or, into the hearts of us apostles, to give us, and enable us to give to others, the light of the knowledge of God through Christ, whose ambassadors we are. See ver. 7).

7 But we have this (glorious) treasure in earthen vessels (i. e. in bodies subject to be broken with continual pressures), that the excellency of the power (which preserves such frail creatures under them, and enables them to do such great things in them) may (appear to) be of God, and not of us.

8 (For though) We are troubled (and griped) on every side, yet (are we) not (so) distressed (as to be brought unto extremities); we are perplexed, but not (brought) in (to) despair (of help from God);

15 For (or, and) all (these) things (we preach and

And the Christians allowing him to be ruler over all that were not converted to Christianity, and speaking of that as of the dispensation which "delivered them from the power of darkness into the kingdom of Christ," Col. i. 13, 1 Pet. ii. 9, and "turned them from Satan unto God," Acts xxvi. 18, and of the gentile world, as walking before "according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience," Eph. ii. 2; which, had the fathers considered, they would not have contended so stiffly against the Marcionites and Manichees, that the god of this world here mentioned was the true God, as both Irenæus* and Tertullian,† Chrysostom, Theodoret, Photius, Theophylact, and, as Austin‡ testifies, "almost all the ancients did;" whereas, indeed, the true God is never represented in scripture as the god of this world, but as the God of them who are called out of the world; nor is it the design of God, but of the devil, to hide the glorious light of the gospel from the world.

[5] Ὅς ἐστιν εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ, Who is the image of God.] Christ seems here to be styled "the image of God," not in the sense of Theodoret, as being "God of God," but rather, as the text insinuates, with relation to the gospel and his mediatory office; in which he hath given us many glorious demonstrations of the power, wisdom, the holiness, purity and justice, the mercy, goodness, and philanthropy of God (Tit. iii. 4).

[6] Ver. 6. Ὅς ἔλαμψεν.] Ὅς here seems put for οὗτος, he; so 1 Cor. vii. 7, ὃς μὲν οὕτως, ὃς δὲ οὕτως, is quidem sic, ille autem sic; and xi. 21, ὃς μὲν πεινᾷ, is quidem sitit, ὃς μὲν μεθύει, ille autem inebriatur.

[7] Πρὸς φωτισμὸν τῆς γνώσεως τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ, The light of the knowledge of the glory of God.] Here seems to be an allusion to the shining of the face of Moses, after he had obtained his desire of seeing the glory of God, Exod. xxxiii. 16. 19, upon which δεδόξασται ἡ ὄψις, "his face was made glorious," Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30, by reason of the glory of God that he had seen. This now, saith Paul, belongs to us apostles, the glory of God shining more gloriously in the face or person of Jesus Christ, than ever it did in Moses, and we "beholding with open face the glory of the Lord," iii. 20; whereas the children of Israel "could not steadfastly behold the glory of the face of Moses." Note also, that ἐν προσώπῳ is the constant reading of the Greek scholiasts.

[8] Ver. 10. Ἵνα καὶ ἡ ζωὴ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, &c. That the life of Jesus might be made manifest.] It being a certain demonstration that Christ is risen, and still lives, that we, who persuade others to believe this, are enabled to do such mighty wonders in his name, and patiently and constantly to suffer such fiery trials by his grace.

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐν ὑμῖν, In you.] As being made partakers of the vital efficacy of Christ, in his spiritual gifts, and of an assimilation to his resurrection by a life of holiness, but not of the like sufferings with us (1 Cor. iv. 8. 10).

[10] Ver. 13. Ἐπίστευσα, διὸ ἐλάλησα, I believed, therefore have I spoken.] These words of David were spoken when "the sorrows of death compassed him round about, and the pangs of sheol caught hold upon him," and yet he believed he "should walk before God in the land of the living," Ps. cxvi. 3. 9, 10, and therefore are applied by the apostle in the spiritual sense of them to the resurrection, thus; That as David, notwithstanding all the persecutions which he suffered from the hands of Saul, firmly believed he should be preserved and raised to a temporal kingdom, so we apostles believe that, after all our sufferings for the gospel, we shall be raised and advanced to a heavenly kingdom.

[11] Ver. 14. Ὁ ἐγείρας τὸν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν, He that raised up the Lord Jesus.] Here Schlictingius observes two things, (1.) That our Lord Jesus did not raise up himself, but was raised from the dead by the Father. (2.) That though Christ Jesus shall raise us up, yet shall he do this, not by his own power, but by the power he received from the Father.

First, Now here I acknowledge that the resurrection of our Lord is frequently ascribed in scripture to God the Father, Acts iii. 26, xiii. 32, xvii. 31, Rom. iv. 24, x. 9, 1 Cor. vi. 14, xv. 15, Gal. i. 1, Eph. i. 20, Col. ii. 12, 1 Thess. i. 9, 10, Heb. xiii. 20, 1 Pet. i. 3. 21, and the reason of the Christian dispensation requires it should be so, this being a demonstration that God the Father was satisfied with his performances and sufferings for us, and that he owned him as a true prophet, and his beloved Son, in that he raised him from the dead: but then this is not so to be understood as to exclude Christ wholly from the same action; for he himself promised to do this when he said of the temple of his body, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up," John ii. 19. 22. And that he did so, we learn from this, that after his resurrection the disciples "believed the word which Jesus spake;" whereas, had he not raised up himself, they could not have believed his word.

Let it then be noted, that our Lord was "quickened by the Spirit," 1 Pet. iii. 18, even by the Spirit by which he offered up himself (Heb. ix. 15). Since then this Spirit of God dwelt in Christ, and is by him communicated to all believers, it is easy to be understood how Christ raised up himself, and suffer) are for your sakes, that the abundant grace (conferred upon you by our ministry) might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God.

16 For which cause we faint not (under the tribulations we thus suffer); but though our outward man perish, yet the [12] inward man is renewed (with vigour and alacrity in the performance of our duty) day by day.

17 For (we know that) our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal [13] weight of glory;

18 (We faint not, I say,) [14] While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.

yet was raised up "by the power of God," as the Holy Ghost is styled, Luke i. 35. Thus also the resurrection of the just is ascribed to God the Father, Acts xxvi. 8, 1 Cor. vi. 14, Heb. xi. 19, 2 Pet. i. 3, and yet the same resurrection is frequently ascribed to Christ, John v. 28, vi. 39, 40, xi. 27, Rom. xiv. 19, 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22. 25, 26, Rev. iii. 18. And this he will effect by the power he hath in himself, John v. 26, by himself, John vi. 47. 54, "I will raise him up at the last day;" by his word, "The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God and live," John v. 28; by "the power by which he is able to subdue all things to himself," Phil. iii. 21. Now to raise the dead being a thing proper to God himself (Rom. iv. 7, Acts xxvi. 8), an instance of the power of God (Matt. xxii. 29), and the belief of it being faith in God (Heb. xi. 19, 1 Pet. i. 3), whosoever hath the power of raising all men from the dead, must have the power of God; the Godhead, "the energy of the power of the might of God" (Eph. i. 19), and the whole fullness of the Godhead dwelling in him; and if Christ did receive this power from the Father, he must receive it from him by the communication of the Godhead to him.

[12] Ver. 16. Ὁ ἔσωθεν ἄνθρωπος, The inward man.] Hence we learn that the distinction betwixt the outward and inward man is not of the same import with that of the old and new man (Rom. vi. 6), "which is renewed after the image of God in righteousness and holiness" (Eph. iv. 22, Col. iii. 9, 10); but the "outward man" that perisheth signifies only the body, the "inward" is only the mind or spirit which is in man: so that when the apostle saith in the person of a man under the law, "I delight in the law of God after the inward man," Rom. vii. 22, he saith nothing which intimates that the person speaking was "renewed in the spirit of his mind," but only that his mind was inclined to obey the law of God, though, through "the law in his members" warring against it, he was "led captive to the law of sin."

[13] Ver. 17. Βάρος δόξης, Weight of glory.] The Hebrew word כבד which answers to βάρος, weight, signifies not only multitude, but greatness, and in the rabbins, as well as scripture, honourable: so Gen. xviii. 20, "Their sin was כבדה מאד, very great" (see Gen. l. 11, Exod. ix. 3): honourable, so Exod. xx. 12, כבד, "Honour thy father and thy mother" (see Deut. xxviii. 58): so that this word may signify the magnificence, the abundance, and the honour of the future glory which is prepared for the Christian sufferer.

[14] Ver. 18.] Note hence, that it is not only lawful, but even laudable, after the example of the apostles, in our actions and sufferings, to have respect to the recompense of reward, that being by the wisdom of the Holy Ghost propounded as our encouragement to do and suffer these things.

CHAPTER V.

1 For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have (provided for us, at the restoring of it) [1] a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

2 For in this (tabernacle) we groan, earnestly desiring [2] to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven:

3 (We are, I say, desirous of this,) [3] If so be that (or, seeing that at the resurrection) being clothed we shall not be found [4] naked (i. e. since then we shall not be found naked as the wicked, but clothed with a body not subject to death).

4 For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that (through impatience under our sufferings) we would be unclothed (by putting off the body), but (as desiring, ver. 2, to be) clothed upon (with our celestial body), that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. Οἰκοδομὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἔχομεν, We have a building of God.] It was the doctrine of the Platonists,* That the soul was a kind of being which could not well subsist or act without a body, and therefore, after her separation from the body, wanted some vehicle or clothing by which she might subsist and act; and this notion was embraced by Origen, and this text was accordingly interpreted by him (see the note on 1 Cor. xv. 44, 45): and according to this notion, good Christians, as soon as they depart this life, are not found naked, but "clothed with their house from heaven," which, at the resurrection, shall be the ἐπένδυμα, or "clothing" of their raised bodies, which renders them immortal. But the apostle cannot here be supposed to mean, that as soon as ever good Christians die they shall be clothed upon with this house which is from heaven, but only that they shall be so at the resurrection. For (1.) we Christians, saith he, "groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon" with this house, ver. 2. Now, saith the same apostle, "we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, that is, the redemption of the body," Rom. viii. 23. (2.) They "groaned to be clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life," ver. 4. Now "when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal immortality, then (only) shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory" (1 Cor. xv. 24).

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐπενδύσασθαι, To be clothed upon.] By putting over this mortal body an incorruptible and eternal house. The Jews say that Adam, in his first creation, being made, ἐπ' ἀφθαρσίᾳ, "for incorruption" (Wisd. i. 23), his body was covered from corruption veste onychinâ, with a clothing like in colour to the nail of the hand. Accordingly, the apostle represents the future bodies raised incorruptible, as clothed with an immortal covering, 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54.

[3] Ver. 3. Εἴ γε καὶ, If so be.] That these words may be also rendered since, and seeing that, is evident from scripture, and good authors. Thus here, ver. 4, εἰ signifies quandoquidem, so εἴ γε ἠκούσατε, "Seeing ye have heard," Eph. iii. 2 (see the note there). And again, Eph. iv. 1. Or else, retaining our own version, we may give this sense to the words, If so be that (then) we shall be found clothed (with our celestial bodies, and so fitted for a blessed immortality), and not (as the wicked) naked (and without this heavenly building).

[4] Γυμνοὶ, Naked.] i. e. Not clothed upon with another body. So, 1 Cor. xv. 37, "Thou sowest, γυμνὸν κόκκον, naked grain," not covered with a blade, or cover of chaff, as when it riseth up out of the earth it is, or with a cod, as in beans,

* Σχῆμα ἄλλο ὁμοειδὲς τῷ αἰσθητῷ τούτῳ μετὰ τὴν ἐντεῦθεν ἐκδημίαν ἔχειν ἐκτιθέμενος τὴν ψυχὴν ἀσώματον ὑπὸ τὶ πλατωνικῶς ἀποφαίνεται αὐτήν. Τὸ γὰρ καὶ μετὰ τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ κόσμου ἀποξύτητα σχήματος αὐτὴν ἐεῖσθαι, καὶ περιβολὴς λέγειν ὡς οὐ δυναμένην κατασχεθῆναι γυμνήν. Method. ap. Phot. p. 930.

5 Now he that hath [5] wrought us for the selfsame thing (i. e. hath wrought in us this earnest desire) is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit (whereby we are sealed up to the day of redemption, Eph. iv. 30, and wait for the redemption of the body, Rom. viii. 23).

6 Therefore (having this earnest of the Spirit) we are always confident, knowing (Gr. being therefore always confident, and knowing) that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord:

7 (For (whilst it is thus with us) we walk by faith (only), not by sight:)

8 [6] We are confident, I say, and willing (we in this confidence are willing) rather to be absent from (or travel out of) the body, and to be present with the Lord (or at home with him).

9 Wherefore we labour, that, whether (we be) present (in) or absent (from the body), we may be accepted of him (at his appearance).

10 For we must all appear before the judgment seat peas, and lentiles: and accordingly, the rabbins* introduce a Samaritan or gentile, inquiring of R. Meir, "Whether the dead rise naked or clothed?" and him answering thus, that "peas, which are sown naked, arise clothed, or covered with a cod, and much more the dead:" but then they seem to restrain this to the just, saying, that "the just shall rise clothed."

[5] Ver. 5. Ὁ κατεργασάμενος ἡμᾶς εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο, He that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing.] Hence it appears, there is no ground for that dangerous opinion, that the apostle here speaks as one that believed the general resurrection and advent of our Lord to judgment would be suddenly; for, this persuasion being false, the apostle could not, in this sense, say, "We know that if this earthly tabernacle were dissolved, we have (immediately) a building of God," i. e. a heavenly body to put on. God could not "work them up" to this desire, that they might not be unclothed, i. e. not die, but live to the resurrection, to be then clothed upon; nor could the apostle, consistently with this persuasion, introduce the same Christians willing to be "absent from the body, that they might be present with the Lord." Moreover, in the preceding chapter, ver. 14, he plainly says, that they expected to be raised up by Jesus from the dead, and therefore must expect to die (see the note on 1 Thess. iv. 15).

[6] Ver. 8. Θαῤῥοῦμεν δὲ, We are confident.] i. e. We have not only confidence at his appearance (John ii. 28), but always, even in death itself, that, though it renders us absent from the body, it will bring us home to Christ, and to a nearer fruition of him. Only here note, that according to the doctrine of all the ancients, the souls of pious men are not assumed into the highest heavens, or the immediate presence of God and Christ, instantly upon their departure hence: for thus only we shall be "ever present with the Lord," 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, when, by the power of God, at the last trump, we shall be raised up to "meet him in the air;" this promise being made at his second coming to receive his disciples to himself, that "where he is, they may be also," John xiv. 3. But yet, according to all antiquity, the souls of pious men, in the mean time, are "in the place appointed for them, παρὰ τῷ Κυρίῳ, with the Lord," that is, with him in paradise, where they enjoy the sight and conversation of their Saviour by way of vision: for "Paul, and the rest of the apostles," saith Polycarp,† "are in the place appointed for them, with the Lord."—"Not only in heaven," saith Irenæus,‡ "but in paradise also, our Saviour shall be seen, as men are worthy to behold him." And this doth Pseudo-Justin§ gather from this very place, that "the souls of the just go to paradise, and converse there with Christ by vision."

Ver. 9.] I confess it is difficult to give the clear sense of the apostle's words from ver. 1 to 9, but, to do my endeavour farther towards it, observe,

First, That it cannot be proved from any thing said here, or in any other place of Paul's epistles, that the apostle himself either thought, or taught others to think, that the coming of Christ was not far off, as I have fully proved in the note on 1 Thess. iv. 15. And, indeed, this doctrine being found by experience to be false, had he himself asserted, or taught others to expect, that the coming of our Lord to judgment was at hand; seeing in that he must have been mistaken, and mislead others, what certainty can we have, that he was not mistaken, or did not mislead others, in what else he taught in his epistles? Thus, ver. 9, if when he said, 1 Cor. vii. 31, "Brethren, the time is short, and the fashion of this world passeth away;" he thus dogmatically spake not of the time of human life, and the relation we had to the world, and the world to us, but of Christ's coming to judgment, and the destruction of the world, he certainly taught false doctrine. If, when he saith, x. 11, that upon them the end of the ages was come; he meant not the last, that is the Jewish, concurring with the gospel age, but the end of the world, he then taught false doctrine. If, when he saith, Heb. x. 37, "Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry;" he meant this not of Christ's coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish state and nation, but of his coming to the final judgment, he again taught false doctrine, and endeavoured to support them with false hope, which sure must be sufficient to impair his credit in other matters taught in his epistles. Lastly, That there is no ground for this opinion is proved, note on ver. 5; they, indeed, who had "the first-fruits of the Spirit" in them might wait for his coming, as all good Christians do, but they could not by virtue of his words expect it suddenly.

Secondly, Observe, that the apostle here cannot intend to assert, that good Christians, as soon as they die, shall instantly be clothed upon with their house from heaven, but only that they shall be so at the resurrection; for, saith he, we desire to be thus clothed upon, "that mortality may be swallowed up in life:" now this he had told us, 1 Cor. xv. 54, was only to be expected, at the resurrection; for, "when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

Thirdly, Observe, that the time of the resurrection of the just, being declared to be the time of their recompense, their being crowned and like to the angels, and being "ever with the Lord," as hath been fully proved on the note on 2 Tim. iv. 5, they had good reason to be groaning after "the redemption of the body," and that crown of glory which God would give them in that day. But then, say they, we do not groan through impatience under our present afflictions; nor, as some philosophers, from an opinion that the body is the prison of the soul, and hinderance to the knowledge of the truth, and therefore counting it a happiness to be divested of it; but from a vehement desire of that glorious resurrection of it, which shall complete the happiness both of soul and body, and place it for ever with the Lord.

Lastly, Observe, that at the resurrection there shall not be only an ἔνδυμα, or clothing of the soul with its former naked body; but an ἐπένδυμα, a clothing of the body raised, with a covering that shall preserve it from corruption; and this is plainly the apostle's meaning in the similitude of grain rising not "naked," as it was sown, but "clothed upon," as is proved, note on ver. 3 here, and on 1 Cor. xv. 37. And this, I think, is the meaning of those words, ver. 3, "If so be," or "seeing we shall be ἐνδυσάμενοι, clothed upon," as the bodies of the just will be, and not γυμνοὶ, "naked," as the bodies of the wicked shall be: for, that the wicked shall have immortal bodies at the resurrection, I nowhere find clearly delivered in the holy scripture, but only that the destruction of Christ; that every one may (then) receive the things done [7] in his body (or, by the body), according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11 Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men (to believe we act in all sincerity and truth, when we propound these things to them); but (in this) we are made manifest unto God; and I trust also (we) are made manifest in your consciences (and have given you good assurance that we act sincerely).

12 For we commend not ourselves again unto you (as if we doubted of your good opinion of us), but (we say these things to) give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that ye may have somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart (or truth and sincerity, but either of other men's labours, 2 Cor. x. 15, or of things not really done by them, 2 Cor. xi. 12—21).

13 For whether we be beside ourselves (transported in speaking of our raptures, ecstasies, and visions), it is to (do service to) God: or whether we be sober (in our discourses, not desiring that others should think of us above what they see in us, 2 Cor. xii. 6), it is for your cause.

14 For the love of Christ constraineth us (thus to promote his glory, and to seek your good); because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead (i. e. obnoxious to death, and condemned to it for sin):

15 And that [8] he died for all, that they which live (by his death) should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them (i. e. for their sins), and rose again (for their justification, Rom. iv. 24, 25).

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh (i. e. according to carnal interests, the riches, honours, pleasures, and advantages of this world, 2 Cor. i. 17, x. 2): yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh (expecting him as a temporal king, and hoping for great advancements in his kingdom, as being his disciples), yet now henceforth [9] know we him (so) no more.

17 (And so it is with all his sincere votaries;) Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is (become) a new creature: old things are passed away (his affection to all temporal and carnal things); behold, [10] all things are become new (in him).

18 And all (these) things (belonging to the new creation, this change of our affections, this constraining love,) are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given (or committed) to us the ministry of reconciliation; of their bodies, as well as the torment of their souls, will be everlasting (see the reading of the text, ver. 3, vindicated, Examen Millii in locum).

19 To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, (and) not imputing their (former) trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

20 Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye [11] reconciled to God.

[7] Ver. 10. Τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος, The things done in the body.] Some manuscripts read τὰ ἴδια τοῦ σώματος, propria corporis, "the things proper to the body;" so the Vulgar Latin: both readings do sufficiently confute the doctrine of the Roman purgatory, and their prayers for the dead, as teaching men shall receive hereafter, not according to the prayers of others for them, when they are out of the body, but according to what they themselves have done in the body. Now it is sure, that what the living do of this kind for them after death, they themselves do not in the body, and so no account will be had of it in the great day. And why should they before suffer such dreadful pains in purgatory, who afterward must receive rewards or punishments, according, not to what they have suffered there, but according to what they had done in the flesh? The fathers here do farther note,

First, That the same body, which was dissolved, shall be raised again, and not another; it being absurd to think that one body should sin, and yet another should be punished for it; one body suffer, another should be crowned for it: so Methodius, Chrysostom, and Theophylact.

Secondly, That the soul is to receive its retributions with the body, and not without it, according to Methodius,* Theodoret,† and Hilary‡ the deacon, who passeth under the name of St. Ambrose.

[8] Ver. 15. Καὶ ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀπέθανεν, And he died for all.] Here observe,

First, That Christ died for all, all that were dead, all who were by his death engaged to live to him; as all, to whom the knowledge of the gospel is vouchsafed, are.

Secondly, That they do certainly mistake the meaning of these words, "Then were all dead," who thus interpret them,§ Then were all obliged to be dead to sin; for, (1.) in these two verses the word ἀπέθανον, "dead," is four times used, once before, and twice after these words, "Then were all dead," and both before and after it, undeniably signifies death in the proper acceptation of the word: who then can think that, the second time in the same sentence, it should import only an obligation to die to sin, or to ourselves? Whensoever in the scripture it bears a metaphorical sense, some other word is joined to it, which doth enforce that sense; as when we are said to "die to sin," Rom. vi. 2, to "die with Christ," Rom. vi. 8, Col. ii. 20, to "die to the law," Gal. ii. 19, to "die to the world," Gal. vi. 14, Col. iii. 3. Here, therefore, nothing being added to enforce that sense, it must be deemed alien from the text (see Examen Millii in locum).

[9] Ver. 16. Οὐκ ἔτι γινώσκομεν, We know him so no more.] It is manifest, that the disciples, whilst Christ was with them, were much addicted to those temporal interests, still striving and contending who among them should be the greatest in Christ's kingdom, Luke ix. 46, xxii. 24, asking to "sit one at his right hand, the other on his left hand, in his kingdom," Mark x. 37, and saying, "We have left all, and followed thee, what shall we have therefore?" Matt. xix. 27, and presently after his resurrection inquiring, "Wilt thou now, Lord, restore the kingdom to Israel?" Acts i. 6. These expectations, saith the apostle, we have now laid aside, and serve Christ only for spiritual and eternal advantages. Or, we may interpret these words thus: We know (i. e. respect) no man according to the flesh (i. e. according to his circumcision or nation), as being an Israelite, or of the stock of Abraham, as "knowing that in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing——but a new creature," Gal. vi. 15, and though we Jews at first knew Christ according to the flesh, adhering to circumcision and the law, even after faith in Christ, yet now do we not so; but all these old things are now passed away, we being "dead to the law, that we might live to God," Gal. ii. 20, and serving him now "in newness of spirit, not in the oldness of the letter," Rom. vii. 5.

[10] Ver. 17. Καινὰ τὰ πάντα, All things shall become new.] Καὶ ψυχὴ καινὴ, καὶ σῶμα καινὸν, καὶ λατρεία καινὴ, "The soul shall be renewed in the mind, will, and affections," the body new in its actions, as being made an instrument of righteousness, Rom. iv. 13, the worship new, Rom. vii. 6, Phil. iii. 3, the whole life new, Rom. vi. 4; so Chrysostom (see this reading vindicated, Examen Millii in locum).

[11] Ver. 20. Δεόμεθα ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, καταλλάγητε τῷ Θεῷ, Be ye reconciled to God.] Here is observable against the Socinians a double reconciliation: (1.) a reconciliation of God to us; for "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" through him; and that not by renewing our natures, but by "not imputing our trespasses to us." This reconciliation was effected, saith the next verse, by making Christ a sin-offering for us, "that we might be made the righteousness of God in him;" and this reconciliation is followed with an exhortation on our parts "to be reconciled to God."

Obj. But Crellius objects, That the reconciliation, here mentioned, is ascribed to God, and so it cannot be the appeasing of his anger by making any satisfaction to him; for can it be supposed, saith he, that God, being angry, should appease himself, and that by making satisfaction by another to himself?

Ans. I answer, That the text doth not barely say, God reconciled us to himself, but that he was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, that is, by Christ as the means of our reconciliation, or as the sin-offering by which this reconciliation was procured. It therefore is not necessary that these words should import that God, being angry, should appease himself, but only that he should declare himself so far appeased by Christ's sufferings for us, and so well satisfied with his blood shed for the remission of our sins, that he would not impute those sins to any that believed in him: the blood of Christ made a sin-offering making atonement for us, as the blood of the sin-offering under the law made atonement for the sinner, and procured the forgiveness of his sins: and if under the law satisfaction was made by the sinner to God, by a beast of his own appointing, why may it not be made under the gospel by a Saviour of his own sending?

[12] Ver. 21. Ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἁμαρτίαν ἐποίησεν, He made him sin for us.] The words here, being sacrificial, must be explained by their use in the old law, when applied to legal sacrifices. Now the word ἁμαρτία, which we render "sin," is used there customarily for a sin-offering, and is well expounded by Œcumenius, τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν θῦμα. So αἴγες, ἔριφος, μόσχος ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτίας, Ezek. xliii. 22. 25, xliv. 29, xlv. 22, 23. 25. So "the law of the sin-offering" is ὁ νόμος τῆς ἁμαρτίας, Lev. vi. 25, the bullock appointed for a sin-offering is τὸ μοσχάριον τῆς ἁμαρτίας, ὁ μόσχος ὁ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, "the bullock of sin," Exod. xxix. 36, Lev. iv. 8. 20; the goat to be sacrificed for sin, is ἡ χίμαιρα ἡ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, "the goat of sin," Lev. iv. 29. To make such a beast a sin-offering for the people, is, in the sacrificial phrase, ποιεῖν ἁμαρτίαν, ποιεῖν τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, "to make it sin," Lev. iv. 20, ix. 7, xiv. 18, xv. 19, Numb. vi. 11. 16, viii. 12. It cannot therefore be doubted, but that τοιεῖν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἁμαρτίαν τὸν Χριστὸν doth signify here to make Christ a sin-offering, or sacrifice for sin for us. The end for which he was thus made a sacrifice is this, "that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," i. e. that we might be justified by God, or might obtain forgiveness of sins, through faith in the blood of this sin-offering. For δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, "the righteousness" or "the justification of God," in Paul's style, still signifies the righteousness of faith, in Christ dying or shedding his blood for us; as in these words, δικαιοσύνη γὰρ Θεοῦ, "For the righteousness of God in him is revealed from faith to faith; as it is written, The just shall live by his faith," Rom. i. 17. Again, δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, "The righteousness of God without the law is manifest—to wit, the righteousness of God through faith of Christ," Rom. iii. 21, 22. And, x. 3, 4, "For they not knowing τὴν δικαιοσύνην τοῦ Θεοῦ, the righteousness of God, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ, to the righteousness of God. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness (that is, justification) to every one that believeth;" Phil. iii. 9, "That I may be found in him, not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is by the faith of Christ, τὴν ἐκ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει, the righteousness of God by faith." The interpretation, therefore, given in the paraphrase, is very agreeable to scripture, whereas the gloss of the Socinians puts a continual force upon the words; for where in scripture doth ποιεῖν ἁμαρτίαν signify to treat an innocent person as a sinner? where is it that to be made the righteousness of God in Christ, doth signify our being made new creatures, or our being sanctified? where doth God's reconciling us by Jesus Christ import his converting the world to himself by Christ as his ambassador? why is God said not to impute to men their trespasses by the preaching of Christ, who preached "only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," rather than by the preaching of the apostles to the whole gentile world? how was he "made sin" more than they, if he were only treated as a sinner on the account of the same doctrine, which they equally preached, and suffered for? and why may not men be said to be "made the righteousness of God" in the apostles, as well as in Christ, if this only imports our being converted, and so made righteous, by the doctrine they, as well as he, delivered?

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1. Χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ, The grace of God.] The grace of God, in the Old Testament, imports his favour and kind affection to us; and in this sense it is said in general, "A good man obtaineth, רצון, χάριν παρὰ Κυρίου, favour of the Lord," Prov. iii. 34, xii. 2, or in particular, that such a pious man found חן, χάριν, "grace in the sight of God," 2 Sam. xv. 25, Gen. vi. 8, for as when it is said that "Joseph found grace in his master's sight," Gen. xxxix. 4, xliii. 14, xlvii. 25, Exod. iii. 21, xi. 3, xii. 36, the meaning is, his master showed favour to him; and when it is added, that "the Egyptians found grace in the sight of Joseph," the meaning is, he was inclined to show favour to them, and grant them corn for their subsistence: so when the scripture saith, that pious persons "found grace in the sight of God," the phrase must signify God's inclination to show mercy, and bear a kind affection to them. The grace of God in the New Testament, when it is not used to signify the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, bears generally the same sense: as when the angel saith to Mary, "Thou hast found grace with God," Luke i. 30; Stephen of king David, that "he found grace with God," Acts vii. 46; Luke, that "Jesus increased, χάριτι, in grace with God and man," Luke ii. 52; when Paul and Silas are said to be "commended to the grace of God," for the work of the ministry, Acts xiii. 3, xiv. 26, xv. 40, this being done by their prayers to God for his favour and assistance in that work. When men said to be "justified by the grace of God," Acts xv. 11, Rom. iii. 24, Eph. i. 7, and so have forgiveness of their sins, "according to the riches of his grace," it must import the same; for justification and forgiveness of sin are acts of God's free grace and favour to the sinner. When it is said that "we are saved by the grace of our Lord Jesus," Acts xv. 11; "By grace ye are saved, not of works;" "By grace we are saved, through faith," Eph. ii. 8, 9; seeing this is spoken to men yet alive, and so obliged to "work out their salvation with fear and trembling," it cannot mean they were actually saved, but only that they were called to a state of salvation, enjoyed the means, and were put in the way of salvation by grace, according to those words of the same apostle, "He hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but the grace given us in Christ Jesus," 2 Tim. i. 9; and to be thus saved by grace, is to be saved by the mercy and favour of God to us, according to those words of the apostle, "When the kindness and love of God our Saviour to man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but by his mercy he saved us," Tit. iii. 4, 5, it being purely of the mercy and the grace of God, that any nation is called to the knowledge of salvation by Christ. When the grace of God is said to have "abounded towards us," Rom. v. 15. 20, xv. 16, that grace is styled "the free gift of God." When Paul saith, "By the grace of God I am what I am," 1 Cor. xv. 10; that he was "called by his grace," Gal. i. 15; and that "the grace of God was abundant" to him, 1 Tim. i. 13, 14, he himself interprets this of God's great mercy to so great a sinner. When he saith, "I do not frustrate the grace of God," Gal. ii. 21, this he interprets to be God's favour to mankind, in sending his Son to die for us. "The exceeding riches of his grace," Eph. ii. 7, is God's great kindness to us in Christ Jesus; and "by the grace of God" it is that "Christ tasted death for every man," 2 Tim. i. 9, Heb. ii. 9. Hence is this gospel styled, "the grace of God, which brings salvation," Tit. ii. 11; "the grace of God, which is able to build us up, and procure us an inheritance among them that are sanctified," Acts xx. 32. This also must be the import of the word, when the apostles exhort their converts to "continue in the grace of God," Acts xiii. 43; and when they inform us, that God "confirmed the word of his grace by doing signs and wonders," Acts xiv. 3, and that "the law came by Moses, but grace by Jesus Christ," John i. 17 (see the notes on Heb. xii. 28, xiii. 9, James iv. 6).

[2] Μὴ εἰς κένον τὴν χάριν δέξασθαι, Not to receive this grace in vain.] This we do, (1.) when we do not obtain the end for which it was designed, viz. "to teach us, denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live righteously, soberly, and godly in this present world." Thus those oblations, which are not acceptable to God, are styled "vain oblations," Isa. i. 13, and the worship which is not according to his will, "vain worship," Matt. xv. 9; because this worship, and these oblations, though designed to procure God's favour, will not do it. (2.) When we receive no benefit by the grace received, and it conveys no pardon or salvation to us, so upon supposition that there will be no resurrection, "your faith is in vain," 1 Cor. xv. 17, and, if you retain it not, "ye have believed in vain," ver. 2. So to "labour in vain," and "run in vain," Gal. ii. 2, iv. 11, is to do these things without profit to them for whose sakes they are done; and those are called "vain questions," and "vain words," Tit. iii. 9, Matt. xii. 36, which are unprofitable.

[3] Ver. 2. Καιρῷ δεκτῷ ἐπήκουσά σου, I have heard thee in a time acceptable.] These are the words of God the Father to Christ, signifying, that he had accepted his intercession for the conversion of the gentiles, and declaring that he had given him εἰς διαθήκην τῶν ἐθνῶν, "for a covenant to the nations, a light to the gentiles, and his salvation to the ends of the earth," Isa. xlix. 6. 8; and so the Jews interpret them, in Pug. Fid. par. ii. cap. 11, §. 21. That salvation, either in the prophet, speaking of Christ as "the salvation of the ends of the earth," or in the apostle, speaking of "the day of salvation," should mean the deliverance of the Christians from the persecuting Jews, is very improbable in itself, and is confuted by those words, "Now is the day of salvation;" for Christians then groaned under persecution, both from Jew and gentile; and the destruction of Jerusalem, which is supposed to have brought this deliverance to the Christians from the persecuting Jews, was fourteen years after the writing this epistle.

[4] Ver. 4. Ἐν θλίψεσιν,] Say some, imports afflictions in the general; ἀνάγκαι more grievous troubles; στενοχωρίαι such pressures as reduce us to the greatest straits (see iv. 8, 9, vii. 11. 13).

[5] Ver. 7. Δεξιῶν καὶ ἀριστερῶν, On the right hand and on the left.] All the Greek scholiasts here understand by δεξιὰ τὰ εὐθημότερα, "things prosperous and grateful;" by τὰ ἀριστερὰ, τὰ λυπηρὰ πάντα, "all things which are grievous, or afflictive;" instructing us, that both these things have their temptations, against which we are to arm ourselves; and to such things I have referred them in the paraphrase. But the scholiast upon Sophocles* informs us, that ἀριστερὰ οἱ παλαιοὶ τὰ μωρὰ ἐκάλουν, δεξιὰ δὲ τὰ συνετὰ, "the ancients styled foolish things left-handed, but wise things right-handed." And in Aristophanes,† μανθάνειν δεξιὰ, is "to learn wise things;" and so this armour may be to protect them against the follies of the vulgar, and the wisdom of the philosophers and wise men of the world.

[6] Ver. 11. Τὸ στόμα ἡμῶν ἀνέῳγε πρὸς ὑμᾶς, Our mouth is opened to you.] That is, say the Greek interpreters, we are so full of affection, that we cannot, σιγᾶν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, be silent, or abstain from declaring our affection to you, and our boasting of you, 2 Cor. vii. 14, ix. 2, 3.

[7] Ver. 13. Τὴν αὐτὴν δὲ ἀντιμισθίαν (ὡς τέκνοις λέγω).] The sense of these words seems to run thus, λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν ὡς τέκνοις, "And I say unto you as children, τὴν αὐτὴν δὲ ἀντιμισθίαν ἀναδείξαντες τὴν ἰσότητα τῆς φιλίας ἔχοντες, showing the same affection by way of recompense, πλατύνθητε καὶ ὑμεῖς, let your hearts or affections be enlarged towards us, as ours are towards you," ver. 11. So Œcumenius and Theophylact.

[8] Ver. 14. Μὴ γίνεσθε ἑτεροζυγοῦντες ἀπίστοις, Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers.] Here note, that these words cannot be duly brought to prove, that Christians must not communicate with vicious persons at the table of the Lord, heathenish rites, or in the matrimonial yoke): for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?

16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? (you therefore must have none with them,) for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in (i. e. among) them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

though they be Christians in profession, since the apostle only speaks of unbelievers. (2.) The apostle here useth the very words by which the prophet Isaiah (lii. 11) exhorts the Jews to preserve themselves in Babylon from the contagion of their idolatry, and by which St. John exhorts all Christians not to partake of the sins, or the spiritual whoredom of the beast, Rev. xviii. 4. He, therefore, cannot be supposed to forbid all Christians all converse even with the unbeliever; for he permits the believing husband to live with his unbelieving wife, and will not suffer the believing wife to depart from her unbelieving husband (1 Cor. vii. 12, 13); he therefore only doth forbid communion with them in actions proper to them as heathens, and alien from the profession of Christianity; viz. their feastings and sacrifices in the idol temples (1 Cor. viii. 10, x. 21); and by analogy, he also may be supposed to forbid Christians to marry with an unbeliever; for this was always held unlawful for the Jews to marry with a heathen,* till they became proselytes to their religion; for they, looking upon themselves as the pure servants of God (Neh. ii. 20, see note on 1 Cor. vii. 14), thought it a corruption of the holy seed to marry with "the people of the earth;" and hence, when this was done Ezra complains, παρήχθη σπέρμα ἅγιον ἐν τοῖς λαοῖς τῆς γῆς, "the holy seed was mixed with the people of the earth," Ezra ix. 9. Now, the Christians being made "a holy nation, a peculiar people," the holy temple in which God by his Spirit dwelt, it seemeth as unfit that they should marry with heathenish idolaters; and therefore to such of them as were free, the apostle speaks thus, "Let them marry only in the Lord," 1 Cor. vii. 39, i. e. to one of their own religion: the marriage with an infidel being the closest conjunction with them, subjecting them many times to necessary abstinence from Christian assemblies, and to continual temptation to apostasy, or compliance with their evil manners.

[9] Ver. 18. Ἔσομαι ὑμῖν εἰς πατέρα, I will be to you a Father.] These words are not to be found in Jer. xxxi. 9, but they are the words of God to Solomon, the ruler of his people, δικαστὴν υἱῶν σου καὶ θυγατέρων, "a judge over his sons and daughters," Wisd. iv. 7; and they begin thus, τὸ δὲ λέγει Κύριος παντοκράτωρ, "Thus saith the Lord Almighty,"

* Ran. act. iv. sc. 2, p. 264.

2 Sam. vii. 8, and ver. 14, ἐγὼ ἔσομαι αὐτῷ εἰς πατέρα, καὶ αὐτὸς ἔσταί μοι εἰς υἱόν, "I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a son;" which words are by the apostle ascribed to Christ, Heb. i. 4, 5, and here to all Christians, as being members of his body, and joint-heirs with him. Moreover the Jews* boasted that "the divine Majesty dwelt among them." "After the days of Jacob," saith the book Cosri,† "holy men increased into a great assembly; and the Shechinah, or divine Majesty, rested upon them by love, to be their God." This favour God here promises to pious Christians, as being the true Israelites. Again, they also thought that purity from uncleanness was a necessary requisite to obtain this presence of God: "For God," say they, "doth not appropriate his name to Israel, to be called their God, but when their camps are holy; but at that very moment that they are so, he makes his presence to dwell among them and becomes their God;"‡ and these things the apostle, according to the scripture language, here applies to the society of Christians. And oh! what a powerful argument do they minister to all Christians, to "cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God," as they desire this Almighty Lord and Protector to be still present with them, and would not be obnoxious to the dreadful woe which will certainly follow upon his departure (Hos. ix. 12); as they would have this God to be "their God," which is a state of present bliss; for "blessed are the people who have the Lord for their God;" as they would have him related to them as a heavenly Father, which relation secures the enjoyment of all blessings to them, which they daily ask (Matt. vii. 12); lastly, as they desire to be his "sons and daughters," and, by that glorious relation, to be made "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ" (Rom. viii. 17), and to have "the Spirit of his Son in their hearts, crying Abba, Father" (Gal. iv. 6).

CHAPTER VII.

1 Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved (of a God thus related to and dwelling with us), let us cleanse ourselves [1] from all filthiness of the flesh (all uncleanness and intemperance) and spirit (all idolatry), perfecting (or still making progress in) holiness in the fear of (that holy) God (who dwelleth in, and stands so near related to, us.

2 And) Receive us (into your kind affections; for) we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man (from the truth), we have defrauded no man (as your false apostles have done, 2 Cor. xi. 3. 20).

3 I speak not this (with an evil mind) to condemn you (as suspecting such things of us): for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts (iii. 2, so that we are ready) to die and live with you; (i. e. we love you so affectionately, that we could even die for the promotion of your welfare.

4 And therefore) Great is my boldness (or freedom) of speech toward you, great (also) is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort (for your obedience, ver. 14, and your liberality, 2 Cor. ix. 2), I am exceeding joyful (on that account) [2] in all our tribulation.

5 (I say, our tribulations;) For, when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest (from them), but we were troubled (and pressed) on every side; without were fightings (with the opposers of the gospel), within were fears (lest the false apostles should have perverted you from the simplicity which is in Christ, 2 Cor. xi. 3).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VII.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἀπὸ παντὸς μολυσμοῦ, &c. From all filthiness of flesh and spirit.] The sins of the Corinthians being uncleanness and idolatry (see the preface to the first epistle, and the notes on ch. x.), they seem to be here more especially intended.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ θλίψει ἡμῶν, Under all our tribula- that are cast down, comforted us (also) by the coming of Titus (with good tidings from you, ver. 13);

7 And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, (which he discovered to us) when he told us your earnest desire (to rectify what was amiss in the matter of the incestuous person), your mourning (for your miscarriage in it), your fervent mind toward me (and zeal against my adversaries); so that I rejoiced the more (for his consolation, than for his coming).

8 For (therefore) though I made you sorry with a letter,[3] I do not repent (Gr. I am not sorry), though I did repent: (Gr. though I was sorry, viz. that I was forced to make you so, ii. 4,) for I perceive that the same epistle hath made you sorry, though it were but for a (little) season.

9 Now I rejoice, not (barely) that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

10 For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation[4] not to be repented of (Gr. not repented of): but the sorrow of the world worketh death.

11 For behold this selfsame thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you (of obeying my directions, ver. 15), yea, what clearing of yourselves (from guilt, by inflicting censures on the guilty person, and putting away evil from among you, 1 Cor. xv. 15), yea, what indignation (against him who had so dishonoured his profession, and defiled the church), yea, what fear (of my displeasure, or the rod I threatened, 1 Cor. iv. 21), yea, what vehement desire (to rectify what was amiss in this matter, ver. 7), yea, what zeal (for me), yea, what revenge (in punishing the delinquent! So that) in all things (by this department) ye have approved yourselves[5] to be clear (from guilt) in this matter.

12 Wherefore, though I wrote (so severely) unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, (as delighting in his punishment,) nor for his cause that suffered wrong (i. e. out of particular kindness to the father of the incestuous person), but (chiefly) that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you.

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort (i. e. in the comfort we received from your deportment in this matter): yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus (in you), because his spirit was refreshed by you all.

14 For (now) if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we spake all things to you in truth (and sincerity), even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth.

15 And his inward affection (Gr. his bowels) is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling ye received him (lest there should be any thing found in you that might offend him, or require my rod).

16 I rejoice therefore that I (can) have (this) confidence in you in all things.

tions.] As ἐπί signifies, Mark ii. 26, Luke iii. 2, iv. 17, Acts xi. 28, 1 Cor. vi. 1. 6, or, "amidst them," as Luke xii. 14, or, "after them," as Phil. ii. 27, Heb. ix. 15.

[3] Ver. 8. Οὐ μεταμέλομαι, I do not repent.] It seems incongruous that the apostle should repent of what he writ by the direction of the Holy Ghost, and to this very end to stir up a godly sorrow in them; and therefore it seems better to render the original, οὐ μεταμέλομαι εἰ καὶ μετεμελόμην, with Grotius and others, Non doleo quanquam doluit mihi, "I am not sorry now, though I was sorry when I writ this epistle," doing it with many tears (ii. 4). Or thus, "I do not repent, though I should have repented," viz. if it had not found this good effect upon you.

[4] Ver. 10. Ἀμεταμέλητον, Not repented of.] That is, such a change from the service of sin, to the service of God, as we do not revoke, or repent of, by relapsing again into the sins once left off. Note also, that godly sorrow is not itself repentance, but that which tends to work it in us, by preserving us from relapsing into that offence, which created so much bitterness and anguish to us. "The sorrow of the world worketh death," it dries up the moisture of the body (Prov. xvii. 22), and hath killed many (Ecclus. xxx. 23).

[5] Ver. 11. Ἁγνοὺς εἶναι, To be clear.] Note, here, that true repentance from sin clears us from the guilt of it, not only in the sight of God, but man; so that it is both uncharitable and unchristian, to stigmatize or reproach any person for the sin we know, or believe, he hath truly repented of.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Moreover, brethren, we do you to wit of (Gr. (we make known to you)[1] the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia, (Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, &c.;)

2 How that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy (in the Holy Ghost appeared, 1 Thess. i. 6) and their deep poverty abounded[2] unto the riches of their liberality (or how they being very poor, and much afflicted, Acts xvi. 20, xvii. 5. 13, did notwithstanding, with great cheerfulness and joy, make a rich contribution towards the relief of their poor brethren in Judea).

3 For to their power, I bear record, yea, and[3] beyond their power (or abilities) they (unsolicited by us) were

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

[1] Ver. 1. Τὴν χάριν Θεοῦ τὴν δεδομένην ἐν, The grace of God bestowed on.] Or the charitable contribution given in the churches of Macedonia, to which they were excited by God's rich grace towards them; for that χάρις signifies liberality, appears from ver. 6, "I exhorted Titus to finish in you χάριν ταύτην, this charitable contribution;" and ver. 7, that ye also may abound ἐν τῇ χάριτι ταύτῃ, "in this liberal contribution;" and ver. 19, "Who was chosen of the churches to travel with us, σὺν τῇ χάριτι ταύτῃ, with this charity" to be dispensed by us. So ix. 8, "God is able to make πᾶσαν χάριν, all liberality" abound among you; and 1 Cor. xvi. 3, "to bring τὴν χάριν, your liberality" to the poor Christians. Hence χάριν is by Hesychius and Phavorinus interpreted "a gift," as it is here, by the apostle saying of this abounding charity, "Thanks be to God for this unspeakable gift," ix. 14, 15. This charity is styled "the grace of God," either for its exceeding greatness, as "the cedars of God," and "mountains of God," signify great mountains and cedars (Ps. xxxvi. 7, lxxx. 11, see note on Acts vii. 20, Gen. xxiii. 6, xxx. 5, John iv. 3), or rather as proceeding from God as the giver of this disposition, and the motive to this charity, as "the zeal of God," 2 Cor. xi. 2, "the love of God," 2 Cor. v. 14, "the grace of God," Tit. ii. 11.

[2] Ver. 2. Εἰς τὸν πλοῦτον τῆς ἁπλότητος αὐτῶν, To the riches of their liberality.] So the word ἁπλότης usually signifies both in the Old and New Testament. So Prov. xi. 25, ψυχὴ ἁπλῆ, "The liberal soul shall be made fat;" Rom. xii. 8, "He that giveth, let him do it ἐν ἁπλότητι, with liberality;" 2 Cor. ix. 11, "Being enriched in all things, εἰς πᾶσαν ἁπλότητα, to all liberality;" and again, ver. 13, James i. 5, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask it of God, who giveth ἁπλῶς, liberally."

[3] Ver. 3. Ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, Beyond their power.] Thus Philo* willing of themselves (to contribute to the necessities of the poor saints of Judea;

4 Not being entreated by us, but) Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints; (or be one of those who should take care for the administration and conveyance of it to them, ver. 19—21, ix. 12, 13, 1 Cor. xvi. 4, Acts xiv. 17.)

5 And this they did, [4] not as we hoped (or thought the event would be, who could expect only a small collection from men so poor, and so exhausted), but first (they) gave their own selves to the Lord (i. e. to his service in it), and unto us (to be employed in the promotion of this charity, or the distribution of it to others,) by the will of God (moving them so to do, or according to his will, 2 Cor. ix. 4).

6 Insomuch that (seeing this forwardness in others) we desired Titus, that as he had (in his last visit of you) begun, so he would also (now) finish in you the same grace (or charity) also (and see that ye be not defective in it).

7 Therefore (Gr. ἀλλ', but), as ye abound in every (other) thing (or gift), in faith, and utterance, and knowledge (1 Cor. i. 5), and in all diligence (to amend what I had blamed you for, 2 Cor. vii. 11), and in your love to us, (ibid. ver. 7, so) see that ye abound (or, I pray that ye would abound) in this grace also.

8 I speak [5] not (this) by (way of) commandment, but (of advice only, ver. 10) by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of *your love (to Christ and his saints.

* All the Greek scholiasts here read ὑμετέρας.

notes it as the excellency of a servant to engage in his master's service, not only readily and laboriously, but even ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, "beyond his strength."

[4] Ver. 5. Οὐ καθὼς ἠλπίσαμεν, Not as we hoped.] The word ἠλπίσας, hoping, is used by the Attics, say grammarians,* "not only touching good things, but simply touching the event of what is future." The word hath two senses which well agree to this place, viz. (1.) προσδοκᾶν, to expect; and so it is rendered by Hesychius and Phavorinus. (2.) To conjecture; so Eustachius says, ἀντὶ τοῦ στοχάζεσθαι κεῖται, τῷ ἐλπίσθαι, "The word signifies to conjecture" (see Aristotle ad Nichom. lib. ix. cap. 4).

[5] Ver. 8. Οὐ κατ' ἐπιταγὴν, Not by way of commandment or injunction.] i. e. The apostle commands not how much they should confer, much less that they should give all their substance and live upon a common stock, leaving nothing to themselves which they could call their own; for where no man hath any thing of his own, there is no place for liberality.

[6] Ver. 9. Δι' ὑμᾶς ἐπτώχευσε πλούσιος ὤν, &c. Being rich, he became poor for you.] These words the Socinians interpret thus; That Christ being the only Son of God, conceived by the Holy Ghost, and endued with the power of the Holy Ghost, and being one to whose power all things in the earth did yield, was therefore styled rich; and that he became poor when he was bound, led away, exposed to contempt, spit upon, smitten on the face, whipped, crucified. But this interpretation seems not well consistent with the words of the apostle. For,

1. All these sufferings are indeed proper indications of infamy cast upon him, and seeming infirmity in him, but not of poverty, seeing the richest man may be exposed to all or any of those things.

2. The words seem to imply some change in the person, of whom it is here said, that "being rich, he became poor;" whereas Christ was not less the Son of God, or less endued with power, when he thus suffered, as appears by the great miracles he then did. Others of them say, that he became poor by leading a poor life on earth. But (1.) it is not by

* Ἐλπίσας, οὐ μόνον ἐπ' ἀγαθῶν, ἀλλ' ἁπλῶς ἐπὶ τῇ τοῦ μέλλοντος ἐκβάσει λέγεται παρ' Ἀττικοῖς. Suidas.

9 And command you I need not;) For ye know the grace (or kindness) of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, [6] though he was rich (Gr. that being rich), yet for your sakes he became poor, that (ὑμεῖς) ye through his poverty might be rich (or, as Chrysostom and Œcumenius read, that (ἡμεῖς) we through his poverty might be rich; which is the same in sense with the other reading).

10 And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, [7] not only to do, but also to be forward [8] a year ago.

11 Now therefore perform (or complete) the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance (of that will) also out of that which ye have.

12 For if there be first a willing mind, (whatsoever is given) it is accepted according to that a man hath, [9] and not (expected he should give) according to that he hath not.

13 For I mean not that other men be eased (or by your charity should live at ease), and ye (in the mean time) burdened (with want):

14 But (that Christian charity should be managed) by [10] an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that (another time) their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality:

15 (That in your peregrination it may be) As it is written (of the Jews travelling in the wilderness, where) he that had gathered much (manna) had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack (Exod. xvi. 18).

16 But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he (not only) accepted the exhortation his poverty on earth that "we are made rich," but by the humiliation of himself. And (2.) he was thus poor from his birth and cradle, even before the Holy Spirit descended on him at his baptism. How much more naturally therefore are these words interpreted by that of the same apostle, that "being in the form of God, and thinking it no robbery to be equal with God, he emptied himself" of all his glory, when he came to take our nature on him, taking together with it "the form of a servant, and humbling himself to the death, even the death of the cross?" Phil. ii. 7, 8 (see the note there). Which death, saith Irenæus, he could only suffer ἡσυχάσαντος τοῦ Λόγου, "the divine nature being then quiescent," and not active in him. This is that "glory which he had with the Father before the world was," and which he, after his ascension, reassumed (John xvii. 5). Now, if Christ thus emptied himself of his glory, that we might be spiritually rich, it becomes us, in imitation of his great example, to part with our temporals, to supply the exigencies of his needy and afflicted members.

[7] Ver. 10. Οὐ μόνον τὸ ποιῆσαι, ἀλλὰ δὲ τὸ θέλειν, Not only to do, but to be willing or forward.] It is known that the will goes before the deed; and therefore τὸ θέλειν here cannot barely signify to will, but either to do it μετὰ προθυμίας, with readiness and zeal, as the following verse interprets it, or with delight, as the word often signifies: so 1 Sam. xviii. 22, θέλει ἐν σοὶ βασιλεὺς, "The king delights in thee." See 2 Sam. xv. 26, Ps. v. 4, xxi. 8, xl. 12, Esth. vi. 6, 7, viii. 11, Mal. iii. 1, Matt. xxvii. 43, in all which places it answers to the Hebrew word חפץ.

[8] Ἀπὸ πέρυσι, A year ago.] The apostle had exhorted them in his epistle, writ a year ago, to this contribution (1 Cor. xvi. 2); and they, in obedience to his directions, had begun to lay up in store willingly this charity he now exhorts them to consummate; and this he says, to show they were not only moved to it by the example of the Macedonians, but rather were examples to them (ix. 2).

[9] Ver. 12. Οὐ καθὸ οὐκ ἔχει, Not according to what he hath not.] What is due to another, either by debt or duty of making provision for those of his own family, cannot be charitably given, as being not our own.

[10] Ver. 14. Ἰσότης, An equality.] So far Christianity seems to require this equality, as that we should not suffer others to

(I made to him concerning this employment); but being more forward (than I thought to find him), [11] of his own accord he went unto you.

18 And we have sent with him the brother, [12] whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches;

19 And not that (or so) only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace (or charity), which is administered (or dispensed) by us to the glory of the same Lord, and (to the) declaration of your ready mind (to relieve your poor brethren, or of our ready mind to perform this charitable office. Theodoret and Œcumenius read, ἡμῶν:

20 We, by taking such faithful companions with us,) Avoiding (or taking care of) this, that no man should blame us (or charge us with insincerity) in this abundance (of your liberality) which is administered by us:

21 (And so) Providing for honest (Gr. creditable) things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men.

22 And we have sent with them [13] our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent (in this employment), upon the great confidence which I have in you.

23 Whether any do enquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellowhelper concerning you (in promoting your welfare and reformation, 2 Cor. ii. 13, vii. 6, 7): or (whether) our brethren be enquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and (the promoters of) the glory of Christ.

24 Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love (to me), and of our boasting on your behalf (i. e. that we did not vainly boast of your readiness to perform such works of charity.

lack the necessaries of this present life whilst we abound in them.

[11] Ver. 17. Αὐθαίρετος, Of his own accord.] Here we see the sweet harmony there is betwixt the gifts of God and our persuasion and free-will. Titus was moved to this work by Paul's exhortation, and was also "willing of his own accord;" and yet God, saith the apostle, "put this earnest care into his heart."

[12] Ver. 18. Οὗ ὁ ἔπαινος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ, διὰ πασῶν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, Whose praise is in the gospel.] Who this brother was is much contested; antiquity hath carried it for Luke, worthy of praise in all churches for the gospel he writ. The authority of this assertion seems to rest upon the words of Origen,* the interpolated Ignatius,† and St. Jerome.‡ And this difficulty lies against it, that this brother is sent before Paul to Corinth with Titus, whereas Luke went with him to Troas, and from thence to Corinth (Acts xx. 4. 6). So Dr. Lightfoot. To which it may be answered, that it is not certain that Paul went from Troas to Corinth; perhaps he rather went from Philippi to Corinth, and so to Troas (see the preface). And so this person being chosen by the churches to travel with this charity (ver. 19), might be both sent before to prepare it; and being returned, to give notice to Paul that it was ready, might go back with him to receive it.

[13] Ver. 22. Τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἡμῶν, Our brother.] Apollos, say some of the ancients, viz. Theodoret and Œcumenius, who before doubted of them, and so was not disposed to come to them (1 Cor. xvi. 12): but now upon Paul's confidence of their readiness to obey his precepts, was prevailed upon to come.

CHAPTER IX.

1 (To me, I say, and to those messengers of the church:) for as touching the ministering to the saints (in Judea), it is superfluous for me to write to you (again):

2 For I know the [1] forwardness of your mind (in that affair,) for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and (the fame and example of) your zeal hath provoked very many.

3 Yet have I sent the brethren (mentioned viii. 17, 18), lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said (viii. 11), ye may be (found) ready:

4 Lest haply if they of Macedonia (who gave themselves up to us, viii. 5) come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the (aforesaid) brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand [2] your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of (free) bounty, and not (extorted from

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IX.

[1] Ver. 2. Τὴν προθυμίαν ὑμῶν, Your forwardness.] Some tell us that St. Paul preached the gospel at Corinth freely for two reasons: (1.) Because he observed in them such a saving temper, as would hinder the progress of the gospel if it should prove matter of charge to them. But this cannot be a true account of the matter: (1.) because he doth the same at Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia, "labouring night and day, because he would not become chargeable to any of them" (1 Thess. ii. 6. 9, 2 Thess. iii. 8), and throughout all Asia, saying thus to them, "You know that these hands have ministered to my necessities, and to those that are with me" (Acts xx. 33). And it seems plain from his own words, that "no church communicated" any thing to him, but that of Philippi (Phil. iv. 15, 16). (2.) Because he commends them for their readiness and willing mind here, and viii. 11. 19, and mentions the liberality of their contribution, and their "unspeakable gift," with thanks to God, ver. 13—15, in this chapter, in which he doth exhort them to complete it. (3.) Because they contributed to others, who were "false apostles," and suffered them to take of them; so he insinuates in these words, "If others are partakers of this power over you, are not we much more?" This he speaks, say Chrysostom and the Greek scholiasts, not of Peter or the other apostles; for then he would not have said, "Are not we much more" partakers of this power than they? ἀλλ' ἑτέρων τινῶν νόθων, "but of some false apostles," and corrupters of them, of whom he saith, 2 Cor. xi. 20, "You suffer if a man devour you, if he take of you;" which is also a confutation of the second pretended reason of this abstinence, that the apostle did this to disappoint the arts of these false teachers, who preached the gospel freely, and gloried in so doing (see the note on 2 Cor. xi. 12, 13). The apostle himself gives another reason of the doing this, both here and elsewhere, viz. not because we have not power, but "to make ourselves an example for you to follow us," 2 Thess. iii. 9. And again, Acts xx. 34, "I have shown you all things, how that so doing you ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is better to give than to receive."

[2] Ver. 5. Τὴν εὐλογίαν ὑμῶν, Your gift.] Or present, to the you with difficulty) as [3] (a matter) of covetousness.

6 But (to preserve you from this temper) this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully (from God again, Prov. xi. 24, 25).

7 Every man (then) according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or (as) [4] of necessity (to avoid shame, or only to comply with the example or importunity of others): for God loveth a cheerful giver.

8 And (to this end consider, that) [5] God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good (and charitable) work:

9 (According) (As it is written (Psal. cxii. 9), He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: [5] his righteousness (i. e. his liberality) remaineth for ever (in remembrance before God).

10 Now (may) he that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your [7] righteousness;)

11 (That you may still make progress in them,) Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulness, which causeth through us (who dispense it) thanksgiving to God.

12 For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto (the glory of) God;

13 Whiles by the experiment of this ministration they (who receive the benefit of it) glorify God for your [8] professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men;

14 And (you also will receive advantage) by their prayer for you, which long after you (and earnestly desire your welfare) for the exceeding grace of God (they see) in you.

15 Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift (i. e. this admirable charity, by which God is so much glorified, the gospel receives such credit, others are so much benefited, and you will be so plentifully by God rewarded).

churches in Judea; for as the Hebrew ברכה, so the Greck εὐλογία, oft signifies a gift, or present: as when Jacob saith to Esau, λάβε τὰς εὐλογίας μοῦ, "Receive my present," Gen. xxxiii. 11, and Abigail to David, λαβὲ τὴν εὐλογίαν ταύτην, "Receive this gift," 1 Sam. xxv. 27, and Naaman to Elisha, λαβὲ τὴν εὐλογίαν, "Receive a gift from thy servant," 2 Kings v. 15 (see also Judg. i. 15, 1 Sam. xxx. 26).

[3] Καὶ μὴ ὥσπερ πλεονεξίαν, And not as a matter of covetousness.] The Corinthians abounded, saith Chrysostom,* περὶ τῶν ἄλλων πάντων τῇ τῶν χρημάτων περιουσίᾳ, "in wealth above all other cities, as being a very famous mart," and so the apostle is concerned to stir them up to an abundant charity, as he did, ver. 14, and because riches begat covetousness, he here arms them against that vice. Note also, that to give alms out of shame, or to satisfy the importunity of others, rather than out of love and good-will, is a symptom of a covetous temper.

[4] Ver. 7. Μὴ ἐξ ἀνάγκης, Not of necessity.] Note, that necessity in scripture stands opposed not to coaction, but to the free election of the will (see the note on Philem. 14, and on 1 Pet. v. 2).

[5] Ver. 8. Δυνατὸς ὁ Θεός, God is able.] Here note, that not only the promise but the power of that God, who is good to all, is a motive to expect his grace and favour (see the note on Rom. xi. 23, Heb. ii. 18). Note, secondly, περισσεύσαι here signifies to make, or cause to abound; so Matt. xiii. 22, xxv. 29. Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, καὶ περισσευθήσεται, "and he shall be made to abound;" 1 Thess. iii. 12, "The Lord make you to increase, καὶ περισσεύσαι, and to abound in love."

[6] Ver. 9. Ἡ δικαιοσύνη αὐτοῦ, His righteousness.] That is, his liberality, as the word often signifies in the Septuagint. So Gen. xix. 19. Thou hast magnified τὴν δικαιοσύνην σου, "thy mercy, or kindness to me;" xx. 13, ταύτην τὴν δικαιοσύνην, "This kindness thou shalt show me;" xxiv. 27, He "hath not left τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ, his kindness to Abraham" (see ver. 49, xxxii. 10, Exod. xv. 13, xxxiv. 7, Prov. xx. 28, xxxi. 21, Isa. lxiii. 7). Hence צדקה is ten times by the Septuagint rendered ἐλεημοσύνη, "alms."

[7] Ver. 10.] Note, that all the Greek scholia read δικαιοσύνης not διακονίας, "ministry."

[8] Ver. 13. Ἐπὶ τῇ ὑποταγῇ τῆς ὁμολογίας.] Ὁμολογία in the New Testament still signifies the confession of faith, 1 Tim. vi. 12, 13, Heb. iii. 1, iv. 14, x. 23, ὑποταγῇ, subjection to the precepts of that faith. So the apostle signifies, that men seeing in them, by this charity, the sincerity of their love (viii. 8), and so of their obedience to the gospel, will be induced to glorify God, and own the excellency of that religion which produceth such fruits of righteousness.

* Præfatio in Epist. Prim.

CHAPTER X.

1 Now I Paul myself (who would not deal severely with you) beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ (which I desire to imitate, even I), who in (or, as to my) presence am (esteemed) base among you, but being absent am (accounted) bold toward you (ver. 10):

2 But (whatsoever you esteem me) I beseech you, that I may not (find reason to) be bold when I am present with that confidence, wherewith I think (meet) to be bold against some, which think of us as if we walked according to the flesh; (now saying one thing, and then another, according to our carnal interests, 2 Cor. i. 17.)

3 For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh (exercising our authority in weakness):

4 (For [1] the weapons of our warfare are not (weak, Isa. xxxi. 3, and) carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of (the) strong holds) (of the gentiles);

5 Casting down (their) imaginations (and reasonings), and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and [2] bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of (the gospel of) Christ (i. e. making the gentiles obedient to it in word and deed, by mighty signs and wonders, and by the power of the Spirit of God, xv. 18, 19);

6 And having in a readiness to revenge all (the) disobedience (of your dissolute members, xii. 20, 21,

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. X.

[1] Ver. 4. Τὰ ὅπλα τῆς στρατείας ἡμῶν, The weapons of our warfare.] That these include the censures of the apostolical authority is certain; but that they are to be restrained to them I do not think; but rather that they chiefly do refer to the miraculous powers God hath given them for the conversion of the gentiles to the Christian faith. Moreover, the apostolical rod seems not to relate to the power of excommunication, but of inflicting corporal diseases on persons refractory and disorderly, and seemeth not to have been continued after the death of the apostles.

[2] Ver. 5. Αἰχμαλωτίζοντες πᾶν νόημα, Captivating every thought.] The apostle speaks not here of captivating the reason of a Christian to the articles of faith, by his belief of any thing proposed as such, though never so absurd, or con-and of these deceitful workers, by punishing them with our spiritual rod, 1 Cor. iv. 21), [3] when your obedience is (or shall have been) fulfilled.

7 Do ye look on things after the outward appearance (judging of me from my outward person, and the infirmities of my body, v. 1, 2, and not from the power of Christ resting upon me, 2 Cor. xii. 9, and working by me)? If any man (on account of his gifts) trust to himself that he is Christ's, (a minister of Christ, 2 Cor. xi. 23, an apostle of Christ, ver. 13,) let him of himself think (or conclude) this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's; (for the proofs of Christ speaking in me are not weak, but mighty, 2 Cor. xiii. 3, and in nothing are we behind the very chiefest apostles, xii. 11.)

8 For though I should boast somewhat more (than I do, or they can do,) [4] of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed (or put to shame):

9 (And this I say,) That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters (as you say I do).

10 [5] For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful; but his [6] bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible.

11 (But) Let such an one think (or conclude) this, that, such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we be also in deed when we are present, (for if I come again I will not spare, xiii. 2, but punish all disobedience.

12 This I say only,) For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some (among you) that commend themselves (for their own performances above measure, not considering how much they fall short of the performances of them they vilify): but they (thus) measuring themselves (only) by themselves, and comparing themselves (only) among themselves (one false apostle with another), are not wise.

13 [7] But we will not boast (Gr. neither will we boast) of things without our measure (or the commission given us by Christ to go to the gentiles, Rom. xv. 16, Gal. ii. 7. 9), but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you (gentiles, we having preached through all the interjacent provinces from Judea to you of Corinth, Rom. xv. 19).

14 For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come (before any others) as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ:

15 Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you (giving testimony to our labours) according to our rule (Gr. in respect of our line) abundantly,

16 To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand.

17 But he (of us) that glorieth (of his apostleship or ministry), let him glory in the (power or assistance the) Lord (affordeth to render it successful).

18 For not he that commendeth himself is (an) approved (minister or apostle of Christ), but (he) whom the Lord commendeth (by his gifts vouchsafed to, and by the power of Christ attending on him in that ministry).

trary to the reason of all mankind, as some popish doctors lewdly talk; but of captivating the reasons of Jew and gentile against the Christian faith, by the demonstration of the Spirit and power (1 Cor. ii. 4). Captivat intellectum, dum contradicentem ratione vincit. Ambr.

[3] Ver. 6. Ὅταν πληρωθῇ ὑμῶν ἡ ὑπακοή, When your obedience is fulfilled.] His love to the Corinthians, whom he desired to spare, and the infirm state of their church at present, made him choose to defer the punishment of these offenders, till he had wrought off the affections of the Corinthians from their false apostles, and made them more unanimous in their regards to him: and this is the best excuse that can be made for the neglect of Christian discipline in any church, viz. that* "there is no place for severe remedies, when the disease hath infected the whole church:" the apostle being here forced to yield to this necessity, because the offenders in the church of Corinth being many, they could not easily be punished. Accordingly the primitive church relaxed the severity of its discipline, when great multitudes were concerned, or such as were like to draw great multitudes after them.

[4] Ver. 8. Περὶ τῆς ἐξουσίας ἡμῶν, Of our authority.] The apostle seems to refer to the authority peculiar to the apostles, of inflicting corporal punishments on refractory persons, and delivering them up to Satan (see note on 1 Cor. iv. 21, v. 5): which power none of these false teachers could pretend to (1 Cor. iv. 19, 20). And this, saith he, the Lord hath given me for edification, and not for destruction, it being designed for revenging men's disobedience (ver. 6), for the saving of the spirit (1 Cor. v. 5), and to teach men, by what they suffer, "not to blaspheme" the truth (1 Tim. i. 20).

[5] Ver. 10. Ἐπιστολαὶ, Letters.] It cannot be hence concluded, that Paul writ more than one epistle to them; for nothing is more common than this enallage of number. So Polycarp, writing to the Philippians, saith, that Paul, being absent, ἔγραψεν ὑμῖν ἐπιστολὰς, "writ epistles to you" (see Cotelerius there).

[6] Παρουσία τοῦ σώματος ἀσθενὴς, His bodily presence is mean,] Seems plainly to refer to that which Chrysostom,* Nicephorus, and Lucian, relate of Paul, that "his stature was low, his body crooked, and his head bald," and so he was literally κατὰ πρόσωπον ταπεινὸς, "low in person" (ver. 1). When it is added, that his speech was contemptible, this cannot be understood as if it were so for want of eloquence, or the floridness of the Greek, for that was as much wanting in his letters as his speech or sermons; it therefore seemeth to refer to some infirmity of his speech in teaching (see note on 2 Cor. xii. 7).

Οὐ συνιοῦσιν.] See this reading vindicated, Examen Millii in locum.

[7] Ver. 13, &c.] In these four verses the apostle seems to advance himself above the false apostles in these things: (1.) that whereas they could show no commission to preach to the Corinthians, no measure by which God had distributed the Corinthians to them as their province, he could do so, ver. 13. (2.) That whereas they went out of their line, leaping from one church to another, he went on orderly in conversion of churches to the faith, from Judea through all the interjacent provinces till he came to Corinth. (3.) Whereas they only came to and perverted those churches where the faith had been already preached, and so could only boast of things made ready to their hands (ver. 16), he had still "striven to preach the gospel where Christ was not named, lest he should build upon another man's foundation" (Rom. xv. 20).

CHAPTER XI.

1 Would to God ye could bear with me a little in (this) [1] my (seeming) folly (in boasting of my own performances): and indeed bear with me.

2 For (I therefore do it, because) I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, (and desire) that I may present you as [2] a chaste virgin to Christ (your husband).

3 But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled [3] Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should (by the subtlety of deceitful workers) be corrupted from the simplicity (of the faith) that is in Christ (by mixing the observation of the law with the gospel, as these Judaizers did, and so returning as it were to your former husband. See note on Rom. vii. 3).

4 (I say, I am jealous of you, lest you be corrupted by these false apostles;) For if he that cometh (after me) preacheth another Jesus (i. e. hath another Saviour to propound to you), whom we have not preached, or if ye receive (from him) another spirit, (affording such spiritual gifts) which ye have not received (from us), or another gospel, which ye have not accepted (or received already), ye might well bear with him (in his pretensions to exceed us; but this cannot be said;)

5 For I suppose (in these things) I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles, (Peter, James, and John, from whom these false teachers from Judea may pretend to come, 1 Cor. i. 12.)

6 But though I be [4] rude in speech, yet (am I) not (so) in knowledge (of Christ and his gospel); but we have been throughly made manifest among you in all things (of this nature, xii. 11, 12).

7 Have I committed an offence in abasing myself (so far as to labour with mine own hands) [5] that ye might be exalted (by the spiritual riches and advantages of the gospel, and in having an apostle more regardful of you than of other churches), because (being chargeable to some of them) I have preached to you the gospel of God freely?

8 [6] I robbed (i. e. made naked) other churches, taking wages (or a stipend) of them, to do you service.

9 And when I was present with you, and wanted, [7] I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from (Philippi, Phil. iv. 15, 16, in) Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself.

10 As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia.

11 (And) Wherefore (do I thus resolve? Is it) because I love you not? God knoweth (the contrary).

12 But what I do (of this kind), that I will (still) do, that I may cut off occasion (of boasting) from them which desire occasion; [8] that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we.

13 For such are (your) false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ (seeming to do as we do, or desiring to be thought equal to us in all things).

14 And no marvel; for Satan himself is (sometimes) transformed into an angel of light (pretending to do their work, and be a ministering spirit to them whom he intendeth to destroy).

15 Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness;

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XI.

[1] Ver. 1. Τῆς ἀφροσύνης μου, My folly.] Though the necessity which lay on the apostle thus to commend himself, for vindication of his apostleship, made him free from folly in this matter; yet, because self-commendation usually proceeds from vanity and folly, and they who know not the necessity which lay upon him so to speak, would be apt to impute this to him, he useth this word here, though saying, ver. 16, "Let no man think me a fool in this my boasting," and, xii. 6, "Though I did glory, I should not be a fool."

[2] Ver. 2. Παρθένον ἁγνὴν, A chaste virgin.] Here is thought to be an allusion to the ἁρμόσυνοι of the Lacedemonians, who formed the lives and manners of the virgins, and made them regular, and so prepared them for their husbands. But the Greek commentators agree with our translation, rendering the word ἡρμοσάμην by ἐμνηστευσάμην, "I have espoused you." So Phavorinus* doth interpret these very words; and so the word is used frequently by Herodotus,† and it bears the same sense in the Septuagint, παρὰ Κυρίου ἁρμόζεται γυνὴ ἀνδρὶ, "The wife is espoused to the husband of the Lord" (Prov. xix. 14). As therefore the Jews say, that "Moses espoused Israel to God in mount Sinai,"‡ when he made them enter into covenant with them; so saith the apostle here, By converting you to the Christian faith, "I have espoused you to one husband, even Christ."

[3] Ver. 3. Εὔαν, Eve.] He mentions Eve, not Adam, because she was only personally deceived by the serpent, and was "first in the transgression" (1 Tim. ii. 14). And he calls this deceit, φθόρα, in allusion to the metaphor of virginity.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ, Rude in speech.] This cannot refer to his want of eloquence, or rhetorical artifice in his compositions; for this seems equally wanting in the epistles of Peter and James; it therefore must refer to some imperfection in his speech, which they had not.

[5] Ver. 7. Ἵνα ὑμεῖς ὑψωθῆτε, That you might be exalted.] So James useth the word, saying, "Let the brother of low degree rejoice ἐν τῷ ὕψει αὐτοῦ, in his exaltation" to the riches and privileges of the Christian faith, i. 9. So the song of the virgin mother saith, that God, by sending the Messiah, ὕψωσε ταπεινοὺς, "hath exalted them that were low," Luke i. 52; and Capernaum is said to be ὑψωθεῖσα, "exalted to heaven" by our Saviour's frequent preaching to them, Luke x. 15.

[6] Ver. 8. Ἐσύλησα, I robbed.] Συλᾶν, γυμνοῦν, the word signifies "to make naked," saith Phavorinus; "to spoil," say others: for the churches of Macedonia, from whom he received his gifts, being poorer than that of Corinth (2 Cor. viii. 2), might comparatively seem by this to be spoiled of what was necessary for them.

[7] Ver. 9. Οὐ κατενάρκησα οὐδενὸς, I stunned nobody with complaints.] I importuned none of them to supply my wants.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἵνα ἐν ᾧ καυχῶνται, That in what they glory.] This most interpreters thus gloss? That whereas the false apostles glory in preaching the gospel freely, they may be found even in that to do only what we have still done among you. And true it is, that the Jewish writers tell us, that their wise men of old would not be nourished so from the church, but rather chose to get their living by their own labour; and therefore used to say, "It is better to skin dead beasts, than to say to the people, I am a wise man, or a priest, therefore nourish me;" and that the most excellent and perfect of them clave wood, and carried timber, and drew water, and wrought in iron and coals, and neither asked nor would receive any thing of the church. And, therefore, to make himself equal with the best of these wise men of the Jews, whose end shall be according (not to their specious and hypocritical pretences, but) to their works (Phil. iii. 18).

16 I say again, Let no man think me a fool (in boasting thus of myself); if otherwise, yet as a fool receive (i. e. suffer) me, that I may boast myself a little.

17 That which I speak (thus), I speak it not after the Lord (as commanded by him so to speak), but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting (though the false apostles have made it necessary, and so a part of Christian wisdom so to do, xii. 11, to vindicate my apostleship, and to confirm you in the truth).

18 Seeing that many glory after the flesh (as being the seed of Abraham according to the flesh), I will glory (as to that) also.

19 (Nor can my seeming folly offend you, if you be indeed what you pretend,) For ye (will) suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise (in your own conceits; or, being wise, you must suffer fools gladly.

20 And sure I am, you can bear with greater matters;) For ye suffer, if a man bring you into bondage (to the Jewish rites, Gal. iv. 9, v. 1), if a man devour you (as did the pharisees widows' houses, living deliciously upon your substance), if a man take of you [9] (if he take away what is yours), [10] if a man exalt himself (above you), if a man smite you on the face (or use you contumeliously.

21 That which I said of smiting you upon the face,) I speak as concerning (the) reproach (they cast upon you as profane, uncircumcised, whereas they are all a holy nation), [11] as though we had been weak (i. e. inferior to them in these things, not able to ascribe to ourselves these advantages as well as they). Howbeit whereinsoever any is bold (in this kind), (I speak foolishly,) I am bold also.

22 (For,) [12] Are they Hebrews (speaking the Jewish language? Phil. iii. 5) so am I. Are they Israelites (descended from beloved Jacob, Mal. i. 2, not from

Paul might refuse maintenance from the churches of Achaia (see Campegius Vitringa de Synag. Vet. lib. iii. par. i. cap. 18, p. 884, 885). But this exposition is liable to this great objection, That the apostle, speaking to the Corinthians of the same persons, saith, "Ye suffer if a man devour you, if a man take of you," ver. 20, and 1 Cor. ix. 12, "If others are partakers of this power, are not we much more?" and elsewhere, where he represents these Jewish teachers as "counting gain godliness," and doing all things for "filthy lucre," Phil. iii. 19, 1 Tim. vi. 5, 2 Tim. iii. 2, Tit. i. 11. Others therefore interpret the words thus: This I will do, that I may cut off occasion of glory from them who seek occasion, that they might be found even as us: in which thing they would glory; but now they cannot do it, because they are known to receive of you.

[9] Ver. 20. Εἴ τις λαμβάνει.] Supply ἀφ' ὑμῶν, "If a man take away what is yours;" for this word is used, saith Phavorinus, when we take that which the owner is not willing to part with. So the word signifies, in Christ's exhortation to the church of Philadelphia, to retain what she had, ἵνα μηδεὶς λάβῃ τὸν στέφανόν σου, "that none may take away thy crown" (Rev. iii. 11); and when it was given to the angel, λαβεῖν τὴν εἰρήνην ἀπὸ γῆς, "to take away peace from the earth:" so P. Gregory* interprets these words, Si quis rapit, accipere enim aliquandò dicimus auferre: so the Hebrew word לקח is rendered by the Septuagint, ἀπολαμβάνω, ἀποφέρω, αἴρω, ἀφαιρέω. Others render the words thus: "If a man makes a gain of you:" so Budæus saith, λαμβάνειν is κερδαίνειν, "to gain:" so 2 Cor. xii. 16, δόλῳ ὑμᾶς ἔλαβον; "Did I take you by guile?" is interpreted by ἐπλεονέκτησα ὑμᾶς; "Did I make a gain of you?" ver. 17, 18. And for this sense our Gataker pleads in his Adversaria, giving many instances where not only λῆμμα and λήψις, nouns derived from λαμβάνειν, but also where τὸ λαβεῖν bears this sense (Adversar. cap. 27, p. 293).

[10] Εἴ τις ἐπαίρεται, If a man exalt himself.] The Jews had a very high opinion of themselves, as being the seed of Abraham, and so of noble birth (see note on 1 Cor. i. 26); the people of God, and so holy and beloved of him; his "firstborn and only-begotten, for whom the world was made," 2 Esd. vi. 59, 60. Hence in their prayers to God they say, Populus tuus sumus fœderati tui, progenies Abrahami, amici tui, cui sacramento fidem tuam obstrinxisti in monte Moriæ, semen Isaaci dilecti tui, qui ligatus fuit super altari tuo, cœtus Jacobi filii tui, primogeniti tui, &c. And they had as mean and despicable thoughts of all other men, whom therefore they insulted over, calling them "the people of the earth, the profane:"† yea, likening them to "dogs" (see note on Phil. iii. 2) and "spittle" (2 Esd. vi. 56, 57): and from this opinion, that "the world was made for them" (see note on 1 Cor. iii. 22), they might easily conclude that it was lawful for them to take it away from others, as being usurpers of it. Hence Buxtorf‡ cites this passage from the Talmud, that "all the possessions of the gentiles are as common; he that first seizes on them is lord of them."

[11] Ver. 21. Ὡς ὅτι ἡμεῖς ἠσθενήσαμεν, As if we were weak.] To be weak, in this epistle, ch. xiii., is to be unable to exercise the apostolical rod, or the power that Christ had given them to inflict censures and diseases on the refractory, ver. 3, 4. 9. Τολμᾶν, "to be bold," is to exercise these censures on the disobedient, x. 2, where the apostle argues for this boldness, ver. 7, as here, "Are they Christ's ministers? so are we;" and adds, as here, ver. 8, that he could "glory of the power Christ had given him for edification, and not for destruction." So that the import of these words seems to be this; You suffer patiently from these false prophets, as if their power over you was to be dreaded (though indeed there was nothing in it besides big words, 1 Cor. iv. 19, see note on v. 3), but we to be despised as weak, and having no power you need to dread; whereas we shall be as bold as they, if you do not reform, as being much more the ministers of Christ, and having suffered more, to show our fidelity to him, and therefore having greater reason to expect his powerful assistance than they have.

[12] Ver. 22. Ἑβραῖοί εἰσι; Ἰσραηλῖταί εἰσι; Are they Hebrews? Are they Israelites?] Here is a certain indication that these false apostles and deceitful workers were not originally Samaritans, as Simon Magus, Dositheus, and their followers were, but of the Jewish extract. Secondly, That they were Jews converted to, and still owning and preaching up, the faith of Christ, as is evident from the words following; "Are they ministers of Christ? so am I:" as also from x. 7. It therefore seems that they must be of the sect of Cerinthus,* that great stickler against St. Paul for the necessity of circumcising the gentiles, and for their observation of the law of Moses; or the Nazarenes, or Ebionites: for these are not the names of persons who were the authors of any sects; but of the Jews,† which believed in Jesus, and yet were zealous observers of the law of Moses. Now these Jews, before they believed, were of two sorts; such as admitted other nations to live quietly among them, and even to embrace their religion without circumcision; and such as by no means would permit them so to do. Thus when Izates, the son of Helen queen of Adiabene, embraced the Jewish religion, Ananias‡ declared he might do it without circumcision; but Eleazar§ maintained that it was ἀσέβεια, great impiety to remain uncircumcised. And when two eminent persons of Trachonitis fled to Josephus, the zealots* among the Jews were urgent for their circumcision, if they would abide with them; but Josephus persuaded the multitude against it. And this controversy continued after they embraced Christianity, some allowing them to embrace Christianity without submitting to circumcision and the Jewish law; others contending, that without circumcision and the observance of the law they could not be saved. And these were the false apostles which troubled the churches of Corinth, Galatia, Philippi, and were great enemies to Paul, who taught the contrary. So Epiphanius informs us of the Cerinthians,† adding also of the Nazarenes, that they in all things accord with the doctrines of the Cerinthians. And certain it is, that such persons went from Judea, and gave great disturbance to all Christian churches, especially to those which had been planted by St. Paul; for, in the First Epistle to Timothy, and that to Titus, we have mention of those of the circumcision, who were vain talkers and deceivers, Tit. i. 10, 11, 1 Tim. i. 4. 6, vi. 4, 5 (see Gal. iv. 9, 10, vi. 12, 13, Phil. iii. 2, Col. ii. 26, 27).

[13] Ver. 23.] Note here, that the apostle proves the truth of his ministry and apostleship not, as elsewhere, from the miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost which accompanied his preaching, but from his sufferings, as being the things these false apostles could not pretend to (Gal. v. 11, vi. 12), and so could not glory that they were like unto him in them (ver. 13).

[14] Ver. 24. Παρὰ μίαν, Save one.] The law assigned forty stripes to them that were worthy to be beaten, but forbade them to exceed that number, Deut. xxv. 3. But it being their custom to beat them with a whip that had three cords, and so every stroke with it going for three, they could only give them thirty-nine or forty-two, which would have exceeded the number appointed by the law; and therefore Josephus says,* "He that did contrary to the law received, by a public whip, forty stripes save one."

[15] Ver. 25. Ἐν τῷ βυθῷ, In the deep.] This cannot be well understood of the prison at Cyzicum; for we never read that Paul preached there; nor of the shipwreck mentioned Acts xxvii., for that happened after the writing of this epistle; but probably of some of the other shipwrecks mentioned here, in which he might be so long tossed to and fro in the sea, upon some broken piece of a ship, before he got to land, as Josephus† saith he was. Theodoret saith he was put into a prison so called at Lystra; but of this we read nothing in the Acts of the Apostles, ch. xiv., where Luke gives an account of his treatment there.

[16] Ver. 33. Ἐξέφυγον.] Of such a flight as only is designed to preserve us still in a capacity of preaching the gospel, especially where our charge is not any settled church, but the church in general, or as Paul's was, the whole gentile world, Austin‡ speaks well thus, Quicunque isto modo fugit, ut ecclesiæ necessarium ministerium, eo fugiente, non desit, facit quod Dominus præcepit, sive permisit; qui autem sic fugit, ut gregi Christi ea, quibus spiritualiter vivit, alimenta subtrahantur: mercenarius ille est, qui vidit lupum venientem et fugit, quoniam non est ei cura de ovibus.

Καυχᾶσθαι δὴ οὐ συμφέρει μοι.] All the Greek scholiasts own our reading of these words, which may from the Greek be rendered, "Surely it profiteth (or it advantageth) not me to glory, for I shall come to visions;" and then the sense may be supplied thus; But it may be so to you, for I shall come to visions and revelations of the Lord, in knew) such an one caught up to the third heaven (the habitation of the blessed angels, and of the majesty of God).

3 And (again) I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;)

4 How that he was (at another time) [2] caught up into paradise, and (there) heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful (or possible) for a man to utter.

5 Of such an one (thus rapt out of himself) will I glory: yet (or, but) of myself (as I appear to you in my own person) I will not glory (willingly), but in mine infirmities.

6 (Not that I really esteem it a folly so to do, though in compliance with you I do styl. it foolishness, 2 Cor. xi. 1. 16, 17, xii. 11;) For though I would desire to glory (of these things), I shall not be a fool; for I will (shall only) say the truth: but now I forbear (even to speak of that), lest any man should think of me above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of me (above what my constant words and actions testify of me).

7 And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations (vouchsafed to me), there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, [3] the messenger of Satan to buffet me (or, that a mes- which I shall give such an evidence of the favour of Christ to me, such a testimony of my mission from heaven, as none of these false apostles or deceitful workers can pretend to.

Καυχᾶσθαι δε οὐ συμφέρει μοι, It becomes not me to glory.] Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, all agree in this reading, making no mention of the other, τί καυχᾶσθαι δεῖ; which therefore is to be rejected.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἁρπαγέντα.] Here (1.) it is inquired, Whether Paul was either, as to soul only, or as to soul and body jointly, rapt into heaven, or paradise, as the Spirit ἥρπασε, "caught up Philip," Acts viii. 39, or whether he had only a vision of these things on earth, as the Spirit took up Ezekiel in a vision, Ezek. xi. 24, and as John was "carried away into the wilderness?" I incline to the opinion that this was a real rapture, as being most agreeable (1.) to the words ἁρπάγη ἕως, "He was snatched up as far as to the third heaven," and ἁρπάγη εἰς παράδεισον, "He was snatched up into paradise;" for these words do not well agree to a vision, or to an ecstasy. As for the seeming raptures of Ezekiel and John, the text plainly informs us that they were not real, by saying, "The Spirit took me up, and brought me in a vision by the Spirit of God into Chaldea," Ezek. xi. 24. And again, "The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley that was full of bones," xxxvii. 1. And of John, "He carried me away in the Spirit into the wilderness," Rev. xvii. 3; and xxi. 10, "He carried me in the Spirit to a great and high mountain." In these two instances all is expressly said to be done ἐν Πνεύματι, "in the Spirit;" but nothing of this nature is intimated in Paul's rapture. If you say he owns that this was done ἐν ὁπτασίᾳ, "in a vision;" I answer, he seems not to say so, but only that in this rapture he had a vision of the Lord. (2.) He says he cannot tell whether he was then in the body, or out of the body; whereas, in all imaginary visions, the soul continues in the body. (3.) He adds, that he "heard there unspeakable words;" which intimates that he was really in paradise.

Quest. 2. A second inquiry is, Whether Paul here speaks of one vision or rapture only, or of more? I answer, The opinion of all the ancients seems to have been this, that he was rapt at several times into several places, and, consequently, that he speaks of more raptures than one. Irenæus* saith, that "he was caught up into the third heaven, and again was carried into paradise." So also say Tertullian and Pseud-Ambrosius.† Epiphanius‡ speaks thus: "Who can hear the opinion of Origen, which placed paradise in the third heaven?" And this appears highly probable, (1.) from these words, "I will proceed to visions and revelations of the Lord;" which intimates that he would speak of more than one: and from ver. 7, "Lest he should be exalted ὑπερβολῇ τῶν ἀποκαλύψεων with this multitude of revelations." (2.) Methodius of old did well infer this from the repetition of those words, "Whether in the body," &c. for such a repetition must have been needless concerning one and the same vision. "For hence," saith he,* "he intimates that he had seen two great visions, being twice assumed, first into the third heaven, and then into paradise." Hence therefore it doth not follow that paradise is in the third heaven, as later writers have thence gathered against the opinion of all the ancient Christians: and therefore Epiphanius† answers to this text produced by Origen, by saying, "He was rapt up into the third heaven, and after adding into paradise, he shows heaven to be in one place, and paradise in another." Though therefore the third heaven here, according to the language and distinction of the Jews, doth signify the angelic heaven, it doth not follow hence, that paradise, into which the apostle was caught up at another time, and in another vision, must signify the third heaven.

3. Hence we may strongly argue for the distinction of the soul from the body, and its capacity to receive and understand celestial things in separation from the body; for if the soul be not distinguished from the body, nor is capable of any vision or revelation when out of the body, there remains no foundation for the apostle's doubt, whether he had these visions in the body, or out of the body, there being a necessity, upon that supposition, to have them in the body, or not at all.

[3] Ver. 7. Ἄγγελος Σατᾶν.] They who interpret this "messenger of Satan," and "thorn in the flesh," of the motions of concupiscence, and the suggestions of lust arising in Paul, are guilty of a great mistake: for this "thorn in the flesh" was given him of God, who raiseth in us no impure lustings (James i. 13—15), and never cures one sin by another; nor would Paul have wished that all men should have been as he, if he had felt these burnings, nor would he have refused that remedy against them he prescribed to others, 1 Cor. vii. 7. 9, nor could he have "gloried," much less "took pleasure," in these infirmities, as here, ver. 9, 10, he doth in this "thorn in the flesh." In a word, by confessing such impure motions lodged in his breast, he would not have defended his reputation against his adversaries, but rather have given them fresh occasion to reproach him, and would have rendered his threats against the unclean, xii. 21, less prevalent. Let it be then observed,

1. That this "thorn in the flesh" was surely some infirmity in the flesh or body of Paul. So doth Paul himself inform us, by saying, τὸν πειρασμόν μου τὸν ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου, οὐκ ἐξουδενήσατε, οὐδὲ ἐξεπτύσατε, "You did not count me as nothing, nor spit upon me, because of my temptation, which was in my flesh," Gal. iv. 14, "but received me (notwithstanding) as an angel or messenger of God." Whence two things are observable: (1.) that this thorn, or this temptation, was in the flesh, or in his body: and (2.) that it was such as rendered him in his preaching obnoxious to great contempt, and made him despicable in the eyes of others.

2. It is highly probable that this infirmity in the flesh happened to him after these visions and revelations of which he here speaks; for he saith it was sent to, or befell him, "that he might not be exalted through the multitude of his revelations;" and therefore must be given him after he had that temptation they afforded to exalt himself.

3. It is certain that it was some infirmity of the flesh which senger of Satan might buffet me), lest I should be exalted above measure.

8 For this thing [4] I besought the Lord (Christ, ver. 9) thrice, that it might depart from me (i. e. that I might be delivered from this thorn in my flesh).

9 And he said unto me, My grace (or favour) is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect (and shown more illustriously) in (this thy) weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may (more conspicuously appear to) rest upon me.

10 Therefore I take pleasure in (these) infirmities (of the flesh), in (the) reproaches (I suffer upon that account), in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am (thus) weak (in myself), then am I strong (in the power of Christ. This latter clause is in all the Greek scholiasts).

11 I am become (as) a fool in glorying (thus; but) ye have compelled me (to it): for I ought (rather) to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing (of myself; but through the grace of God I am what I am, 1 Cor. xv. 10).

12 Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you (by me) in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and (in) mighty deeds (see the note on Heb. ii. 4).

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be (in this) that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong.

14 Behold, the third [5] time I am ready to come to you; and I will (still continue) not (to) be burdensome to you: for I seek not your's, but you: [6] for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

15 And I (like a good spiritual father) will very gladly spend (my spiritual treasures on you) and be spent (myself) for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

16 But be it so, I did not burden you (myself): nevertheless (it may be suggested by some, that) being crafty, I caught you with guile (getting much from you by the means of others).

17 (I ask, therefore,) Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you?

18 I desired Titus (to go to you), and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps?

19 Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you (by specious pretences, when we say that we deferred our coming, that we might spare you and be helpers of your joy? 2 Cor. ii. 23, 24) we speak (as) before God in Christ (calling him again to record that we use no such arts); but we do all things, dearly beloved, (as we did that) for your edifying.

20 (And too much reason had we so to do:) For (yet) I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you (by inflicting necessary censures and punishments upon you) such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults (the usual, and almost necessary consequences of schisms and factions in a church):

21 And lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall (find reason to) bewail many which have sinned already, [7] and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed (after the naturally tended to obstruct the efficacy of his preaching, and rendered his ministry less grateful and acceptable to others, and made him subject to reproach and to contempt in the discharge of this his function. This is extremely evident from the place cited from Gal. iv. 14, where, saith Theodoret, καίτοι πολλὴν ἔφερον ἐπὶ τοῦ σώματος ἀτιμίαν, "Though I brought with me great ignominy in my body, you did not reject me;" and also from Christ's answer to him, That his power was perfected in Paul's weakness, i. e. The greater is thy infirmity in preaching the gospel, the greater is my power in rendering it efficacious when preached by one subject to so great infirmity.

4. It is also certain that this was objected to by the Corinthians and the false apostles, to the disparagement of Paul, and rendered him contemptible in their eyes, that he was ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ, "rude in speech," 2 Cor. x. 10 (which, as I have observed upon that place, cannot refer to his want of eloquence, that being as much wanting in his epistles, which they allowed to be "powerful and weighty," as in his sermons to them); that "in presence he was base among them," ver. 1, that "the presence of his body was weak and mean, καὶ ὁ λόγος ἐξουθενημένος, his speech" such as rendered him "contemptible," where the apostle useth that very word which he had applied to the infirmity of his flesh, Gal. iv. 14.

5. It cannot be denied but that an ἰσχνοφωνία, a stammering in speech, or a squeaking shrillness in the voice, joined with a low deformed stature, does naturally tend to render a man contemptible in his preaching; and therefore Moses declines the message God sent him upon to Pharoah, because he was "slow of speech, and of a stammering tongue," Exod. iv. 10, ἰσχνόφωνος, καὶ βραδύγλωσσος.

6. These words, "a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan," being here put by way of apposition, must signify the same thing; and so he must be buffeted by Satan, when, by these false apostles and ministers of Satan (2 Cor. xi. 15) he was contemned, and made the subject of their scorn, and laughter, for this infirmity in his speech. But it is observable, that these words may be rendered thus: "There was given me a thorn in the flesh, ἄγγελος Σατᾶν ἵνα με κολαφίζῃ, that the angel of Satan might buffet me." Since then he calls the false apostles ministers of Satan, it is not to be wondered that he here styles them, or the chief of them, who thus reviled and contemned him for this infirmity, and therefore laboured to take off the affections of the Corinthians from him, "an angel of Satan buffeting him" (see Œcumenius on the place).

[4] Ver. 8. Παρεκάλεσα, I besought the Lord.] "Here," saith Schlictingius, "is an instance of prayer directed to Christ;" ergo, say I, here is an instance of his divinity: prayer made to Christ by all Christians, in all times and places, and for all things, being an evidence of his omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence.

Note also, that though this "thorn in the flesh" was not removed upon the prayer of the apostle, yet was that granted for which he desired that it might be removed, viz. that he should preach the gospel more effectually, and to the honour of his Lord; and therefore he not only rests satisfied under this infirmity, but even glories in it on this account, that it tended to demonstrate the power of Christ residing in him. Thus doth God truly answer our requests, when he gives not what we would, but what he sees to be more for his glory and our good.

[5] Ver. 14. Τρίτον, The third time.] Most interpreters say that Paul had made two resolutions before to come to them; for proof of which they cite, 1 Cor. xvi. 5, 2 Cor. i. 16, but both the texts seem plainly to refer to one and the same resolution, and the last to be only an apology for nonperformance of the first. His meaning therefore may be this; I have once actually been with you: I was ready once more to come, though your disorders unreformed hindered the performing that intended journey (2 Cor. i. 23), and I am now ready the third time.

[6] For the children ought not to lay up for the fathers, but, &c.] i. e. If fathers of the flesh, they ought to lay up for them temporals; if spiritual fathers, as Paul was (1 Cor. iv. 15), to provide spirituals for them, good instructions, and advice for the welfare of their souls.

[7] Ver. 21. Μετανοησάντων.] Hence it is evident, against example and by the instigation of their false teachers, who themselves practise the hidden things of shame, 2 Cor. iv. 2, and whose exhortation is of uncleanness, 1 Thess. ii. 3).

Novatian, that the Christian dispensation admits sinners to repentance, though they have, after baptism, committed great offences, and lapsed into the sins of the flesh, mentioned Gal. v. 19—21.

CHAPTER XIII.

1 [1] This is the third time I am coming to you. [2] In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established.

2 I told you before (in my First Epistle, iv. 19—21, being then absent in body, but present in spirit, v. 3), and (I still continue in my resolution) foretell (-ing) you, as if I were present, the second time (or, I foretell you as present in spirit the second time); and being absent (in body) now I write to them which heretofore have sinned (and have not repented, xii. 21), and to all other (who shall fall into the like sins), that, if I come again (which I now am fully resolved upon), I will not spare (you):

3 Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in (and by) me, (even that Christ) which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty [3] in (and among) you (you shall find it in the exerting the power he hath given us to chastise such offenders).

4 For though he was crucified through (the) weakness (of that human nature which he took upon him, and in that appeared to others as weak), yet he liveth (and discovers efficaciously that he doth so) by the power of God (so gloriously attending the invocation of his name, and faith in him). [4] For we also (Gr. and so we also) are (as yet, in your apprehensions,) weak in him, but we shall (appear to) live with him by the power of God (exerting itself by us) toward you.

5 (And for the farther evidence that Christ preached by me hath not been weak, but mighty towards you,) Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not (of) your own selves (by the miracles done among you, and the variety of gifts conferred upon you), how that Jesus [5] Christ is in (among) you, [6] except ye be reprobates (i. e. disapproved by God, and so he hath withdrawn these gifts from you)?

6 But (however it may be with you) I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates (i. e. not disapproved of, but owned by God and Christ).

7 Now I pray to God that ye do no evil (which may force us to exercise and show our power among you, as desiring) not that we should appear approved (by our power in punishing your offences), but (rather) that ye should do that which is honest, though we be (in show) [7] as reprobates (i. e. as destitute of the power of Christ in your eyes).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

[1] Ver. 1. Τρίτον τοῦτο, This is the third time.] Of his coming the third time, see note on xii. 14. These witnesses, saith Dr. Lightfoot, were Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, sent to assure them of his coming: say others, his own reiterated testimony to them by letters, that if these admonitions did not prevail on them who had sinned to reform, he would not spare them.

[2] In the mouth of two or three witnesses.] Though these words seem to be cited from Deut. xix. 15, rather than from Matt. xviii. 16, it being rare to find this apostle citing any thing from the New Testament without calling it "an ordinance of the Lord;" yet it is probable that the apostle here alludes to the practice there prescribed for the reclaiming of offenders; and then his First Epistle being written with this introduction, "Paul an apostle, and Sosthenes;" his second thus, "Paul, and Timotheus," may pass for two or three witnesses; and his presence the third time in person, to exercise his censures on these offenders before the body of the church, may bear a fair resemblance to the prescription relating to the church.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἐν ὑμῖν, Among you.] Christ showed his power among them, by enabling Paul to preach the gospel to them, in "demonstration of the Spirit and power," so efficaciously, as to convert them to the faith, 1 Cor ii. 4; in that variety of gifts conferred on them, together with the gospel, by which their "testimony of Christ was confirmed," 1 Cor. i. 6; by his power, conspicuous in seconding St. Paul's delivery of the incestuous person up to Satan, 1 Cor. v. 4, 5; by the chastisements they suffered for communicating in the Lord's supper unworthily.

[4] Ver. 4. Καὶ γὰρ καί, And so we also.] These particles signify atque ita, even so and so, and in like manner; and accordingly are rendered by Pasor, sic et nos, as in this paraphrase. Again, it is evident from scripture, that though Christ appeared to the world weak, and unable to escape his sufferings, by permitting himself to be taken, and carried bound before the high-priest and Pilate, and at last to be lifted up upon the cross, and there die, yet was he only in appearance then weak; for he permitted not himself to be taken till he had with a word struck them to the ground who came to apprehend him (John xviii. 6), and had declared that he was able to deliver himself out of their hands (Matt. xxvi. 53). Even so, saith the apostle, we seem weak to you Corinthians, because we do not exercise that power among you which God hath given us, 2 Cor. x. 10, xi. 21, and here, ver. 9, but we shall show ourselves to live by the power of God exercised upon the offenders in your church.

[5] Ver. 5. Ὅτι Χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν ἐστιν, That Christ is in you.] i. e. With, or among, you: so σὺ ἐν ἡμῖν εἶ Κύριε, "Thou, Lord, art with us," Jer. xiv. 9, οὐχὶ Κύριος ἐν ἡμῖν; "Is not the Lord among us?" see Gen. xxiii. 6, Ps. cxxiv. 1. The words seem to allude to those spoken by the tempting, contumacious Israelites, who, after all the signs and wonders God had shown to them, remained still doubtful of his presence with them, inquiring, εἰ Κύριος ἐν ἡμῖν; "Is the Lord among us, or not?" Exod. xvii. 7. So saith the apostle; Seeing, after all the miracles done among you, and the miraculous gifts received by you, you still seek a proof of Christ speaking in or by me, ask your own selves: know ye not by the gifts exercised among you, except ye be rejected of God, that his Spirit, conveyed by my ministry, is still among you? But then let it be noted here, that this place speaks not of their being in Christ, but of Christ's being in them; not of his being in them, by their faith in him, but his miraculous presence with them; not of his being in any private person, but in the church of Corinth in general.

[6] Εἰ μήτι ἀδόκιμοί ἐστε, If ye be not reprobates.] i. e. Christians in name only, and "not in deeds," so Grotius; "stupid and hardened," Dr. Hammond; "wicked and unfit for the faith," Vorstius; "unworthy of the name of Christians," Dickson; "deprived of faith, light, grace, and knowledge," Menochius; "Unless you by your crimes have cast off Christ," Calvin.

[7] Ver. 7. Ὡς ἀδόκιμοι, As reprobates.] It is to be observed, that the word ἀδόκιμος, which we render reprobate, hath no relation in scripture to any decree of God, either absolutely excluding men from a capacity of salvation, or doing it conditionally, on the account of the sin of Adam; but only doth denote such men as have made themselves unworthy, by the corruption of their faith or manners, to be approved and owned by God. Thus they who, "when they knew God, did not glorify him as God, neither were thankful, but changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped the creature more than the Creator, and liked not to retain God in their hearts" (Rom. i. 21—28), are the men "given up" by God, εἰς νοῦν ἀδόκιμον, "to a reprobate mind;" which prompted them to to those things God could not approve of, but abhor: and they who resisted the truth through the corruption of their minds, are styled ἀδόκιμοι περὶ τὴν πίστιν, i. e. "reprobates concerning the faith," 2 Tim. iii. 8, i. e. men whose faith cannot be owned or approved of. They also are in scripture, as to their manners, styled "reprobates," whose "mind and conscience is defiled;" so that though "in word they profess to know God, yet in works they deny him, being abominable, disobedient, and to every good work, ἀδόκιμοι, reprobate;" i. e. void, not of judgment only to discern, but of affection to approve of it. Thus, that earth is styled ἀδόκιμος, "reprobate," or rejected, which, after all the showers which fall upon it, "brings forth only thorns and briers," Heb. vi. 8, and that silver, ἀργύριον ἀδόκιμον, "reprobate silver," which, being false stamped, or coined, will not be received, but rejected (Prov. xxv. 4, Isa. i. 22): and in this sense Paul saith, he kept under his body, "lest whilst he preached to others, he himself should be, ἀδόκιμος, disowned" and rejected by God (1 Cor. ix. 27).

And though ἀδόκιμοι here seems to signify one that cannot give a proof of his power, as when it relates to the apostle, ver. 6, 7, yet seeing the apostle, pretending that the Lord had given him this power, must be ἀδόκιμος, one fit to be rejected as a false pretender if he had it not; and though, when it relates to the Corinthians, ver. 5, it signifies persons who could not give a proof that they belonged to Christ, or had his presence with them; yet, seeing the want of this proof showed they were to be rejected as persons not approved by Christ, this differs not much from the sense assigned of that word.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἐν ἁγίῳ φιλήματι, With a holy kiss.] As brethren: for this seems to be the Jews' osculum propinquitatis, of which see Buxtorf's Lexicon, p. 1404, 1405.

[9] Ver. 14.] Note, that here plainly, as in the form of baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19, we have the names of the sacred Trinity; and the Father and Son in both places being mentioned as distinct persons, we have no reason to doubt of the personality of the Holy Ghost thus mentioned with them.

APPENDIX

TO CHAP. VI.

Monsieur Le Clerc hath observed in his Ars Critica, par. i. cap. 8, p. 110, that "since the time of St. Austin scarce any word hath been used more frequently in speaking concerning the conversion of a sinner, than is that of grace; and yet if you ask them what use it what they mean by it, they can give you no clear answer: so that a Jesuit said, not unpleasantly, That it was nothing but a nescio quid, and that the grace of God in scripture doth always signify, not any secret afflatus, but his mercy and his kindness to us." Now that I may not seem, with his witty Jesuit, to ridicule, or with the Pelagians to deny, that grace, because my note on this chapter partly accordeth with his critics, I shall here briefly show two things:

1. That it seems necessary to assert, that God vouchsafes to men not only the outward dispensations of his word to be the ordinary means of their conversion and sanctification, but also some assistances and operations of the Holy Spirit.

2. I shall endeavour to show that these assistances may be so explained as to be no more unintelligible than are all the influences of God upon the soul, or the temptations of the evil spirit.

First, That it is necessary to assert, that God vouchsafes to men some inward operations or assistances of his Holy Spirit, to incline them to what is good, convert and sanctify them. For,

1. Why else is it expressly said that "God works in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 13), and "doth within us what is acceptable in his sight?" (Heb. xiii. 21:) for sure he cannot properly be said ἐνεργεῖν, καὶ ποιεῖν ἐν ἡμῖν, "to act and work within us," who does and worketh nothing in us. Yea, how doth the word of God itself, when heard or read, work on us, but by making impressions on our minds? And shall that be denied to God himself which we allow to his word? Or shall he not be believed when he saith he doth "work in us both to will and to do?" he "doth in us what is acceptable in his sight?"

Again; Does it not seem unreasonable to deny that influence to God and the good Spirit, to excite men to goodness, which generally is and must, according to the scripture, be allowed to the evil spirit tempting men to wickedness? Now though this evil spirit cannot lay us under a necessity of doing wickedly, yet he is frequently in scripture represented as a tempter to sin; which he can only be mediately, by raising some ideas in our brain which do excite, dispose, and move us, as our own thoughts or inward sentiments at other times were wont to do, to what is evil. He also is in scripture styled that spirit which ἐνεργεῖ, "works inwardly in the children of disobedience," Eph. ii. 2, and "leads them captive εἰς τὸ ἐκείνου θέλημα, to do his will," 2 Tim. ii. 26, which words seem plainly to import some inward energy of Satan to excite them to this disobedience to the will of God, and this compliance with his own will: since then "stronger is he that is in us than he that is in the world" (1 John iv. 4), i. e. that good Spirit which dwells in pious men is more powerful in them than Satan is in wicked men, we must allow this good Spirit ἐνεργεῖν, "to work" in the children of obedience, as Satan is allowed to work in his own children.

Moreover, the evil spirit is represented as "a lying spirit" in the mouth of Ahab's prophets, 1 Kings xxi. 21, he "moved David to number the people," 1 Chron. xxi. 1, he "entered into" Judas, Luke xxii. 3, he "filled the heart" of Ananias "to lie to the Holy Ghost," Acts v. 3. All which expressions can never be accounted for without allowing him some power to work upon the spirits of these persons, so as to raise within them some such ideas as would excite and stir them up to the performance of those actions: nor can we otherwise give any rational account of the snares, methods, wiles, and devices of Satan, mentioned 2 Cor. ii. 11, Eph. vi. 11, or tell how he comes and "takes away the word out of the heart," Luke viii. 12, or how he "takes advantage over us" when we are overwhelmed with grief, 2 Cor. ii. 10.

When, therefore, on the other hand, God is said to "put his fear and his law in our hearts," Jer. xxxii. 40, Heb. viii.

10, and "his Spirit within us," Ezek. xxxvi. 27, to "create in us a clean heart, and renew in us a right spirit," ibid., to "give us a new heart," Ezek. xi. 19, "to circumcise" and to "convert the heart," Deut. xxx. 6, Jer. xxxi. 18, if he by his good Spirit raiseth no good motions or ideas in us, which may dispose us to his fear, and by attention to them may convert and cleanse our heart; if he vouchsafes unto us no inward illuminations, by attending to which we may discern "the wondrous things of this law," what can these words or metaphors import? or why is his Spirit put within us if he hath nothing to do there? Yea, why are we said to be "strengthened with might through the Spirit in the inward man" to do his will? Eph. iii. 16; to be enabled, "through the Spirit, to mortify the deeds of the flesh?" Rom. viii. 13. Why is the Spirit said to "help our infirmities," ver. 26, to "purify our hearts," 1 Pet. i. 22, to be unto us a "Spirit of sanctification," 1 Cor. vi. 11, "the Comforter," the "Spirit of power, love, and of a sound mind?" 2 Tim. i. 7. For how is it possible he should be all or any of these things to us, or should do all or any of those things for us, by doing nothing in us? And seeing consolation ariseth only from the inward testimony of the conscience; seeing sanctification consists in the renewing of the inward man, and hath the soul for its subject; seeing the heart is purified by an inward change and temper, which renders it averse from sin, and sets the affections, desires, and inclinations of the soul against it; seeing the deeds of the flesh are only mortified by such a renovation of the mind as makes us to discern the pernicious effects and dreadful consequences of living still according to our fleshly appetites, and so begetteth a dread and hatred of them, a resolution to forsake them, a vehement desire to be freed from them, a sincere endeavour to resist the motions of the flesh, and a care that we do not for the future yield obedience to it in the lustings of it, if there be no renovation wrought in us by the Spirit, no testimony of him "with our spirits, that we are the sons of God," how can a man conceive that all this should be done by the Spirit without any energy in the mind and the affections of a man, and by that, consequently, on the will?

Moreover, if the Holy Spirit hath no hand in producing and carrying on the new life, why is he styled Πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, "a quickening," or "life-giving, Spirit?" Seeing all vital operations issue from a spirit acting in us, why are we said to "live in the Spirit," Gal. v. 16, and to "walk in the Spirit," Rom. viii. 14, and ἄγεσθαι, "to be led," or conducted "by the Spirit" of God? For as in natural and moral actions we cannot be said to live or walk without an inward principle of life and motion, or to be led or guided in those actions but by the light of reason; so neither can we properly be said to live and walk in the Spirit, or to be guided by him, if he imparts no inward light to guide us in the ways of piety, no inward motions to excite us to walk in them, no inward strength or vital efficacy for the performance of them. And were it otherwise, why are all those inward habits and dispositions which adorn the soul, and make it "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light," styled "the fruits," not of the preaching of the word, or of our own consideration, but "of the Holy Spirit?" For how are they his fruits, if he doth nothing to produce them? Why are they still ascribed, according to his doctrine, never to that which only doth, but to that only which doth not, produce them?

To say these things and those expressions concern only the times in which the extraodinary gifts and operations of the Holy Spirit were vouchsafed, is to make future ages, since the ceasing of these gifts, despair of being quickened, sanctified, or comforted, or even enabled to purify the heart, or to mortify the deeds of the flesh, to live or walk in the Spirit; and consequently to despair of being now the sons of God, united to Christ Jesus, or having any of the fruits of the Spirit wrought within them. And were it only then that no man could be regenerate or born again without water and the Holy Ghost, by what are we now regenerated? why are we now baptized? or why is baptism administered still in the name of the Holy Ghost?

In fine, it seems not possible, according to this hypothesis, to explain how, or to what end, the Holy Spirit is so often said to "dwell," or to "abide" within us; how we are "made a habitation of God through the Spirit;" how we are made "the temples of God through the Holy Ghost which is in us," or united to Christ by the Spirit, or to what end the Holy Ghost thus dwells or takes up his abode in them, in whom he acteth nothing, or rests upon those Christian sufferers whom he doth not inspire with inward courage: and yet this abode of the good Spirit with us, is represented not only as the highest privilege, but as the inestimable advantage of the Christian. By this Christ doth encourage his disciples to demonstrate their love to him by keeping his commandments, that then "the Father will love them, and we," saith he, "will take up our abode with him," John xiv. 23. By this, saith the apostle, God becomes our God, and we his people; he our Father, we his sons and daughters, 2 Cor. vi. 16; and from our union by his Spirit to our head Christ Jesus, such an ἐνέργεια, or "inward working," is said to be diffused through every part of his mystical body, as causeth "the whole body to increase, and edify itself in love," Eph. iv. 16, Col. ii. 19. Now what account can be offered of these things, without allowing some inward operations of the Holy Spirit, as the consequence of this spiritual union, and this inhabitation of the Holy Spirit in us? yea, who can tell what is the advantage of these promises, "I will put my Spirit in you," or "pour him upon you," Prov. i. 23, Jer. xxxvi. 27, xxxvii. 14, Zech. xii. 10, John vii. 37, 38, if we receive no influx from him thus put into our hearts? what, lastly, is it for the Holy Spirit to "depart," or to be "taken" from us? or what can be the dreadful misery and "woe" denounced upon us when he doth so? for if he did nothing in us, whilst he continued to be with us, what can we lose by his departure? or why did David so importunately beg God would not take his Holy Spirit from him? Ps. li. 12.

To say here the Holy Spirit only dwelt in Christians whilst the extraordinary gifts and afflatus of the Holy Spirit were continued to the church, and they lay under persecution from the heathen emperors, is not only to contradict the tenor of the scriptures, which declare that all Christ's living members are thus united by the Spirit to their Head (1 Cor. xii. 13), and that "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ," dwelling in him, "he is none of his" (Rom. viii. 9); he cannot be the son of God, for "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God" (ver. 14); he hath no right to call God Father (ver. 15), no interest in the "adoption," and in the inheritance of sons (ver. 17); but it is also to enervate the virtue of the promises of Christ, and the consolation of Christians of all future ages under their sufferings for the sake of Christ; yea, it is in effect to make the dispensation of the gospel cease, the difference betwixt that and the law being by the apostle placed in this, that the one is "the ministration of the letter" only, the other also "of the Spirit;" and if this were so only whilst these extraordinary operations of the Holy Spirit lasted, then from the time that they have ceased, the gospel doth not in this differ from the law, or deserve to be preferred above it on that account.

Arg. 2. This doctrine seems to take off from the energy of prayer in general, and from the virtue of prayer for the Holy Spirit in particular, and so to make men slight and neglect that duty of which the scripture speaketh so magnificently, and to which it so frequently exhorts us; at least, it seems not well consistent with the tenor of those inspired prayers, or those prescriptions for it recorded in the holy scripture: for who can reconcile it with those expressions, in which holy men of God so often beg God "would incline their hearts" unto him, since this he cannot do without some operation on their hearts; that he would "draw them, that they might run after him;" that he would "open their eyes, and give them understanding to discern his law;" that he would "lead them in the right way, in the way everlasting," and "guide them by his eye?" For if God by his Spirit hath no influence upon the heart or soul, how doth he incline or draw it? if none upon the understanding, how doth he enlighten or instruct it? If this be done only by the word read, preached, and pondered in the heart, we may as well apply ourselves to that work without as with prayer, unless we in these cases pray for some new external revelation, or for some motives not contained in scripture.

Moreover, according to this doctrine, it seems both fruitless and absurd to pray for the assistance of the Holy Spirit, or to expect we should enjoy it. And so that passage of Luke, "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be open unto you: for if evil parents give good gifts to their children, how much more will your heavenly Father give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" Luke xi. 9. 13, must be of no use or virtue to us. For what in these expressions can we pray for, but the assistance of the Holy Spirit? and what assistance can he afford us, if he doth not operate at all upon our souls?

To say this promise is to be confined to the apostles' days seems not agreeable to reason: for why then do we hear of it in the sermon on the mount, which certainly was spoken εἰς ακοὰς λαοῦ, "in the audience of the multitude?" why doth it run in words so general, πᾶς γὰρ, "For every one that asks receives?" Moreover, those spiritual and ordinary efforts for which the Holy Spirit was then given, those fruits of the Spirit they produced in them, are as needful and as spiritually good for Christians now, as when our Saviour spake these words: for as the Holy Spirit was needful then to strengthen Christ's servants "in the inward man" to do his will, Eph. iii. 16, to comfort them in tribulations, and support them under fiery trials, and to preserve them from the subtleties of Satan, and the temptations of the wicked world; so is there the same need of his assistance now for all these gracious ends, and therefore the same reason to expect him still to all these purposes. Moreover, the conditions of this promise may be performed by us now as well as then; we may be now sincerely desirous to obey the holy will of God, and with true fervency and importunity may beg the Holy Spirit to this end. And if we may acceptably perform these duties to which this promise is annexed, why may we not as confidently expect the blessings promised from the God of truth? For the encouragement here given to expect the assistance of the Holy Spirit is this, that we ask him of our heavenly Father: now this most comfortable relation God bears to all his children, of what age soever; he is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" and therefore there is now, and ever will be, the same benignity in God, the same good-will and readiness in him to give his Holy Spirit now unto his children for all needful purposes, as in all former ages. If therefore in like manner we do ask, we must have equal reason to expect we should receive him. To proceed therefore,

Secondly, To explain, as far as I am able, and think it needful so to do, how those "fruits of the Spirit," which the schools call "graces," are wrought in us by the Spirit of God.

First, I assert, that the manner in which the Holy Spirit acts upon the minds and hearts of men, for the production of these fruits or graces, and the preparatory dispositions of the soul towards them, may reasonably be conceived to be such as is suitable to the reason and faculties of men, viz. the understanding and the will. Now it is certain, that what naturally makes the understanding to perceive, is evidence proposed and apprehended, considered or adverted to; for nothing farther can be requisite to make men "come to the knowledge of the truth," and "understanding what the will of the Lord is," and so be "wise unto salvation." Hence the apostle prays that his Philippians might "abound more and more in knowledge, and in all wisdom," ἐν πάσῃ αἰσθήσει, "in all perception," that so they may "approve the things that are most excellent," Phil. i. 9, 10. Hence he speaks to the Romans thus, "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν, that you may discern and approve what is according to the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God," Rom. xii. 2, and saith to the Ephesians, "Be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is," Eph. v. 17, and ver. 8. 10, "Walk as children of the light, approving what is acceptable to the Lord." Again, what makes the will choose, is something approved by the understanding, and consequently appearing to the soul as good; and whatsoever it refuseth, is something represented by the understanding, and so appearing to the will as evil: whence all that God requires of us is, and can be, only this, to "refuse the evil, and to choose the good." Wherefore to say that evidence proposed, apprehended, and considered, is not sufficient to make the understanding to approve; or that the greatest good proposed, the greatest evil threatened, when equally believed and reflected on, is not sufficient to engage the will to choose that good, and to refuse that evil, is in effect to say, that which alone doth move the will to choose or to refuse is not sufficient to engage it so to do; that which alone is requisite to make me understand and approve, is not sufficient so to do. Now this being contradictory to itself, must of necessity be false.

Be it then that we have naturally an aversion to the truths proposed to us in the gospel, that can only make us indisposed to attend to them, but cannot hinder our conviction when we apprehend them and attend to them. Whence, for removal of it, the apostle only prays that "the eyes of our understanding may be enlightened, that we may know them," Eph. i. 18, adding, that where "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in Christ Jesus" was revealed, if after this "the gospel was hid" from any, it was only so, "because the god of this world had blinded the conceptions of their minds, that the light of the gospel might not shine into them," 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4. Be it that there is in us a renitency to the good we are to choose, that only can indispose us to believe and to approve it as our chiefest good. Be it that we are prone to the evil which we should decline, that only can render it the more difficult for us to believe it is the worst of evils. But yet, what we do really conceive to be our chiefest good will still be chosen, and what we apprehend to be the worst of evils, will, whilst we do continue under that conviction, be refused by us. It therefore can be only requisite, in order to these ends, that the good Spirit should so illuminate our understandings, that we, attending to and considering what lies before us, should apprehend and be convinced of our duty, and that the blessings of the gospel should be so propounded to us, as that we may discern them to be our chiefest good, and the miseries it threatens, so as we may be convinced they are the worst of evils, that we may choose the one, and refuse the other. Now to consider, in order to approbation and conviction, to choose in order to our good, and refuse, that we may avoid misery, must be the actions not of God but man, though the light that doth convince, and the motives which engage him thus to choose and to refuse, are certainly from God.

To illustrate this more familiarly by an instance taken from ourselves, or our deportment towards others: When a man, in words plain and intelligible, speaks to another, if he will hearken to what he says, he must understand his mind; for, by that very impression the words make upon his brain, he immediately perceives his meaning: and cannot the divine impression on the brain, which is God's speaking inwardly to man, do the same thing? This action is indeed so necessary, that as it is not virtuous or praiseworthy in any man to understand the mind of him who doth thus speak to him, so neither seemeth it praiseworthy in us purely to understand the mind of God thus speaking to us. Again, these words of man contain some exhortation to me to do what he desires I would do, backed with encouragements to do so, taken from the proposal of some advantage, the promise of some good I shall receive by complying with his exhortation; or they contain some dehortation from doing what he would not have me to do, because it will be hurtful to me, or will be certainly attended with some evil consequences. Is not this the method used by all the world in dealing with one another? And do they not all do this with hopes and expectation of success? And is it not a great disparagement to the word of God to think that his persuasions, admonitions, exhortations, promises, and threats, should be all insufficient to prevail with us to turn from our sinful courses, and turn to him, when all men who do use these methods towards their children, servants, friends, or relations, do it in hopes that they shall be successful by these means? Moreover, if the person they address be slow of understanding, do they not hope to overcome that difficulty by the clearness of their discourse, and by reiterating the same thing by such variety of expressions as he is best able to perceive? If he be averse from doing that which is desired, do they not hope to overcome that aversion by repeated exhortations, and vigorous impressions of those encouragements they tender to prevail upon him to comply with their desire? If he be strongly inclined to that from which they vehemently dehort him, do they not endeavor to turn the bent and current of his inclinations by the like repeated exhortations, and lively representations of the evils he will be certainly exposed to by so doing? All men are therefore of this opinion in their practice, that acting with men by convincing reason, and by motives and persuasions, is acting with them suitably to their faculties; and is not God himself of the same mind? Hath he not revealed his will on purpose that we may know it? Hath he not directed his letters and epistles to us, that by reading we may understand in them, "and know the things which do belong to our peace?" Did not our Saviour utter all his discourses to the same end? Why else doth he inquire so oft, "Why is it that you do not understand my speech?" (John viii. 43.) "How is it that ye do not understand?" (Mark viii. 21.) Why doth he preface them with this instruction, "Hear and understand?" (Matt. xv. 10.) Doth not God call upon us to "consider our ways, and lay to heart" his sayings, and his dispensations? (Hag. i. 5. 7.) Doth he not prescribe this as the remedy for preventing his judgments, when he saith, "Oh consider this, ye that forget God?" (Ps. l. 22,) and of being wise, by saying, "Oh that they were wise, that they would consider their latter end!" (Deut. xxxii. 29.) Doth he not represent this as the source of all the wickedness and idolatry of his own people, that they "would not consider in their hearts?" (Isa. i. 3, xliv. 19.) Doth he not make conversion the effect of this consideration, when he saith, "Because he considereth and turneth away from all the transgressions that he hath committed, he shall surely live?" (Ezek. xviii. 29, Ps. cxix. 59;) yea, doth he not represent this as a just ground of hope, that even the most stubborn sinners may be reformed, when he saith to the prophet, "Remove by day in their sight; it may be they will consider, though they be a rebellious people?" (Ezek. xii. 3.) Does not the apostle pray, that his Colossians "may be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom, that (so) they might walk worthy of the Lord, to all well-pleasing, being fruitful in every good work?" (Col. i. 9, 10,) that his Philippians might "discern and approve the things that are most excellent, that they might be sincere, and without offence, being filled with all the fruits of righteousness?" &c. (Phil. i. 10, 11.) And must not then this knowledge and approbation of his will be a means of rendering us fruitful in all works of righteousness? Does not God require his people to "choose life" (Deut. xxx. 19), pronouncing a blessing on them who choose the things that please him (Isa. lvi. 4), and threatening destruction to them that "would not choose the fear of the Lord" (Prov. i. 20), but "choose the things in which he delighteth not?" (Isa. lvi. 4.) Now, doth he any thing more to prevail with them who do "not choose the fear of the Lord, do not the things that please him," to engage them so to do, or not to do the contrary, but teach them his way, and persuade them to walk in them? Must it not then be certain, that either he transacts with them as men who might by these things be induced to choose to fear him, and do the things that please him, and abstain from the contrary; or threatens to destroy them for doing what they could not help, and had no means sufficient to avoid, and for not doing what it was impossible for them to do? Again, doth he not exhort men to be "willing and obedient," promising a full pardon, and a blessing to them that do so? (Isa. i. 18, 19.) Doth not Christ resolve the destruction of the Jews into this, "You will not come unto me that you may have life?" (John v. 40,) declaring this to be the reason why they were not gathered, because he "often would have gathered them, but they would not" be gathered (Luke xiii. 34), because, being so graciously invited to the marriage-feast, they would not come? (Matt. xxii. 34.) Now what did he to engage them to come unto him, to gather them, to prevail upon them to come unto the marriage-feast, but show them the way of life, exhort them and invite them to come unto the feast? Either then he transacted with them as one who knew this was sufficient for these ends, and that these things might have prevailed upon them to be willing, or else he resolved on their exclusion from the mariage-feast; and their not tasting his supper, for not doing what they could not do; and condemned them for not coming when they could not, because the Father did not draw them or give them to him (John vi. 37. 44), and for not being gathered when indeed he would not, whatever he said to the contrary, seeing he would not do that for them without which they could not be gathered. Moreover, doth he not earnestly exhort and persuade men to repent, and turn from the evil of their ways? Doth he not say, "Oh that my people would have hearkened to me; that Israel would have walked in my ways!" (Ps. lxxxi. 13;) "Oh that they were wise, that they would understand this!" (Deut. xxxii. 29;) "O Jerusalem! wilt thou not be made clean? when shall it once be?" (Jer. xiii. 27;) "Oh that thou hadst known, in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace?" (Luke xix. 42.) Now either in these exhortations and persuasions he acts with men suitable to their faculties, exhorting them to do, and pathetically wishing they had done, what they might have done, though they did it not; or called them to repent that they did not do what they never could do; that they did not avoid what it was impossible they should avoid; and even to repent that God had not irresistibly done this for them, and seriously wished they themselves would have done what, if it ever had been done, must have been done by himself, and therefore was not done, because he would not irresistibly work the change in them.

In fine, doth not God encourage men to repent and believe, to be "willing and obedient," by great and precious promises of the most excellent and lasting blessings? Hath he not threatened eternal damnation to them that do not believe? (Mark xvi. 15, 16;) hath not he said, "He will come in flaming fire, taking vengeance on all that obey not the gospel?" (2 Thess. i. 7.) And must not all these things sufficiently convince us, that God acts with men as one who doth indeed suppose that men may hearken to his exhortations, and comply with his persuasions to believe and to obey his gospel? may be prevailed on, by his promises, to the performance of their duty, and terrified by the consideration of the judgments threatened from their disobedience? Why else is it said that God has given us these "great and precious promises, that by them we may be made partakers of a divine nature?" (2 Pet. i. 2;) or why are we exhorted, "having these promises, to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God?" (2 Cor. vii. 1;) or why doth the apostle say, "Knowing then the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men?" (2 Cor. v. 11.) If beyond all this there be some physical and irresistible operation on God's part, necessary to make men know, and knowing choose the good and refuse the evil, this being not wrought in them who are not born anew, why is the want of this new birth and this spiritual regeneration so oft imputed to their want of consideration, and their not laying to heart the things propounded to them; to their not inclining their mind to wisdom, and not applying their hearts to understanding; and their not framing their doings to turn unto the Lord? (Prov. i. 14. 30, Hos. v. 4.) It it be said, This may be done, because they had grace and strength sufficient in their first parents so to do; I answer, Admit that vain imagination, that we had what we never indeed had, or could have, because it was lost long before we had a being; yea, what Adam never had, because then he must have had power to repent after his fall, and then we must have it still; for what power he had to repent after his fall, he could not lose by his fall: I say, admit this supposition, what is it to the import of all the exhortations, persuasions, and motives, contained in the gospel, which are all directed to fallen man; and so, if God be serious in them, declare his great unwillingness that fallen man should perish, his passionate desire that he should be saved; and if he speaketh in them suitably to the capacities and faculties of fallen man, plainly suppose him still in a capacity, by these assistances and motives, to understand his duty, and to choose the good, and refuse the evil?

Prop. 2. I add, That this is not ordinarily, and needs not at all to be done now, by propounding to the understanding any truths, or to the will any motives or inducements, which are not contained in holy scripture. For, if the word of God be a perspicuous and perfect rule, "able to make us wise to salvation," and "furnished for every good work," sure the good Spirit may, by suggesting the truths contained in it, and bringing them to our remembrance, and "opening our understandings to perceive the scriptures," sufficiently remove the darkness that is in our minds; if it be a "light shining in darkness" (2 Pet. i. 19), and πάντα τὰ ἐλεγχόμενα, "all errors" to be corrected, all vices to be reproved, "are made manifest by the light" (Eph. v. 13), then must it be sufficient to illuminate our understandings and direct our paths, or "lead our feet into the way of truth." Again, seeing the motives contained in the scripture to engage us to turn from those evil ways which tend to our disquiet, torment, and misery at present, and will hereafter subject us to eternal miseries, must be sufficient to turn us from the evil of our ways, or else the highest motives that can be offered must be insufficient to that end; all other motives to deter us from any action, as pernicious and disadvantageous to us, being as nothing when compared to that, "Depart from me, ye wicked, into eternal fire;" all evils we can dread or suffer from the hand of man, are little in respect of that we must have cause to fear from him who "can destroy both soul and body in hell-fire." Since, on the other hand, the promise of everlasting happiness, recorded in the same scriptures, as the result of our sincere obedience, must be sufficient to engage us in a sincere endeavour to yield that obedience to the good and holy will of God, or no inducements can be sufficient to that end; seeing this motive eminently contains all other motives in it, there being more in those two words, the enjoyment of God and everlasting happiness, than kingdoms, thrones, and treasures, joy, pleasures, honours, and all that can express the good things of this world, import; and therefore a more vehement constraining power in them, to the performance of our duty, than in the united strength of worldly greatness, honour, pleasures, and that which representeth to our hopes and our desires that which incomparably excels all we can hope for, or desire, besides: I say, this being so, the Holy Spirit, by making deep impressions on the mind of the advantages and rewards promised to our conversion and sincere obedience, and of the dreadful evils threatened to the disobedient, and bringing these things oft to our remembrance, which, in the scripture-phrase, is "putting these laws in our minds, and writing them upon our hearts" (see note on Heb. viii. 10), must do what is sufficient to work in us conversion and sincere obedience. For what reason can be given why the Spirit of wisdom, having "enlightened the eyes of our understanding to know what is the hope of our calling, and the glorious riches of the inheritance of the saints" (Eph. i. 18), and these things being thus made present to our minds, should not have greater prevalence upon our wills to obedience, than any temporal concerns to yield obedience to the laws of man? It is certain, Satan can only tempt us by suggesting some temporal allurements and advantages, or some temporal losses or affrightments to us: since then the scripture doth assure us, "this is our victory over the world, even our faith" (1 John v. 4), i. e. our "expectation of things hoped for, our evidence of things not seen" (Heb. xi. 1); these objects of our faith contained in the scriptures being presented to us, and impressed upon us by the Holy Spirit, must be sufficient to baffle all the temptations of sin, Satan, and the world. In fine, of this we may be sufficiently convinced from the experience of mankind; for, since the apprehension of good or evil is the sole motive to make us undertake or decline any action, the greater the good or evil is, the stronger motive it must be. Now, do not many millions in the world forego their present ease and pleasure, encounter difficulties, and venture upon dangers, and undergo most toilsome labours, in expectation of some finite temporal advantage, of which they cannot have assurance? Do they not oft abstain from what they passionately love, only for fear of dangers which possibly might not ensue upon the satisfaction of their appetites? Do they not sow, and plant, and trade, only in hopes of an increase? And should not, then, the hopes of infinite eternal happiness, and the dread of endless miseries, more powerfully engage us to obey God's precepts, and to resist all the temptations which flesh and blood suggest against them?

But, then, because the blessings and miseries of another world are things invisible, and only are discerned by the eye of faith, they being only moral and spiritual motives, which only work upon us as they are present to our minds by actual consideration and reflection on them, and this they are not always, when the temptations of the world, the devil, and the flesh, by sensual objects, are thus present with us; it is therefore necessary that at all times, when they are not thus present with us, and therefore cannot operate upon us, the Holy Spirit should, either by representing to us from the scriptures those divine truths with which our understandings have not been sufficiently enlightened, instruct and guide us, or else by reviving and impressing, i. e. inculcating on our spirits, those motives and inducements to resist those temptations, and to perform those duties which are required at our hands, assist us so to do.

Prop. 3. I therefore humbly conceive this inward operation of the Holy Spirit to consist in these two things:

First, In representing divine truths more clearly to our understandings, that we may have a fuller evidence, stronger conviction and assurance of them, which is in scripture styled "the illumination of the mind."

Secondly, In bringing these truths to our remembrance, that so they may be present with us, when this is requisite to enable us to resist temptations, and to encourage us to the performance of our duty. And upon supposition of these two things, that God acts with us suitably to the nature of our faculties (on our understanding, by representing the light to it, and on our wills by motives to choose the good and refuse the evil, and that the highest motives and inducements possible, when firmly believed, and present to the mind, must be sufficient to produce their ends), it can be only requisite to our conversion and sincere obedience, that the good Spirit should assist us in this work, by that illumination which is sufficient to produce this strong conviction and plerophory of faith, and should present those motives to our memories, and make a deep impression of them there; which, being present, will move our wills and our affections to prosecute the ends for which they are sufficient.

I am not ignorant that there may be many who, beyond all this, require a physical and irresistible motion of the Holy Spirit, in which we are wholly passive, to the conversion of a sinner; and I shall not dispute with them, that controversy being so fully handled by Dr. Claget, but shall endeavour briefly to compound and state the matter.

First, then, I say it must be granted, that in raising an idea in my brain by the Holy Spirit, and the impression made upon it there, the action is properly physical.

Secondly, That in these actions I am purely passive; that is, I myself do nothing formally to produce these ideas, but the good Spirit, without my operation, doth produce them in me. And,

Thirdly, That these operations must be irresistible in their production, because they are immediately produced in me without my knowledge of them, and without my will, and so without those faculties by which I am enabled to act.

But then I add, that, as far as they are so, they cannot be imputable to me; i. e. it cannot be praiseworthy in me, or rewardable, that I have such ideas raised in me; but only that, when they are thus raised in me, I attend to them, comply with, and improve them to the ends for which they were designed by the Holy Spirit. To make this evident by an example: It is on all hands granted, that Satan can so work upon the brain, as to raise up in it impure and blasphemous ideas; but then it is generally held, that the thoughts they immediately produce will never be imputed to us as our sins, nor will God be displeased with us for them, if we do not after show any good liking of them, or consent to them, but manfully resist, and rise up into detestation and abhorrence of them; and that, because the raising these ideas is the devil's action, not our own, we are purely passive in them till we consent to, or show some liking of, them: and they are also inevitable and irresistible, it being in the power of no man to prevent or resist them; i. e. to hinder them from being raised in his brain, or any ways to suppress them, till he doth first perceive them raised there. And therefore, for the same reasons, those ideas which are objectively good, being thus raised in us, cannot be imputed to us for reward, nor can God be well pleased with us for them, till we co-operate with them; because the raising of them is properly God's, not our own action, and we are purely passive in it, nor is it in our power to prevent or to resist them: but, then, God having planted in us a principle of reason and discretion, we can attend to them being raised, and so improve them to the illumination of our understandings, and to the approbation of them in our minds. He also having given us a will to choose the good and refuse the evil, we may consent to the good suggestions, and pursue the good motions raised thus in us; for to what other ends can they be raised in us by the Holy Spirit? As, therefore, our attendance and consent to the suggestions of the evil spirit being free, and what we may avoid, is culpable; so our attendance to, and compliance with, these motions and ideas of the Holy Spirit, being things in which we are free and active, and that upon deliberation; and so in them we do perform the proper and free actions of a man, doing that which we might not do, and refusing to do that we have both power and temptations to perform; therefore these things must be praiseworthy and acceptable in the sight of God.

I also add, that these ideas being thus raised up in us by God alone, and even the power of attending and consenting to them being, together with our nature, entirely derived from God, and all the inducements which we have to attend to them, and comply with them, being properly of divine external revelation, or such divine internal operation as, if they had not intervened, we should have had none of these good effects produced upon us; these effects are properly to be ascribed to God, and all the praise and glory of them must be due to him alone, because the principle of acting, and the inducement thus to act, is solely from him.

To conclude: The greatest instance of powerful conversion I can call to mind is that of persecuting Saul. He is confounded by a light shining round about him, brighter than the sun; by this he is struck down to the earth, and hears a dreadful voice from heaven, saying, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Now in all this he was purely passive, and the action done upon him was physical and irresistible; and therefore this action being wholly Christ's, not his, there could be nothing in it on his part praiseworthy, or rendering him a better man. But then, when he inquires of the holy Jesus, "Lord, what wouldest thou have me to do?" when he prays earnestly for the forgiveness of his sins (Acts ix. 11); when he submits to that baptism which was appointed by the holy Jesus for that end, and for the dedication of himself to his service; when, being told what grievous things he was to suffer for the name of Jesus, he notwithstanding "was not disobedient to the heavenly vision," but went and preached up that faith which he had formerly opposed; these being actions of deliberation and free choice, proceeding from reflections on the heavenly vision, and the conviction it had wrought upon him, must be praiseworthy and acceptable in the sight of God: though, being the results of what our Lord had done upon him, he very properly ascribeth the whole glory of them to the grace and favour of our Lord towards him. Hence, say Chrysostom and Œcumenius, he doth so magnify the grace of God in this matter, as μὴ λυμήνασθαι τῷ αὐτεξουσίῳ, "not to invalidate man's free-will" (see note on 1 Tim. i. 12). And that there is a perfect harmony betwixt the operation of God's grace and the co-operation of our wills, we learn from two examples recorded in one chapter, viz. 2 Cor. viii. 1. 3, where the apostle advertiseth the Corinthians "of the grace of God given to them of Macedonia:" for, saith the apostle, they were "according to their power, yea, and above their power, αὐθαίρετοι, of themselves willing" to contribute to the necessities of the saints; viz. the contribution was an act of their own free wills, proceeding from their choice; but the grace and favour of God given to them was the spring and motive of it. So again, ver. 16, 17, "Thanks be to God, τῷ διδόντι, to him that gave this care in the heart of Titus; for he accepted the exhortation, and being more forward, αὐθαίρετος ἐξῆλθε, he went to you of his own accord;" i. e. the exhortation was from Paul; that which gave the weight and vigour to it, and rendered him more forward in it, was the grace and favour of God to him: the reflection on both made this journey the matter of his own choice, and so he became "willing of his own accord:" yea, this is evident even from the very words, by some thought to assert the contrary, Phil. ii. 12, 13, "Wherefore, beloved—not only as in my presence (when you had me to be your monitor), but much more now in my absence (which God by the workings and inward teachings of his Spirit supplies), work out your salvation with fear and trembling: for it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his own pleasure" (i. e. sometimes by outward, and sometimes by inward means): for if beyond these inward suggestions and persuasions some physical and irresistible operations be required on God's part, which make it necessary for us both to will and do, why are we then commanded to work out our own salvation; for can we act where we are truly passive? Or can that be a reason why we ourselves should work, that another will effectually do that very thing without our co-operation? Is it not rather a manifest reason why we should neither will nor work at all, since both is and will be irresistibly performed without us? Why, secondly, are we said to work out our salvation with fear and trembling? for, can there be any cause of fear and trembling, lest that salvation should not be wrought out which God works in us irresistibly? Surely, if God works in us irresistibly both to will and to do, there can be no possibility of miscarrying, and so no ground for fear and trembling. Why, thirdly, are the Philippians exhorted to do this, much more in Paul's absence than in his presence, if, when he was present, God wrought in them irresistibly to will and do, and could do no more in his absence? It is therefore evident from these considerations, that God works in us both to will and to do, by giving us our wills and faculties, and then stirring them up to put forth their own acts.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

§. 1. Though, in the pure and primitive ages of the church I find no controversy touching the nature of faith, or of justification, they saying nothing of justification but as it is included in the article of "remission of sins;" yet seeing both this faith and the justification which is ascribed to it have, in the latter ages ministered occasion to many questions and disputes, canvassed with much contention, and prosecuted with the greatest zeal, as being judged matters of very high importance; and the Epistles to the Romans and the Galatians are the epistles which treat chiefly of this subject; I therefore shall, by way of preface to this epistle, endeavour to show,

1. What is the import of the word "faith," in scripture, especially as it relates to the matter of justification, or what the scripture representeth as true Christian faith.

2. What it is to be "justified," in Paul's acceptation of that word.

3. That this justification is by Paul ascribed to faith alone, in opposition to works of righteousness, done either by the Jew or gentile.

4. That it seems necessary from the nature of the thing, and the state and condition of the persons to whom the gospel was then preached, that it should be so.

5. That though this faith doth not include sincere obedience, and much less perseverance in it to the end, which yet are necessary and essential conditions, even of the new covenant; yet,

1. It lays the highest obligations on us to perform them, under the penalty of forfeiting the blessings of it. And,

2. It tendereth sufficient motives to this obedience, and, where it is sincere and lasting, it will most certainly produce it.

§. 2. And (1.) as for the import of the word "faith," in scripture, I think scarce any thing is more evident throughout the whole New Testament, than that the faith there mentioned is only a cordial and firm belief that Jesus is the Christ, the Lord, the true Messiah, or Prophet, sent from God, to reveal his will to the world; the Son of God, the Saviour of the world. To make this manifest,

Consider, (1.) That divine faith, in general, is only a firm assent to, or full persuasion of mind concerning the truth of, what is testified, revealed, or reported by God himself, or persons commissioned by God to reveal, or to bear record to it: for, seeing human faith is only a persuasion of the truth of what is told us or testified by man, divine faith must be a firm persuasion of the truth of what is testified or revealed to us by God. And this description of faith is clearly taught us by John, 1 John v., who having declared, ver. 4, 5, that the faith by which we overcome the world, is the belief that Jesus is the Son of God, proceeds to show we have great reason to believe this proposition, that Jesus is the Son of God: 1. Because the Holy Spirit beareth witness to it, and he is the Spirit of truth, ver. 6. 2. Because "there are three that bear record in heaven to it, viz. the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost," ver. 7. Now, saith he, "if we receive the witness of men;" if we rely upon their testimony in any court of judicature; if by the mouth of two or three human witnesses our weightiest matters are determined, shall not the witness of God be greater? i. e. shall it not be of more validity for confirmation of our faith in this particular, that "Jesus is the Son of God?" ver. 9. Surely we cannot disbelieve this truth, but we must give the lie to him, saith the apostle, ver. 10, "because we believe not the record which God hath given of his Son;" but if we do receive this testimony on his authority, "we set to our seal that God is true," John iii. 33.

This being, then, the nature of divine faith in general, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ must be a full assent to, or firm persuasion of mind concerning, the truth of what is testified, revealed, or reported by God himself, or by persons commissioned by him to reveal his will, concerning our Lord Jesus Christ. Or briefly thus, It is a firm persuasion that he who suffered at Jerusalem was the true Messiah, the Saviour of the world, the Prophet who was for to come, that person who was constituted Lord of all things; or, which amounts to the same thing, that he was Christ, the Son of God. For explication of this proposition, Consider, (1.) that the scripture mentions this as the great thing testified concerning him, by all the witnesses of the Messiah; as, v. g.

1. By John the Baptist, who came "for a witness to testify of the Light," John i. 7, and who "saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God," ver. 34: hence do John's disciples say, "He to whom thou barest witness baptizeth," John iii. 26, and Christ speaks thus to the Jews, "You sent to John, and he bare witness to the truth," John v. 33.

2. God the Father bare him record, and testified by divers methods, that he was the Son of God; so do we read expressly, John v. 32, "There is another that beareth witness of me; and I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true; the Father himself, who hath sent me, beareth witness of me." And again, xvii. 18, "It is written in your law, that the testimony of two men is true," i. e. it is to be received as such: "I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father which sent me beareth witness of me." Now God the Father bore witness to his Son (1.) by a voice from heaven, saying, "Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," Mark i. 11. This voice was personally directed to Christ himself, as being that commission which was sent him from heaven, to exercise the office of God's supreme minister, or legate, in the world; but it was also prefaced with an ἰδού, "Behold," directing the people to attend to it (Matt. iii. 17). (2.) By giving him the power of working miracles for confirmation of his doctrine and his own testimony; and therefore he speaks thus to the people, "I have a greater testimony than that of John: the works which my Father hath given me to do, they bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me" (John v. 36).

3. The Holy Spirit beareth witness that Jesus is the Son of God (1 John v. 6); and this he did, not only by his descent upon our Saviour at his baptism, and by raising him from the dead, he being "put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit" (1 Pet. iii. 18), but by enabling him to cast out devils, and to perform such works as never any other person did, or could do. Whence he thus argues, "If by the Spirit of God I cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come to you;" i. e. then is it clear that I am the Messiah, sent from God to preach the doctrine of this kingdom to you (Matt. xii. 28): since my commission is confirmed by these operations of his Spirit, and testified to "by the finger of God," as the phrase is varied, Luke xi. 20, and this, after our Lord's ascension, this Spirit was to do more fully: "for when," saith Christ, "the Comforter is come, even the Spirit of truth, he shall testify of me" (John xv. 26), and this he actually did; whence Christ is said to be "justified by the Spirit," 1 Tim. iii. 16, i. e. freed, by his testimony, from the suspicion of being an impostor, or false pretender, when he declared he was Christ, "the Son of God."

4. The apostles were men chosen for this very end: "Ye shall bear witness of me," saith Christ, "because ye have been with me from the beginning" (John xv. 27). "Ye shall be witnesses to me both in Jerusalem and Judea, and in Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth." Hence are they styled "witnesses chosen of God," Acts x. 41, "eye-witnesses" of what he did and suffered, Luke i. 2, "eye-witnesses of his glory," 2 Pet. i. 16; "That which we have heard, and seen, and looked upon, μαρτυροῦμεν, we witness, and declare unto you," saith John, 1 John i. 2.

5. Moses also and the prophets are produced as his witnesses; for "unto him give all the prophets witness" (Acts x. 43). All the scriptures: "Search the scriptures," saith Christ, "for they are they which testify of me" (John v. 39); and Moses in particular; "for if you believed Moses, you would believe me: for he wrote of me" (ver. 46).

Consider, (2.) the things for which the witnesses are produced, the evidence they give in concerning the Messiah, and that will teach us what is faith in Christ. Sometimes it is said that they bear record that he is "the Son of God," John i. 34, 1 John v. 5. 10; sometimes they testify that he was "the Christ;" thus Paul "confounded the Jews, testifying that he was the Christ," Acts ix. 20. 22, Peter, testifying to all the house of Israel, that "God had made him Lord and Christ," Acts ii. 36: sometimes they testify that he was "the Saviour of the world;" so 1 John iv. 14, "We have seen and do testify, that God hath sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world;" or, that he was "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world," John i. 29, that him "God hath exalted to be a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins to them that believed in his name," Acts v. 31, xiii. 38; sometimes they testify that he is "Lord of all things," Acts x. 36, and, as a consequent of this, that he, by God's appointment, was to be judge of all men, for "he commanded us," saith Peter, "to preach to the people, and to testify that it was he who was ordained to be the judge of the quick and the dead," Acts x. 42; sometimes they are said to bear witness of his resurrection, Acts i. 22, saying, "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are witnesses," Acts xxiii. 2, for "we have testified of God that he raised up Christ," 1 Cor. xv. 15.

3. Observe that all these several testimonies, though they differ in expressions, they differ little in reality, and in effect do only signify that he is Jesus Christ our Lord: for, (1.) to say he is "the Son of God," is in effect to say he "is the Christ," that person by God anointed to be our prophet. Matthew gives us the confession of Peter thus, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," xvi. 16; Mark thus, "Thou art the Christ," viii. 29; Luke, "Thou art the Christ of God," ix. 10. And when our Lord forbids them to divulge this to the world, he only saith, "Tell no man that I am Jesus the Christ," Matt. xvi. 20. "Art thou the Christ, the Son of God?" saith the high-priest to him, Matt. xxvi. 63; whereas St. Luke relates the question only thus, "Art thou the Christ?" xxii. 67. (2.) To be "the Son of God, is, in effect, to be "the Lord of all things," the person to whom all power is given in heaven and earth; that every knee should bow unto him, as their sovereign Lord and King: and, therefore, whereas Pilate is, in the other evangelists, said only to ask, "Art thou the Christ, the Son of God?" John relates the question thus, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" (3.) To be "the Son of God," must also signify to be "the Saviour of the world;" the testimony of the apostles being this, that "God had sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world," 1 John iv. 14; to testify that he was "risen from the dead," was in effect to testify he was "the Son of God;" for he was "declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead," Rom. i. 4. It was in effect to testify that he was made "both Lord and Christ;" and therefore Peter, having proved Christ's resurrection and exaltation to the right hand of God, infers that we may all be hence assured, that "God hath made him Lord," Acts ii. 36, and Paul tells us it was a demonstration that God by him would judge the world, Acts xvii. 31. And since his resurrection was performed by the almighty power of God, it must be a sufficient demonstration of the truth of what Christ testified of himself, viz. that he was "Christ the Saviour of the world," and that he should hereafter "sit at the right hand of power," it being impossible that God should have employed so great power in raising him from the dead, had he not been his well-beloved Son, or that Messiah he declared himself to be.

This being then the thing which all those witnesses were so concerned to attest and to engage men to believe, we may be sure this is, according to the tenor of the holy scripture, faith in Christ; and that by heartily believing that Christ is the Messiah, sent into the world to instruct us in the will of God, the Saviour of the world, sent to redeem us by his death from death and misery, and give salvation to all his faithful servants; that he is our Lord and King, by whose laws we are to be governed, and by whose laws we shall be judged and rewarded at the last day: we truly do believe in Christ. Which yet will farther be apparent,

1. From plain texts which seem expressly to assert the same. We find Nathanael saying, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel," John i. 49, and Christ thus answering to him, "Because I saw thee under the fig-tree believest thou?" Whence it is evident, that to acknowledge Jesus to be the Son of God, the king of Israel, was to believe in him. This was the faith of the Samaritan woman and her fellow-citizens, John iv. 26; for to this woman our Saviour testifies he was the true Messiah, saying, "I that speak unto thee am he," ver. 29, then the woman goes into the city, and saith to the men of it, "Come, see a man that told me all things that ever I did; is not this the Christ?" This being said, "many of the Samaritans believed on him, because of the saying of the woman;" and many more believed, "because of his own words," ver. 39; that is, they were persuaded, partly by what they heard her testify, partly by what they heard our Saviour speak, to acknowledge he was the true Messiah, or the Saviour of the world: for so they do themselves explain the meaning of believing on him, saying to the woman, "Now we believe, not because of thy word: for we ourselves have heard, and know that this is verily the Christ, the Saviour of the world," ver. 42. This was the faith of Martha: for Jesus having said to her, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: believest thou this?" she answers, "Yea, Lord: I believe thou art the Christ, the Son of God, who wast to come into the world," John xi. 25, 26; to believe this was, therefore, to believe in Christ, if Martha did so. We find Paul "opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead," Acts xvii. 3, and that "this Jesus," whom he preached, "was the Christ;" and then it follows, that "some of them believed," ver. 4, ἐπείσθησαν, they were persuaded of the truth of what Paul had testified. Again, it follows that those of Berea, searching the scriptures, and finding that these things were so, believed, ver. 11, i. e. they were persuaded of the truth of what Paul had taught, that "Jesus was the Christ;" that he had suffered, and was risen from the dead: this therefore must be to believe. Again, Paul was "pressed in spirit, and testified to the Jews that Jesus was the Christ," Acts xviii. 5, whereupon Crispus, "a chief ruler of the synagogue, and many of the Corinthians, believed;" i. e. they acknowledged the truth of Paul's testimony, that "Jesus was the Christ." "The word of faith which we preach," saith the same Paul, is this, that "if thou confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and in thy heart believest that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved," Rom. x. 8, 9; and this he proves, because the scripture saith, "Whosoever believeth in him shall not be ashamed," ver. 10. To confess, therefore, and acknowledge that "Jesus is the Lord," and that God raised him from the dead, is to believe on him. Lastly, "This," saith John, "is the victory over the world, even our faith," 1 John v. 4; and then it follows, "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" To believe therefore that "Jesus is the Son of God," is Christian faith.

3. This was the faith which the apostles did require in order to baptism; and where there was a due appearance of it, there persons were admitted into the number of "believers." For instance, Peter saith to the Jews, "Let all the house of Israel know that God hath made this Jesus, whom ye crucified, Lord and Christ," Acts ii. 36; this pricks them to the heart, and makes them to inquire, "What shall we do?" Peter answers, "Repent you, and believe every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," ver. 38; and then it follows, that "they who gladly received his word were baptized; and there were added to the church three thousand souls," ver. 41; and, ver. 47, "The Lord daily added to the church, τοὺς σωζομένους, the saved," i. e. such who were by his faith put into a way of salvation; and if they persevered in it, would obtain it. Again, Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and "preached to them Christ," Acts viii. 5, and "when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God," ver. 12, i. e. when they did heartily assent to them, "they were baptized, both men and women:" and when the eunuch puts the question to him, "What hindereth me to be baptized?" Philip returns this answer, "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest," ver. 37; and when the eunuch answered, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God," then was he instantly baptized; so that the faith required to baptism was only a hearty acknowledgment that "Jesus Christ was the Son of God."

§. 3. And because there be many false, and, in my apprehension, dangerous descriptions of true faith, which have obtained in these latter ages, I will here briefly lay them down, and then proceed to other confirmations of the scripture notion of true faith, by which we may abundantly discern the falsehood of them. Now they are such as these, viz.

1. That "faith is a firm assent, by which every true believer is persuaded, not only that remission of sins is promised in the general, but to him in particular."* So Calvin; and after him the generality of the French and Dutch divines.

2. That faith consists "in the application of Christ's merits to ourselves, in casting ourselves upon the merits of Christ, in apprehending, relying, or laying hold upon Christ for salvation;"† or, as others say, "it is a recumbency on Christ for salvation." Of all which notions of justifying, or true Christian faith, this is a full confutation, that they are perfectly unscriptural: for the first cannot be contained in scripture, it being certain, to a demonstration, that scripture nowhere saith, that Daniel, John, or Thomas, &c., have remission of sins. This, therefore, cannot be divine faith, or faith built immediately on a divine revelation or record, but rests upon our own experience, or knowledge of ourselves; for the argument must run thus, "He that repenteth and believeth, shall be saved." I, Daniel, and Thomas, have done this; which may indeed be matter of their knowledge, but not of divine faith, as being not revealed in scripture.

3. Nor are the other opinions less unscriptural; for we do not once read in scripture any command to apply Christ's merits to ourselves, or to apprehend his merits, or to lean and roll ourselves upon him for salvation: we find no exhortation in scripture to do so; no reprehension of any person for not resting on, or not applying Christ's merits to themselves; no promise made to any upon the application of Christ's merits: in a word, the scripture is wholly unacquainted with these phrases. And is that likely to be the duty on which our justification, adoption, and all our happiness depends, which hath no precept, promise, or example in the holy scripture? But I shall add some farther confirmations of the scripture notion of true faith, by which all these unscriptural opinions will be at once confuted. And therefore,

4. The scripture frequently informs us, that the miracles done by Christ are propounded as the great motive to believe on him, and as the aggravation of their sin, who still continue in their infidelity; and also that the consideration of them caused many to believe. On this account he requires to be believed; "If you believe not me, believe my works" (John x. 38, xiv. 11): "for the works that I do bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me" (John v. 36, x. 25). On this account he pronounces the infidelity of the Jews inexcusable, saying, "If I had not done among them the works that no other man did, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin" (John xv. 22. 24). It was this consideration which induced many of them to believe; for "many believed on his name when they saw the miracles which he did" (John ii. 23, vii. 30). Now what were all his miracles designed to produce in them, but a firm belief that he was "Christ the Son of God?" So doth John expressly teach us, saying, "There be many other miracles which Jesus did, that are not written in this book; but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Son of God" (John xx. 30). If you imagine that faith is a firm assent that Christ died for you in particular, and that you have remission of sins by him; that it is an application of Christ, or of his merits to yourselves, or a rolling yourselves upon him for salvation; how do his miracles convince you that you should thus believe on him? But if you say, it is a firm persuasion that he is the Christ, the Son of God, nothing can be more proper to convince us of the truth of what he thus declared, than these miracles; then may you say with Nicodemus, "We know thou art a teacher sent from God: for no man can do such miracles as thou doest, except God were with him" (John iii. 2).

5. This will be yet more evident from all those places which ascribe our justification and salvation to faith in God, or in him that sent this Jesus into the world. So doth our Lord himself in these words, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death to life" (John v. 24, xii. 44). The faith of Abraham is thus described, "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness," Rom. iv. 3, i. e. this faith in God was imputed to him for righteousness: when therefore the apostle adds, that "he is the father of them that believe, that righteousness might be imputed to them also," ver. 9, must it not be imputed upon their believing in God, as he did? Doth not the apostle hence infer, that "unto him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness?" ver. 5. Now to "believe in him that justifieth the ungodly," is certainly to believe in God the Father, for "it is God that justifieth" (Rom. viii. 33). To be justified by this faith, must therefore signify to be justified by faith in God the Father, according to those words of Peter, "We through him believe in God, that our faith and hope might be in God" (1 Pet. i. 21). Now if faith is supposed to consist in believing that our own sins are pardoned, in application of Christ's merits to ourselves, or in rolling ourselves upon the person of Christ, what affinity or connexion is there betwixt believing in God, believing the truth of his promises, as Abraham did, and was justified, and believing that our own sins are pardoned, applying the merits of Christ to ourselves, or rolling ourselves upon him for salvation? But then if justifying faith doth primarily consist in a firm persuasion that Jesus is the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; the Prophet sent of God to show us the way of salvation; the Lord and King, by whose laws we are to be governed if we would obtain it, then faith in Christ and faith in God are one thing: for God having testified all this concerning his Son Jesus Christ, and also promised that "every one that hath seen the Son and believed on him, shall have eternal life" (John vi. 40); by thus believing we "receive his testimony," and "set to our seal that God is true."

6. This may be argued from all those places which ascribe our justification and salvation to the belief of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, or of God's power excercised in raising him from the dead. Thus doth Paul in that very chapter in which he professedly disputes of justification by faith; for he expressly declares, that to them that "believe in him who raised Jesus from the dead, that faith shall be imputed for righteousness," Rom. iv. 24, as Abraham's faith in him that quickened the dead was imputed unto him for righteousness. And again, "If we believe with the heart that God hath raised up the Lord Jesus from the dead, we shall be saved; for with the heart man believeth to justification," Rom. x. 9, 10. Now what agreement is there betwixt my believing my own sins are pardoned, or my applying Christ's merits to myself, or rolling myself upon him, and Christ's resurrection from the dead by the power of God? But then if we say, that faith is a firm persuasion that Jesus was the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, the Prophet that was to come into the world, the Lord and ruler over all; this, as he testified of himself whilst living, and God the Father also testified, so was he "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. i. 4); by this all Israel might "know that God had made him Lord and Christ" (Acts ii. 24. 36), and that "God had exalted him to his right hand, to be a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and remission of sins" (Acts v. 31). Hence the apostle teacheth that Christ "died for our sins, and rose again for our justification," Rom. iv. 25, and puts the question, "Who is he that condemneth us? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again," viii. 34.

7. This appears farther from this consideration, that* in all the scriptures of the New Testament, there is not to be found one exhortation to any Christian to believe in Christ, or to act faith on Christ. When the apostles preached to Jews or gentiles, men not converted to the Christian faith, they still exhort them to believe that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, or to "believe in the Lord Jesus." And this was necessary to be preached to them, to persuade them to believe in, and to obey him: for till they did believe he was a person sent from God, and that they should receive some benefit by doing so, they could have no inducement to own, and no encouragement to obey him. It was therefore necessary that this should be first preached to Jew and gentile, that Christ was a person sent from God to preach the doctrine which he taught, and that remission of sins and everlasting life was to be obtained by his name, and by obedience to this teacher. But then I say, the same apostles in their epistles directed to those persons who were already Christians, and who had testified their faith by being baptized in the name of Jesus, have not one exhortation to any of them to believe in Christ; but only to be steadfast in the faith, to increase and grow in faith, and to repent of what they had done contrary to the faith they had received. The exhortations of our Lord to the seven churches, and more particularly to that of Sardis, in which there were but very few who had not defiled themselves (Rev. iii. 1—3), and that of Laodicea, which he threatened to spue out of his mouth for her lukewarmness (ver. 16. 18), are only to repent, and to renew their first works, not to believe in him, or to apply his merits to themselves. Now what account can be given of this thing by those who are so zealous in their sermons to exhort Christians to believe in Christ, to roll themselves upon him and apply his merits to themselves, and are so full of motives to persuade them so to do? I say what reason can they give, why men, assisted by the Holy Ghost, never exhorted any Christians to believe, but only to "show forth their faith by their works" (James ii. 18), and to "add unto their faith virtue?" (2 Pet. i. 5, &c.) But then if Christian faith be only a firm persuasion that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, the reason is exceeding manifest why no Christian should be exhorted to believe, because whoever is a Christian not only doth believe all this already, but hath professed his belief of it by being baptized in the name of Jesus. There therefore needs no exhortation to any Christian to believe in Christ, but only to walk answerably to that faith, to be steadfast in it, and to "add to his faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, godliness, brotherly kindness, charity" (2 Pet. i. 5. 8), that they may not be "slothful and unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Obj. If it be here objected that John saith, "These things have I written to you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know ye have eternal life, καὶ ἵνα πιστεύητε, and ye may believe in the name of the Son of God" (1 John v. 13); I answer,

First, That the Alexandrian and other Greek manuscripts, read not καὶ ἵνα πιστεύητε, but πιστεύοντες, "that ye may know ye have eternal life, who believe in the name of the Son of God." And this reading is confirmed by the Vulgar, the Syriac, and Ethiopic versions.

Secondly, They who retain our version interpret the words thus, That ye may "continue to believe in the name of the Son of God;" or, that ye may "more firmly and certainly believe."* Nor will the words bear any other meaning, unless you will suppose John should seriously exhort believers to begin to do what he had told them, in the immediate preceding words, was so effectually done by them already, that they might "know they had eternal life."

In a word, either it is true before we actually believe it, that our sins are pardoned, that we have a right to apply Christ's merit to us, and to roll ourselves upon his person for salvation, or it is not. If it be true before we have believed, we must have faith before, since nothing can produce his pardon of our sins, or give us any right to apply his merits to ourselves, or depend on him for salvation, but faith in Christ. If it be not true, we must obtain the pardon of our sins, and an interest in Christ's merits, by believing a lie: and so much for the first particular. To the next inquiry;

§. 4. Secondly, What is it to be "justified" in Paul's acceptation of the word? I answer,

First, That this justification which Paul speaks of, is an act of God terminated upon man. This the apostle expressly doth deliver in these words, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifies," Rom. viii. 33. And again, "It is one God that justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith," Rom. iii. 30. "It is God that justifieth the ungodly," Rom. iv. 5. "He is just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus," Rom. iii. 26. Now, according to the clear tenor of the scripture,

Secondly, God justifies the sinner by absolving him from the guilt of his past sins, by a free act of grace in pardoning his iniquities, or not imputing his sins to him, and so his justification must import his absolution from the guilt of sin, and, as a necessary and immediate consequence of that, our being reconciled to God, and received into favour with him. This will be evident, if we consider,

First, What the Baptist testified concerning him, that all men might believe, viz. that he was "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world" (John i. 29); and what Christ testified of himself, viz. that "he that believeth in him should not come into condemnation" (John iii. 36); that his blood was "the blood of the new covenant, which was shed for the remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi. 28), even of that covenant in which God promises to be "merciful to our unrighteousness, and to remember our iniquities no more" (Heb. viii. 13, x. 17). As also from what his apostles promised to win men to the faith of Jesus, viz. remission of sins. Thus, when the Jews were pricked to the heart, and said, "What shall we do?" Peter answers, "Repent ye, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," Acts ii. 37. And again, "Repent you, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out," Acts iii. 19: for "him hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins," Acts v. 13. Peter begins his sermon to Cornelius thus, "The word which God hath sent us to preach, is peace by Jesus Christ," Acts x. 36. "To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth on him shall receive remission of sins." Acts xiii. 23. Paul declares that "God had raised up to Israel a Saviour, Jesus:" and then he adds, "Known therefore be it to you, that through this man is preached to you remission of sins; and in him every believer on him shall be justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses," Heb. x. 1. 4, that law being not able to take away sins, Rom. iii. 23, i. e. to free men from the guilt of sin. Seeing then the benefit proposed to the believer, is the remission of sins to be obtained through Christ, through his name; seeing we are said to be justified through Christ, Rom. v. 9, through faith in his blood, Eph. i. 7, that blood which is so often said to be "shed for the remission of our sins," Col. i. 14. 20, and to procure our peace and our redemption; since, lastly, we are said by believing in Christ to be justified from sin, Acts xiii. 39, which phrase can only signify exemption from the condemnation of it: I say, from these expressions it appears, that God's justification of a sinner by faith, or through faith in the blood of Jesus, is chiefly the remission of the believer's sins, and the exemption of him from the condemnation of the law, by virtue of Christ's blood shed for the remission of sins.

2. This we may learn from the reasonings by which the apostle confirms his conclusion, or the arguments by which he proves, that both Jew and gentile are to be justified by faith without the works of the law, or without works. His conclusion is laid down, Rom. i. 17, thus, "The righteousness of God (which proceeds) from faith, is revealed in the gospel, to (beget) faith in Jew and gentile," ver. 16 (see the note there). And this way of obtaining righteousness or justification he proves to be absolutely necessary to them both, beginning first with the gentiles, whom he pronounces subject to the wrath of God, for "holding the truth" they by the light of nature knew "in unrighteousness," ver. 18. And this he proves to the end of that chapter, which concludes thus, that they, "knowing the judgment of God, that they who did such things were worthy of death, not only did the same, but had pleasure in them that did them." In the second chapter he declares the Jews guilty of the same things the heathens did, and so obnoxious to the same condemnation, and also guilty of violating the law of Moses; and thence concludes, that as to this matter there was no difference between them, he having proved both Jews and gentiles to be "all under sin" (iii. 9), and so both equally needing to be justified by faith, or to be justified freely by an act of grace, pardoning their sins through faith in Christ (ver. 24). His argument then is plainly this; both Jew and gentile lie under the guilt of sin, there being "none of them that is righteous" (Rom. iii. 9), i. e. free from sin, "no not one" (ver. 10). Neither of them can be justified by the law, because they by the sentence of it are ὑπόδικοι τῷ Θεῷ, "guilty before God" (ver. 19, 20), and obnoxious to punishment, as being both transgressors of it; therefore, saith he, "by the law can no flesh be justified, for by the law is the knowledge of sin," rendering us obnoxious to condemnation: where then there remains the guilt of sin, there can be no justification; where therefore there is remission of sin, and so a freedom from being guilty of it before God, there is justification. Again, "All have sinned," saith he, "and fallen short of the glory of God" (ver. 23); that is, either of his approbation, as that phrase signifies, John xii. 43, or of the fruition of the glory of God, as it imports, Rom. v. 1, 2; therefore absolution from this sin must be sufficient to make us obtain this glory of God. We who have thus sinned, saith he, "are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (ver. 24). Now what is this redemption? It is, saith the same apostle twice, "remission of our sins," Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14. The apostle argues to the same effect in the Epistle to the Galatians, that justification cannot be by the law, "because the law cannot give life;" and this it cannot do, because the scripture "hath concluded all under sin" (Gal. iii. 21, 22), and so shut out that way of being justified: our freedom therefore from the guilt of sin must be sufficient for our justification to life. In his fourth chapter to the Romans he describes justification by the not imputing sin, and the forgiveness of it, in these words, "To him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness, as David speaks of the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose unrighteousness is forgiven, and whose sin is covered; blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth not sin" (ver. 5—8). Since then the blessedness of which the apostle was discoursing was that of justification, the justification of the ungodly, and since this blessedness is said to consist in the remission, covering, the not imputing his sins to him, it cannot reasonably be denied, that the blessedness of a justified person is here described by the blessedness of a pardoned person, as being one and the same thing.

3. This will be farther evident from the consideration of the phrases the apostle useth as equivalent to justification, and interpretative of it. As,

1. Reconciliation to God: that this is the same with justification, appears by these words; "Much more being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath by him: for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life," Rom. v. 9, 10, where to be "justified by his blood," and "reconciled by his death," seem plainly the same thing. Now, that reconciliation is effected by the remission of sins, is evident from these words; "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," 2 Cor. v. 19, and therefore justification also must be so obtained: for if, upon the not imputing sin to us, God did not account us as righteous, he could not be reconciled to us, because he cannot be reconciled to any man continuing unrighteous, or under the notion of a sinner.

2. Justification stands utterly opposed to condemnation, in these words; "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect," or to believers? Τίς ἐγκαλέσει κατὰ, who shall object a crime against them? "It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth them?" Rom. i. 33, 34. And again, "If the administration of condemnation," i. e. the law, which chargeth us with guilt, and so rendereth us obnoxious to condemnation, "was glorious, much more the ministration, τῆς δικαιοσύνης, of justification, doth exceed in glory," 2 Cor. iii. 9. Now what is it that mankind is accused of, and charged with by the law, but sin? What is it that they stand condemned for at God's bar, but the transgression of his law? Justification, therefore, which stands opposed to it, must be a clearing and discharging them from the guilt or the condemning power of sin.

3. Justification is said to be from sin; "By him all that believe are justified, ἐκ πάντων, from all those sins from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses," Acts xix. 39. And again, "The judgment was from one sin to condemnation, but the free gift to justification, ἐκ πολλῶν ἁμαρτημάτων, from many sins," Rom. v. 16. Now what can justification from sin signify besides our absolution from the guilt of sin?

4. The justifying the believer and the remission of his sins are divers expressions of the same thing, as is apparent from these words, "God hath set forth Christ to be a propitiation through faith in his blood:" this he hath done, saith the apostle, "to declare his righteousness in the remission of sins," Rom. iii. 25, viz. to those that have this faith, i. e. to manifest the way of justification by faith, which he alone admits of for the remission of sins. He did this, saith the next verse, "to declare his righteousness, that he might be just," in requiring this propitiation for our sins, "and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus," ver. 26. Is it not therefore manifest, that to justify the believer and to remit his sins, must be the same thing?

5. "We are justified," saith the apostle, "through the redemption that is in Jesus, through faith in his blood," Rom. iii. 24, 25, "through his blood," Rom. v. 9. Now what doth this blood procure for us? "Forgiveness of sins," Eph. i. 7, Col. i. 14, saith the apostle, it being "shed for the remission of sins," Matt. xxvi. 28, he appearing "in the end of the world to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself," Heb. ix. 26. What benefit have believers by it? "He hath loved them, and washed them from their sins in his blood," Rev. i. 5; he hath made peace for them "by the blood of his cross," Col. i. 20, with a God only angry for sin; he hath "obtained eternal redemption" from transgressions by it, Heb. ix. 12. 15. By all these equivalent expressions it appears, that God's justifying the sinner, in Paul's sense of the expression, is his absolving him from the guilt of his past sins, from punishment and condemnation by the law for them, by an act of grace and free pardon of them through the blood of Jesus; his being as fully reconciled to us as if we never had offended against the former covenant we were all under, till the new covenant was established in the blood of Jesus.

§. 5. Thirdly, I add, that this justification is, by St. Paul, ascribed to faith alone, in opposition to works of righteousness done, either by the Jew or gentile. This plainly follows from that notion of justification which I have established as the true sense of the expression in Paul; for how could Jew or gentile be justified by the works of that law, whether Mosaical or natural, which rendered them both obnoxious to condemnation for sin, and guilty before God? Could they receive remission of sins by compliance with that law which left them under condemnation for it? Can any man imagine, after the charge he lays against the gentiles, ch. i., and against the Jews, ch. ii. iii., he could have any inclination to assert they should be justified, or absolved from the guilt of those offences, by their works, and not by faith only? The mistake in this matter seems to lie here, that men look upon justification, not as looking backward only, and procuring an absolution from our past sins; but as looking forward to our whole Christian conversation, and importing our absolution from all our sins committed against the tenor of the covenant of grace, or the new covenant; whereas it only doth consist, ἐν τῇ παρέσει τῶν προγεγονότων ἁμαρτημάτων, "in the remission of our past sins," Rom. iii. 25, in the "redemption of us from τῶν ἐπὶ τῇ πρώτῃ διαθήκῃ παραβάσεων, the sins committed against our former covenant," Heb. ix. 15, in the purgation of the believer, τῶν πάλαι αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν, "from his old sins," 2 Pet. i. 9, and leaves us afterward to be absolved or condemned, as we obey, perform, or violate the conditions of the new covenant, and so to be judged hereafter, not according to our faith, but works (see the note on Rom. iii. 25).

Secondly, This is exceeding evident from the plain words of the apostle, and by the arguments by which he proves we must be justified by faith, and not by works. "For," saith he, "by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight; for by the law is the knowledge of (that) sin (which renders us obnoxious to condemnation)." Now this knowledge of sin, being chiefly produced by the moral law, Rom. vii. 7, shows the apostle excludes as well that as the ceremonial law from justification. And evident it is, that the antithesis runs all along not between ceremonial and moral works, or between works done by the law of Moses, or by the tenor of the law of nature, but between works in general, and faith, the law of works and the law of faith. Again, "We are," saith he, "justified freely by his grace," Rom. iii. 24, i. e. by a free act of grace, in pardoning our past sins, by which we had "fallen short of the glory of God." Now a free act of grace is still opposed to works. Thus, if our election or calling to the faith of Christ, "be of grace, then is it not of works," Rom. xi. 6. "By grace ye are saved through faith, not of works," Eph. ii. 8, 9 (see the note there). "Not by works of righteousness which we had done," before the goodness and loving-kindness of God our Saviour appeared to us, "but according to his mercy he saved us," Tit. iii. 5 (see the note there). Moreover, "we reckon," saith he, "that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law," ver. 28, where it is on all sides granted, that the works of the law of Moses are entirely excluded from justification by faith, and then much more the works of the gentiles; it being "the same God who justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith," ver. 30. In the next chapter he saith, "To him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is reckoned for righteousness," Rom. iv. 5. Now, how can the ungodly be justified by works, and by what words can works be more entirely excluded, than by not working?

Thirdly, That evangelical obedience, or works of righteousness, done by us after faith in Christ, are excluded from that faith which justifies, is evident, because they follow the faith which justifies, i. e. procures the pardon of our past sins. "For," saith the apostle, "we are saved" from the wrath due unto us for our past sins, Rom. v. 9, or, we are put into the way or state of salvation "by grace through faith, not of works; for we are created in Jesus Christ to good works, which God hath ordained that we should walk in," Eph. ii. 8—10. So that we must be first in Christ by virtue of this faith, before we can be fitted to do works of evangelical righteousness. And this argument may be confirmed from many instances of persons who believed, and were immediately baptized the same day; for, being baptized "for the remission of sins," they must be justified. Thus, at Peter's sermon, three thousand believed, and were "baptized the same day," Acts ii. 41. Thus the Samaritans, upon the hearing Philip preach "concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of the Lord Jesus," were immediately baptized, Acts viii. 12; so also was the eunuch upon his preaching to him, ver. 38; so was Cornelius, and all that heard Peter's sermon, Acts x. 48; so was the gaoler, and "all his house straightway," Acts xvi. 33 (see Acts ix. 35. 42, xi. 21, xiii 12. 48, 49, xiv. 1, xvii. 4, 12. 34, xix. 18. Now what evangelical obedience could these men perform to render them justified by works!

Fourthly, This may be fairly argued from the example of Abraham's justification, and the passage whence St. Paul concludes it; "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness:" for it deserves to be observed, that Abraham had faith, or was a believer, before this was said unto him; for "by faith Abraham, being called, obeyed, and went forth," Heb. xi. 8, and after by a strong faith he offered up his son Isaac, "believing that God was able to raise him from the dead," ver. 17. But neither of these instances is pitched upon by the apostle as fit for his purpose, because in both obedience was joined with faith, whereas here was a pure act of faith without works; and of this act of faith it is said, what is not said of either of the other, "it was imputed to him for righteousness." If therefore thus it was in the example of the "father of the faithful," we may hence conclude it was so also in the children of "faithful Abraham."

Lastly, The scripture is express and frequent in this assertion, that believers are justified by faith; in which expression either faith must include works, or evangelical obedience, or it doth not; if it doth not, we must be justified by faith alone: and that it doth not formally include works of evangelical righteousness, appears,

First, From the plain distinction which the scripture puts between them, when it informs us, Gal. v. 6, James ii. 18. 22, 2 Pet. i. 5, 6, Rom. xvi. 26, 1 Thess. i. 3, that "faith works by love, acts with our works, and is made perfect by them;" when it calls upon us to "show forth our faith by our works," and to "add to our faith, virtue, knowledge, godliness, temperance, patience, brotherly-kindness, charity;" and when it speaks of the "works of faith," and the "obedience of faith."

Secondly, Faith, in the nature of it, is only an assent to a testimony; divine faith, an assent to a divine testimony; faith in Christ, an assent to the testimony given by God of Christ. Now it is not reasonable to conceive, that Christ and his apostles, making use of a word which had this known and fixed import, should mean more by the word than what it signified in common use, as sure they must have done, had they included in the meaning of the word the whole of our evangelical righteousness. Though therefore faith is the spring and the foundation of that righteousness, and, where it is cordial and lasting, will most assuredly produce it; yet is not that righteousness included in the very nature, or contained in the very import of it.

Obj. But doth not St. James say expressly, that "a man is justified by works," and "not by faith only?" ii. 24.

Ans. In answer to this capital objection, I shall first produce the words of the apostle James, with a short paraphrase, and then return a positive answer to the objection. The words I paraphrase thus:

Ver. 14. (And let not any Jew or Christian think his faith sufficient to justify and save him, without those works of charity and mercy here spoken of, ver. 8—13, for) what doth it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, (i. e. in words profess to have faith in God, ver. 19, or in Christ, ver. 1,) and have no works (to evidence the truth of that profession)? can (such a naked, fruitless) faith save him?

Ver. 15. "If a brother or sister be naked, or destitute of daily food;

Ver. 16. "And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be you warmed and filled, (making profession of compassion for and good will to them in your words, but) notwithstanding ye give them not those things which be needful for (the clothing or feeding of) the body, what doth it profit (them to hear your kind words)?

Ver. 17. "Even so faith (professed with the mouth), if it hath not works (answerable to that profession, or consequent upon it), is dead (and fruitless as those words), being alone (i. e. without works showing the truth of it).

Ver. 18. "Yea, a man may say (to such a solifidian), Thou hast (in profession) faith, and I have (real) works: show me thy faith (which thou professest) without thy works (which thou canst never do, faith being seated in thy heart, and only discoverable by its effects), and I will show thee by my works my faith (as the cause is demonstrated by the effect).

Ver. 19. "Thou (being a Jew) believest there is one God; thou (in this) doest well: (but doest no more than the very devils; for) the devils also believe and tremble (and if thou hast no better faith than they, thou hast the same reason to tremble which they have).

Ver. 20. "But wilt thou know, O vain man (who makest profession of such a naked faith), that faith without works is dead? (and so unable to justify or save thee: see it in the example of that very Abraham, in thy relation to whom thou so confidest:

Ver. 21. "For) was not Abraham (whom we style) our father justified by works (proceeding from his faith), when he had offered his son Isaac upon the altar? (counting that God was able to raise him from the dead, Heb. xi. 17. 19.)

Ver. 22. "Seest thou how (Gr. thou seest by this example that) faith wrought with his works (to produce them)? and by works was faith made perfect (and advanced in him to the greatest height).

Ver. 23. "And the scripture was (again) fulfilled, which saith, Abraham believed (in) God, and it (viz. that faith which produced these works) was accounted to him for righteousness: and (upon that account) he was called the Friend of God.

Ver. 24. "Ye see then how that by works (proceeding from faith) a man is justified, and not by faith only (i. e. being alone, and without them.)

Now, in answer to the objection from these words, I say, That when Paul saith, we are justified "by faith without the works of the law," and that "to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, faith is imputed for righteousness," or to justification; justification there ascribed to faith without works, imports only our absolution from condemnation by reason of our past sins committed before faith in Christ, and our reconciliation to God by the pardon of them, or the not imputing them to those who believe in him. This I have shown already, and it is apparent, from the chief argument the apostle useth, to prove that both Jew and gentile should be justified freely by his grace, and not by works, because they were all under sin, and become guilty before God, all having "sinned, and come short of the glory of God," Rom. iii. 9. 19. 23, whereas, saith he, "being justified by faith, we have peace with God, and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God," Rom. v. 1, 2. Therefore, ch. iii., he must be speaking of the condition both of Jew and gentile, before faith in Christ. So again when the apostle saith, "The scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise (of justification) by (the) faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe (in him). Wherefore the law was (then) our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith (in him); but now, after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster (i. e. under the pedagogy of the law); for ye are all the children of God through faith in Jesus Christ," Gal. iii. 22—26, he plainly insinuates that we cannot be justified by the works of the law, because the law leads us to Christ for justification. And again, "We are justified by grace, not of works; for we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works," Eph. ii. 10; where the argument seems plainly to run thus, We cannot be justified by works preceding faith, because we do no good works till by faith we are interested in Christ Jesus: whereas James speaks plainly of those works which follow faith, are wrought by it, and are the effects of it, and of their necessity in order to our continuance in a state of justification, and our freedom from final condemnation. James speaks of a mere profession of faith with the mouth; Paul of believing from the heart: James of a faith dead and fruitless, when we have it; Paul of a faith working by love when we have it, and of a person only justified without works, because he had no faith to produce them.

§. 6. Fourthly, It seemeth necessary from the nature of the thing, and the state and condition of the persons to whom the gospel was first preached, that they should be justified, or absolved from the guilt of their past sins, without new obedience, or without actual obedience to all the commandments of Christ; though not without that faith which did engage them to it, and was sufficient to produce it. For,

First, This was all that could be done by the convinced Jews or gentiles, who at one sermon or discourse believed, and were baptized for the remission of sins. It is manifest they then knew but little of the commandments of Christ, and so could not be doers of them. Either then they were not justified, and faith is not "imputed to them for righteousness," nor did baptism consign to them "remission of sins;" or they were justified by that faith which did not include actual obedience to all the commandments of Christ, as the condition of that justification. And seeing perseverance to the end, and being "faithful to the death," are by our Lord himself made the condition of salvation, and of receiving from his hands "the crown of life;" if these be also the conditions of the justification promised to faith in Christ, no person is or can be justified by faith till he dies. This faith, therefore, in Jew and gentile, thus converted, could only import three things: (1.) By way of preparation for it, an owning the true God, who gave this testimony to his Son, and so a "turning from dumb idols to serve the living God," and a sorrow for their sins committed against him in the time of their ignorance; and in the Jews, a sorrow for their past sins, and in particular for having "crucified the Lord of life;" and in this sense repentance goes before faith: and Christ's apostles preached to the Jews "repentance for the remission of sins through faith in his name," Acts. xiv. 15, and to the gentiles, to "turn from these vain things to the living God, who made heaven and earth;" and to both, "repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ," Acts xx. 21. (2.) As a means to obtain this remission of sins, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. (3.) An engagement for the future to cease from sin, and to give up themselves to the service of God, according to the rules and precepts delivered to them by his Son. Now this engagement was virtually contained in their repentance and their faith in Christ, and was solemnly made by them at their baptism, as will be proved hereafter. Now this being all that they could then do, it must be all they were obliged to do, in order to their justification; and yet it is certain, that a promise of obedience is not obedience, and that even the new covenant requires, in order to salvation, a sincere and constant performance of the obedience thus promised: so that the conditions of salvation, and of justification from our past offences, can never be the same.

Secondly, This will be farther evident, if we consider that no man can enter into covenant with God, be reconciled to him, be admitted to his grace and favour, or be enabled to serve him acceptably, till his sins be pardoned; for God cannot be reconciled to sinners whilst they continue under the guilt of sin unpardoned; nor can he enter into covenant with them, or receive them to his grace and favour, or accept their services, till he be reconciled to them. When God entered into covenant with his own people, a sacrifice was first offered to make atonement for their sins, and the blood of it was sprinkled upon all the people (Heb. ix. 19); and the new covenant, in which he promised to "be merciful to our iniquities, and to remember our sins no more," was established in the blood of Jesus shed for the remission of our sins: so that the sins of a believer must be immediately pardoned upon his faith in Christ, or he can have no peace with God, no reconcilement to him, no interest in the new covenant, and be in no capacity to do him any acceptable service. This is the import of those words, "Christ suffered for our sins, ἵνα ἡμᾶς προσαγάγῃ τῷ Θεῷ, that he might bring us to God," 1 Pet. iii. 18, for "to bring us to God," in all other places of the New Testament in which this phrase is used with respect to Christ, is to give us freedom of access to God, who by our sins were formerly excluded from it, and banished from his gracious presence: "By him," saith the apostle, "we have προσαγωγὴν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, admission to the Father," Eph. ii. 18. By him we do obtain "a freedom εἰς τὴν προσαγωγὴν, of access to God with confidence," Eph. iii. 12. This is obtained, saith the same apostle, by virtue of Christ's blood; for "we, who sometimes were afar off, are by the blood of Christ brought nigh unto him, for he is our peace," ver. 13, 14, and he hath reconciled both Jew and gentile to God by his cross. If then the blood of Christ procured this freedom of access to God, it is certain we had no freedom of access to him without it; and it is as certain we must have it by that faith which giveth us an interest in the propitiation purchased by it.

To set this matter in the clearest light, and show the reason why it was necessary that such an act of grace in pardoning our past sins upon our faith in Christ should be vouchsafed, that so we might be reconciled to God, capacitated for his friendship, and fitted for his service, let it be observed,

First, That "to come to God," is to approach him in the way of worship, as in those words, "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him," Heb. xi. 6 (see Psal. xlii. 2, lxv. 2, lxxxvi. 9, xcv. 26, Isa. i. 12).

Secondly, That God being a holy God, none were to come into his presence who had any pollution or defilement upon them, upon pain of death, till they were sanctified, or cleansed from it, by some purification or atonement made for them to God. He dwelt in the whole camp of Israel, and so those lepers, who were so unclean as to pollute the camp, were driven from it (Lev. xiii. 46, Numb. v. 2, 3, 2 Kings xv. 5): and those sin-offerings which were polluted with the sins of the whole congregation, were carried out of the camp (Lev. xvi. 21, 22. 27, Heb. xiii. 11). God dwelt more especially in the temple, and therefore they who had lesser impurities, i. e. who were defiled by the dead, or by an issue, and all menstruous women, were not to come thither till they were cleansed from those defilements (Lev. xii. 14, xv. 21). Moreover, he being a God "of purer eyes than to behold iniquity," they who had committed any sin of ignorance, or lay under the guilt of it, were not permitted to come into the court of the God of Israel till they had brought their offering of atonement (see Ainsworth on Numb. v. 3).

Thirdly, They who had no ceremonial defilement to be purged away, and no known sin to make atonement for, were admitted to come near to God, as being holy; they had προσαγωγὴν τῷ Θεῷ, "a freedom of access to God" in his tabernacle, and in his temple; whence they are styled, ὁ λαὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτῷ, "the people that draw near to God," Ps. lxv. 4, cxlviii. 14, Lev. x. 3. And God is said to be ὁ Θεὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτοῖς, "a God drawing near to them," Deut. vii. 4, both by relation, as having owned them as his children, and entered into covenant to be their God, and by his more especial presence with them; for the Shechinah, or the glorious presence, dwelt among them in the holy place, and so to them belonged, ἡ λατρεία, the privilege of coming to his court to worship him, and a promise of his blessing if they sincerely did it: whereas the heathens, who by reason of their idolatry were not permitted to serve him, are said to be "afar off," and so far without God in the world, as to have no freedom of access to his service, no such converse with him, or relation to him (Eph. i. 12, 13. 17. 19).

Now God being still as holy a God as ever, and still "of purer eyes than to behold iniquity," the scriptures of the New Testament seem as plainly to make our freedom of access to God to depend upon our being sanctified in the sacrificial sense, i. e. our being purged and delivered from the guilt of sin by an atonement made for us by the blood of Christ, that our sins being thus pardoned through faith in his blood, we may have peace with God, and an access to his favour. This plainly seems to be the import of those words, "If the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of a heifer, sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh" (and by so doing procureth an admission of the person cleansed to serve God in the sanctuary), "how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God (for us), purge your conscience from dead works, (or works exposing you to death, the punishment of the person who came unclean into God's presence, that so you may be admitted) to serve the living God!" Heb. ix. 12 (see the notes there). So again, the apostle having said that the covenant established in the blood of Christ was this, that he would "be merciful to our iniquities, and remember our sins no more;" and having thence inferred, that having thus obtained remission for us, there was no need that he should make himself again "an offering for sin," he adds, that "therefore we may draw near to God with full assurance of faith," that we shall be accepted through the Beloved, "as having our hearts sprinkled" by his blood, and therefore cleansed from all guilt of conscience, "and our bodies washed (by baptism) with pure water" (Heb. x. 16—21).

Two things observed by the judicious Dr. Barrow seem here considerable:

First, "That the apostle in this discourse implies that no precedent dispensation had exhibited any manifest overture or promise of pardon, and upon that account we were in a main point defective; for the light of nature doth only direct to duty, condemning every man in his own judgment and conscience, who transgresseth; but as to pardon, in case of transgression, it is blind and silent: and the law of Moses rigorously exacteth punctual obedience, denouncing in express terms a condemnation and curse to the transgressors of it in any part; and so it was a law, οὐ δυνάμενος ζωοποιῆσαι, 'not able to give life' (Gal. iii. 21), or save us from death. Hence doth the apostle lay down this as the foundation of this whole dispute, that the gospel alone was the 'power of God through faith to the salvation' both of Jew and gentile, Rom. i. 16, 17, because in that alone was 'the righteousness of God by faith revealed' to beget faith in them, even the faith by which 'the just shall live,' declaring that no precedent dispensation could justify any man, and that a man is justified by faith, or hath an absolute need of such a justification as that which the gospel tendereth. Λογιζόμεθα οὖν, 'We therefore collect,' saith he, 'that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law,' whether natural or Mosaical; which justification must therefore import their receiving that free pardon which the criminal and guilty world did stand in need of, and without which no man could have any comfort in his mind, or peace with God: for if the state of man was a state of rebellion, and so of heinous guilt, of having forfeited God's favour, and of obnoxiousness to his wrath, then that justification, which he needed, must be a dispensation of mercy removing that guilt, and restoring him to the favour of God."

And this may also strongly be argued from the objections which the Jew and gentile made against this doctrine of justification by a free act of grace, that it seemed to render it unjust in God to take vengeance on those sins which tended so highly to the glory of God's grace (see the note on Rom. iii. 5); and to encourage us to "do evil that good may come" (see the note on ver. 8); and more especially from the objections which he answers, vi. 1. 15. For thus they run; τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; "What do we say then? (do we say this,) Let us (who have received this grace) continue (still) in sin, that grace may abound (towards us)?" And ver. 15, "What then, shall we (go on in) sin, because we are not under the law (which condemns us to death for every transgression), but under (that covenant of) grace (which allows the pardon, and promises the forgiveness of it)?" That is, do we, by declaring that "we are justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (iii. 24), and that "as sin abounded, grace did more abound," give just occasion for these inferences? Now, if the faith to which Paul, in this discourse, ascribed our justification, did not oblige us to, but even comprehend and include evangelical and constant obedience, what colour could there be for these objections? And therefore,

Secondly, The doctor (p. 83) proposes it as his conjecture, that the apostle in this discourse designedly sets himself to answer this objection of the Jew and gentile against this doctrine of Christianity; viz. That it did upon so slender a condition or performance as that of faith, tender to all persons indifferently, howsoever culpable their former lives had been, a plenary remission of their sins, and reception into God's favour. The Jews could not conceive or relish, that any man so easily should be translated into a state equal or superior to that which they supposed they did enjoy. The gentiles themselves could hardly digest it, that the Christians said, "Believe, and ἡ πίστις σου σώσει σε, thy faith shall save thee:" this is one of the exceptions which Celsus makes against it. And Zosimus* having said, that the heathen priests having told Constantine that their religion afforded no purgation for his crimes, he was persuaded to embrace Christianity, as being told the Christian doctrine would take away all sin; and had this promise annexed to it, "That the ungodly who would embrace it, should presently be absolved from all sins," intimates, that he looked on this as a just exception against the Christian faith.† This prejudice against the gospel, saith he, Paul removes, by showing, that "because of all men's guilt and sinfulness, such an exhibition of mercy, such an overture of acceptance and remission of sins, was necessary in order to salvation; so that without it no man could be exempted from wrath and misery, and that consequently all other religions, as not exhibiting such a remission, must be esteemed in a main point defective."

§. 7. Obj. 1. But against this it may be objected, that our justification seems to be connected with our glorification; for "whom he justifies, them he also glorifies" (Rom. viii. 30). Now it is certain that our future state of glory depends not only on our faith, but works; and by the same apostle, in the same epistle, is promised to him that "worketh good" (Rom. ii. 6, 7. 10), we being all to be hereafter recompensed "according to our works."

Ans. 1. To this it may be answered in the words of the reverend Dr. Hammond (Pr. Cat. p. 89), "That whom God justifies, if they pass out of this life in a justified state, them he will certainly glorify;" or, as in this paraphrase, "Whom he called to suffer after the example of his Son, them, upon patience and perseverance under those sufferings, he justifies, i. e. he approves of as sincere and worthy, as they suffer for, so to be glorified with him, Rom. viii. 17, 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12, 1 Pet. iv. 13, and whom he thus justifies, them he will also glorify." And according to this import of the words, justification doth not signify, as in the great dispute of the apostle, the remission of our past sins committed before faith in Christ; but rather our justification at the great day of our accounts, as his sincere and faithful servants. As it seems to import most clearly in those words of the same apostle, "I know nothing of myself (whereby to condemn myself of unfaithfulness in the discharge of my office), yet I am not thereby justified, but he that judgeth me is the Lord," 1 Cor.

* Προσίη τοῖς ἱερεῦσι καθάρματα τῶν ἡμαρτημένων· αὐτῶν δὲ εἰπόντων ὡς οὐ παραίνοιτο καθαρμοῦ τρόπος ἀνοσιήμασι τηλικαῦτα καθῆραι ἐνιάμενος. Hist. lib. ii. p. 61.

† Πάσης ἁμαρτάδος ἀναιρετικὸν εἶναι τὴν τῶν Χριστιανῶν δόξαν, καὶ τοῦτο ἔχειν ἐπάγγελμα τὸ τοὺς ἀσεβεῖς μεταλαμβάνοντας αὐτῆς, πάσης ἁμαρτίας ἔξω παραχρῆμα καθίστασθαι. Ibid.

iv. 4. And in those words of the Epistle to the Romans, "Not the hearers of the law only shall be δίκαιοι, just before God, but the doers of the law, δικαιωθήσονται, shall be justified" (Rom. ii. 13): and so James, "Abraham was justified by works, and he was called the friend of God."

Ans. 2. But secondly, There is another ancient interpretation of these words, which cuts off the whole force of this argument, viz. "Those he glorified, by giving them that Spirit of glory," and of God, who is the earnest of their future inheritance. "He glorified them," say Chrysostom,* Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, "by the Spirit of adoption, calling them sons, and giving them the grace of the Holy Spirit." To strengthen this interpretation, let it be considered, that our Saviour is said, whilst he was on earth, to have wrought his miracles by the Spirit of God; and by those miracles he is said sometimes to be δοξαζόμενος, "glorified" (Luke iv. 15), sometimes to "show forth τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, his glory" (John ii. 11), and sometimes it is said that God ἐδόξασε, "glorified him" (John viii. 54, xi. 4, xiii. 31, 32, xvi. 14). And when Christ gave to his apostles and believers the Holy Spirit, to enable them to work the like miracles, he expresses himself thus to his Father, "The glory which thou gavest me I have given them, that the world may know that thou hast sent me" (John xvii. 22, 23). Moreover, by reason of this Spirit given with the gospel, the ministration of justification is said to be ἐν δόξῃ, with, or "in glory" (2 Cor. iii. 8—11), as being the ministration of the Spirit; and believers, by the participation of this Spirit of the Lord, are said not only to "behold the glory of the Lord," but also to be "changed into the same image with him from glory to glory" (ver. 18), and so to be "conformed to the image of his Son." And thus, saith Origen on this place,† "they may be said to be glorified in this life." Note also, that when the apostle speaks of our final glorification in this chapter, he still speaks of it as a thing future, saying, "We shall be glorified with him" (ver. 17, 18. 21), whereas here he speaks of it as a thing past already, saying, οὓς δὲ ἐδικαίωσε, τούτους καὶ ἐδόξασε, "Whom he hath justified, them he hath also glorified;" which confirms this interpretation. And, lastly, thus it connects well with the foregoing words, "The Spirit which helpeth our infirmities, intercedeth according to the mind of God for the saints; οἴδαμεν δὲ, we know therefore that all things shall work together for good to them who love God, who are called according to his purpose (of making them the sons of God by adoption, and giving them the Spirit of his Son in their hearts, Gal. iv. 6, Eph. i. 5. 13), for whom he (thus) foreknew, them he predestinated (or appointed) to be thus conformed to the image of his Son; and whom he (thus) predestinated, them he also called (to the Christian faith); and whom he called (upon their cordial embracing of that faith) he justified (we being made the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus, Gal. iii. 26), and whom he (hath thus) justified, them he hath also glorified."

§. 8. Obj. 2. It may be said, that not only our justification, but salvation, is by the apostle ascribed to faith: as when he says, "By grace ye are saved through faith," Eph. ii. 8, 9, and, "If thou believest with the heart, thou shalt be saved," Rom. x. 9, Tit. iii. 5, whereas doubtless salvation dependeth on our works, which therefore must be included in this faith.

Ans. To this objection I answer, that salvation may very well in scripture he ascribed to faith upon these two accounts:

1. Because faith puts us in the way of salvation; that way of owning the Saviour of the world, and subjecting ourselves to his government, which gives us a present right to salvation, should God take us hence soon after baptism into this faith, or a sincere belief in Christ; as in the case of those many martyrs who believed and suffered the same day; and if we live by, and suitably to, this faith, still owning the Lord Jesus, and still subjecting ourselves to his laws and government, will keep us in the state of salvation; for "he that (thus) believeth in the Son hath eternal life," John iii. 36 (see ver. 16), i. e. he hath a present right to it, and may "rejoice in the hope of the glory of God," and by continuing so to do, he shall receive "the end of his faith, even the salvation of his soul." It puts us in a present state of freedom from condemnation, by procuring the pardon of all our past sins; for he that thus "believeth shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death to life" (John v. 24, iii. 18). It doth at present save us from the wrath of God, he being only angry with us on the account of sin unpardoned; for "being justified," saith the apostle, "by faith in his blood, we shall be saved from wrath by him" (Rom. v. 9). Now this is all which very frequently is signified by the words saved and salvation: as when it is said of Zaccheus, "This day is salvation come unto this house;" and "The Lord daily added to the church τοὺς σωζομένους, the saved," Acts ii. 47, and again, "The word of the cross is τοῖς σωζομένοις ἡμῖν, to us the saved, the power of God," 2 Cor. i. 18. See this farther proved in the notes on Eph. iii. 8, Tit. iii. 5.

Secondly, Salvation may be well ascribed to faith, not indeed in opposition to, or exclusion of works, but rather as the cause and the producer of all works of piety and righteousness: and both the wisdom and the excellency of this method for the procuring the great ends of Christian piety, of purity of life, and of sincere obedience to the whole will of God, will be extremely evident from these considerations:

1. That this faith consigned by baptism doth lay the highest obligations on us to a life of holiness and obedience, under the pain of forfeiting all the blessings of the new covenant, or all the privileges of Christianity. For (1.) faith in him as the true Messiah, the prophet sent from God to declare his will, and make known his precepts, and to lay down the terms on which we say expect salvation from him, must surely oblige us to perform that will, and to submit to the terms on which alone salvation is thus tendered to us, not only that we may not miss of that salvation, but that we may not be condemned as despisers of so great salvation.

Again, Faith in him as our Saviour, one who hath, by his death, purchased deliverance to us from death, and from the wrath to come, must surely oblige us, as well in point of duty as of gratitude, to "live to him who died for us" (2 Cor. v. 15), and being bought with such a price, "to glorify him with our souls and bodies which are his" (1 Cor. vi. 20); especially we consider that this was one great end of these his sufferings; he having "died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live to themselves, but to him that died for them;" that he might "redeem us from this present evil world" (Gal. i. 4), "and purify us to himself, a people zealous of good works" (Eph. v. 25, 26), and that we, "being dead to sin, might live to righteousness" (1 Pet. ii. 24): and surely, they cannot expect the blessings of his salutary passion, who defeat the design and frustrate the purpose of it.

Faith in him, as our Lord and King, as it doth presuppose his right to require service from, and prescribe laws to us, so must it engage us to the honour and service of this Lord (for "why" saith he, "call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say?" (Luke vi. 46;) to fear and to obey this King of saints, as knowing he will say to all his disobedient subjects, "Bring these mine enemies, which would not I should reign over them, and slay them before me" (Luke xix. 27).

Faith, lastly, in him as our Judge and our Rewarder, must cause us herein to "exercise ourselves always to have consciences void of offence towards God and man" (Acts xxiv. 16), as we desire to be found blameless at that day, and to be steadfast and abounding in the work of the Lord, which will so plentifully be rewarded (1 Cor. xv. 58).

In a word, to what other end can we think a holy God was so concerned that we should firmly be persuaded of, and yield a free assent to, these things? Can it be only this, that he should fill our heads with notions, but leave us still at liberty to disobey the message sent us from heaven by his only Son? why then said he, "This is my beloved Son; hear him?" (Matt. xvii. 5). Can he suffer us to slight the terms on which alone salvation is thus tendered to us? why then were they at all propounded? Can he permit us to be disobedient to this Lord, or rebels to this King of saints? why then was this authority conferred upon him? Hath he made him the judge and rewarder of all men at the great day? and will he not reward them all according to their works?

But then if we consider farther this faith, as it hath baptism annexed to it, according to these words of Christ, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved;" our obligation to obedience by it will still be more evident. For is not our baptism "in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," an entire dedication of ourselves to the service of the blessed Trinity, a solemn entrance into covenant that we will own no other God, will serve no other Lord, will not be led by the unclean, but by the conduct of the good and Holy Spirit? Did not Christ command his disciples to teach them whom they baptized, to "observe all things which he commanded?" (Matt. xxviii. 20,) and must they not be obliged to obey what they were to be taught in his name? What is it to baptize, but μαθητεύειν, to "make disciples" to the holy Jesus? and hath he not said, "Then only are ye my disciples indeed, when ye continue in my word?" (John viii. 31.) What is it to be baptized, but to make "the stipulation of a good conscience towards God?" (1 Pet. iii. 21;) and are not we obliged to be true to this solemn promise made to God? or can we neglect to do so without mocking him, and taking his sacred name in vain? Are we not baptized in the name of Christ? and are not they who name that name engaged to "depart from all iniquity?" (2 Tim. ii. 19). Hath not Paul informed us, that "as many as are baptized into Christ, are baptized into his death?" (Rom. vi. 3,) and so are by that baptism obliged to "die to sin" (ver. 6. 11), "not to obey it in the lusts thereof; not to yield their members instruments of sin to unrighteousness," but to "walk in newness of life" (ver. 12, 13); to "live to God," and to "present their members instruments of righteousness to God" (ver. 4. 10. 13), and to "have their fruit to holiness, that the end may be eternal life" (ver. 22); and that upon this conformity to Christ's death and resurrection depends our hope that we "shall live with him?" (ver. 8.) So that it is evident, to a demonstration, that both our faith and baptism do lay upon us the strictest obligations to depart from all iniquity, and yield sincere obedience to the laws of God and Christ, as we expect the blessings purchased by him for or promised to believers. As then Peter saith on this account, that "baptism now saveth us" (1 Pet. iii. 21), so may salvation be on the same account ascribed to our faith in Christ.

Secondly, Faith is the spring and the foundation of all the obedience we afterward perform, and therefore may be well said to save as many as obtain salvation, because it worketh in them that obedience by which they are saved, and moves them to perform those conditions on which their actual salvation doth depend. Thus of faith in God, the apostle teacheth, that it must be necessarily laid as the foundation of all the service we perform unto him; for "he that cometh to God must believe that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek (to please) him" (Heb. xi. 6). And thus he shows it was with all the patriarchs and holy people of God before the revelation of the gospel; they by that faith, which was "the expectation of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen, obtained testimony that they were righteous" (Heb. xi. 4), and that they "pleased God" (ver. 5. 8. 18, 19), obeyed his call in the most difficult instances, "chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; wrought righteousness, and suffered death, not accepting a deliverance" (ver. 25, 26. 33. 35). And so it is with faith in Christ; it is the foundation of all our obedience, which therefore is in scripture styled "the obedience of faith," Rom. i. 5, xvi. 26, and of all our good works, they being all the "work of faith," 2 Thess. i. 11. It is by virtue of this faith that we are enabled to "overcome the world," to "resist the devil," and to "quench all the fiery darts of Satan" (1 John v. 5, 1 Pet. v. 9, Eph. vi. 16). It is "faith that works by love" to God, and to our brother; which love we testify to God, by "keeping his commandments," and to our neighbour, by fulfilling the laws of justice and charity; and this is very evident, even from the nature of faith: for can any man obey the precepts this Prophet hath delivered in his Father's name, unless he believes he was that prophet which was sent by him to reveal his will, and that king by whose laws we must be governed? Can he submit to the terms of salvation propounded by him, till he believes "he is the author of salvation to all that obey him?" Can he herein "exercise himself to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and man," but by that faith which doth assure him that he will judge all men by these laws, awarding "glory and immortality to every man that worketh righteousness" Rom. ii. 8), and "punishing them with everlasting destruction from his presence that obey not his gospel?" (2 Thess. i. 8.) And is not then this faith the true foundation of all Christian piety? Thus doth "the just man live by his faith," and doing so "believeth to the salvation of his soul." As therefore we are said to be "saved by hope," Rom. viii. 24, because it is the motive to steadfastness in our obedience, so may we be said to be saved by faith upon the same account. And,

Thirdly, We may be well said to be saved by faith, because where faith is hearty and constant it will produce sincere obedience, and holiness will follow in the life: and when it doth not follow, this is to be ascribed to the want of faith. This will be evident if we consider the material objects of our faith, the blessings promised to the obedient, and the evils threatened to the disobedient: for it is certain that the blessings promised in the gospel do far exceed all other blessings that we can enjoy; and that the evils threatened there are far more lasting and intolerable than any other evils we can suffer: and it is no less certain that these blessings are by our Lord confined to the obedient; for "not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter," saith he, "into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. vii. 21); and it is as sure that these tremendous evils are entailed upon the wicked, Christ having solemnly declared he will say to them at the great day, "Depart from me, I know ye not, ye workers of iniquity" (ver. 23): and if we do believe our Saviour was a prophet sent from God, we must believe these revelations he hath made concerning both our future happiness and misery, and the conditions on which alone the one can be obtained, and the other is to be avoided. Now, can a man at the same time believe these are the greatest blessings that he can enjoy, and yet prefer a lesser good before them? if not, whenever he doth this, he ceases in effect to have this faith. Can a man fully be persuaded, that what he is about to do, will render him obnoxious to the worst of evils, and yet be moved to do it to avoid a lesser evil? if not, whenever he doth choose to do what renders him obnoxious to the worst of evils, he ceaseth to believe they are so. When therefore we neglect to do that which is by our Lord declared absolutely necessary to obtain and to secure our eternal interests, and venture upon that to which he threateneth everlasting misery, it is certain that we have no lively full persuasion of these truths then present to our minds, and therefore do not actually believe them then. So that although we may have still such an habitual assent to all that this great Prophet hath delivered, as that we do not doubt the truth of what he taught: yet doth not Christ "dwell in our hearts by faith," nor have we any living sense or permanent persuasion of these truths on our souls, but faith is at the present dead, and so no more deserves the name of faith than a dead man can properly be called a man. Thus, for example, when Christ saith to his disciples fearing to perish in the storm, "How is it that ye have not faith?" (Mark iv. 40,) he lays this to their charge, not that they disbelieved his power to save them, for this they testify, by saying, "Master, save us;" but they did not actually exert this trust by an entire commission of themselves to the protection of his providence. As therefore, when we do what is contrary to our love to God, or to our hope, and our affiance in him, there always is a want of love and hope and trust in God: so when we do what is opposite to the great objects of our faith, there must be in us a like want of faith; and so when this is customarily done, there must be a defect as to the habit, or the grace of faith.

Secondly, This will be still more evident, if we consider all the glorious things which are ascribed in scripture to this faith, and do compare them with other passages of the same scripture: for instance, "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God," saith the apostle John, 1 Epist. v. 1; but then he adds in the same chapter, "Whosoever is born of God overcometh the world," ver. 5, by virtue of this faith: and again, "We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and the wicked one toucheth him not," ver. 18, iii. 9. Whence it must follow, that he believeth not in the apostle's sense, that "Jesus is the Christ," who overcometh not, by virtue of that faith, the temptations of the world the flesh, and the devil. "Whosoever confesseth," saith the same apostle, "that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God" (1 John iv. 15), but then he also saith, "He that abideth in him ought also to walk as he walked," 1 John ii. 6, that we do hereby "know that we are in him, by keeping of his word," ver. 5, that "whosoever abideth in him sinneth not, and he that sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him; that if we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie:" so that if this faith doth not preserve us from sin, and engage us to walk in the light, and as he walked, it is not that faith in the Son of God the apostle speaks of. We are not "justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus," saith Paul to the Galatians, Gal. v. 6, vi. 15; but then it is, saith he, that "faith which works by love," and renders us "new creatures." The same he saith in the Epistle to the Romans, declaring that his gospel was "the power of God through faith unto salvation," Rom. i. 16, ver. 5; but then it is "the obedience of faith," in the same chapter; "obedience in word and deed," xv. 18, "obeying from the heart the form of doctrine delivered to them," vi. 16, which makes this faith become the power of God to salvation. Whence it is evident that he esteemed that alone true faith which was productive of obedience, and so doth virtually, although not formally, include obedience, as the effect is virtually contained in the cause: so that the difference between men of judgment, as to saving faith, is more in words than sense, they all designing the same thing, that we cannot be saved by that faith which doth not produce in us a sincere obedience to the laws of Christ.

FOREGOING PREFACE

TO THE

EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.*

One passage in the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians hath met with very hard usage from different hands; but more especially from one who styles his book, "The Preacher," but gives full demonstration that he is no Solomon. His words are these, p. 153,† "And can we imagine that that other author hath a better opinion of the writings of the New Testament, who tells us, that 'in all the scriptures of the New Testament, there is not to be found one exhortation to believe in Christ, or to act faith on Christ?' and accordingly he adds afterward; 'Now what account can be given of this thing by those who are so zealous in their sermons to exhort Christians to believe in Christ, and are so full of motives to persuade them so to do?' It seems we have been in a great error and mistake hitherto; and all our sermons to our Christian auditors, to persuade them to exert faith in our Lord Christ, have been idle and vain; and the more zealous we have been in this matter, the more foolish we have been; for Christians are nowhere exhorted in the New Testament to believe in Christ; they are only unconverted Jews and gentiles who are called upon to do this." And such were the apostles and disciples, when our Saviour exhorted them to believe in God, and to believe also in him: "who sees not that is abusing the scriptures?" Now here,

First, Sure I have reason to complain of very hard measure, and of great injustice, that after all the pains I have taken to prove this proposition, That the apostles and evangelists indited these scriptures by the assistance of the Holy Ghost;* and that, therefore, I allow no slips of memory, no rules of human prudence, without the guidance and direction of the Holy Spirit, §. 3, I should be publicly traduced as one, that "cannot be imagined to have a better opinion of the writings of the New Testament," than one who asserts, that "there are several repugnances in several parts of it; that it is altered in very many places, and some of the greatest moment; and hath too many disagreements, which are material and weighty."† How far I am from thinking any thing of this nature, how zealous in my opposition to such sentiments, the world will shortly farther see. And, that the words here cited by the Preacher have no relation to, and contain no detraction either from the authority or veneration due to that inspired book, is evident to all discerning persons: such vile and scandalous suggestions, without all ground or show of reason, is that of which I hope I never shall be guilty.

Secondly, I add, that the assertion here exposed, as "a visible abuse of scripture," is as certain and demonstrable as any proposition in the book of Euclid. Thus,

Definition. A Christian is one that believes in Christ; nor can he cease to do so whilst he is a Christian; as a man cannot cease to have a human nature whilst he lives.

Postulatum. It cannot be consistent with the wisdom of the Holy Ghost, or of the holy scripture, to exhort any Christian to do what he knows every Christian must do, and cannot choose to do, any more than a living man can cease to have a human nature.

Ergo. It cannot be consistent with the wisdom of the Holy Ghost to exhort any Christian to believe in Christ; this being the same in effect as to exhort a living man to retain his human nature during life.

Thirdly, To the argument of the Preacher, from John xix. 1, I have returned a full reply in my answer to a late pamphlet, p. 20—23, to which I add, that it is not certain that these words contain any exhortation to believe in Christ; even the Synopsis informs us, that they may be rendered in the indicative mood thus, Creditis in Deum, et me creditis: in which sense they contain no exhortation, but an assertion only of this great truth, that the disciples of Christ believed in God the Father, and in Christ his only Son; and from that faith had ground of comfort under all the troubles they should meet with in the world.

Fourthly, Had he not changed my words, he would have had no show of ground for his vain imagination, that I count it "a great error to persuade Christians to exert faith in our Lord Christ." Now this I nowhere say, but only that there is no exhortation in the New Testament to any Christian to believe in Christ, or (in the sense of the presbyterians, and independents, against whom I there dispute) to "act faith on Christ;" to exert that faith we have in Christ, by showing forth the fruits of it, and walking answerably to it, and comforting and supporting ourselves from the consideration of it; and the encouraging ourselves to the performance of all Christian obedience, is the duty of all Christians, to which I there say the scripture doth exhort them; but to act faith on Christ for justification, or that Christians may be believers, which is the sense those writers put upon the phrase, is an unscriptural expression.

In fine, it might have reasonably been expected, that after all these hideous outcries, after these terrible accusations, that by this assertion I have visibly abused the holy scriptures, and made it unimaginable that I have any good opinion of the writings of the New Testament, some plain text should have been produced from those scriptures exhorting those, who were already Christians, to believe in Christ; and though I judge my assertion a truth, equally certain to a demonstration, yet when either the Preacher or the Pamphleteer, or any other bold condemner of it, shall show the contrary by one plain text containing such an exhortation, I promise to renounce it publicly.

CHAPTER I.

1 (I) PAUL, (who am) an apostle,[1] (not of men, neither by man (for I received not my call or my commission to that office from man, nor was I chosen to it by man, as Matthias was), but by Jesus Christ (appearing to me in person for that end, that he might send me to the gentiles, Acts xxii. 21, xxvi. 16, 17), and God the Father, (who chose me that I should know his will, and see that Just One, and be his witness to all men of what I had seen and heard, Acts xxii. 14, 15, and revealed his Son to me, ver. 13, even that God) who raised him from the dead;)

2 [2] And all the brethren which are with me (and own the doctrine which I preach, send greeting) unto the churches of Galatia:

3 (Wishing that) Grace (may) be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ,

4 Who gave himself (an expiatory sacrifice) for our sins,[3] that he might deliver us from (the wrath and condemnation of, or from conformity to,) this present evil world,[4] according to the will of God and our Father (Gr. of our God and Father):

5 To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed[5] from him that called you into[6] the grace of Christ unto another gospel:

7 Which (whatsoever some may suggest, who preach another thing, under the special title of the gospel) [7] is not (indeed) another (gospel, nor would be so esteemed by any of you); but (that) there be some that trouble you (with false stories), and would pervert the gospel of Christ (by mixing with it the necessary observance of the law of Moses).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. Οὐκ ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων, οὐδὲ δι' ἀνθρώπου, Not of man, neither by man.] It is no objection against the truth of these words, that the Holy Ghost, saying by the prophets at Antioch, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul to the work of the ministry, to which I have called them," they fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, and sent them away (Acts xiii. 2, 3): for that this was not a mission to the apostolical office, appears, because Paul, at least nine years before, was immediately called to it by God, and sent to exercise it by Jesus Christ; and because Barnabas is here equally separated to this office, and sent with him, who yet was never an apostle properly so called. This separation and mission therefore of them was only by way of prayer and benediction of them in their ministry; or by way of special commission to preach in the synagogues of the Jews (ver. 5). And this mission they presently completed, and then returned to Antioch, declaring to them what they had done in pursuance of it (Acts xiv. 26, 27).

[2] Ver. 2. Καὶ οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ πάντες ἀδελφοὶ, And all the brethren that are with me.] It is the conjecture of the reverend Dr. Hammond, that the word "brethren" here denotes those that accompanied St. Paul in his travels, and assisted him in preaching the gospel; in which sense Sosthenes is called "a brother," 1 Cor. i. 1, as also Apollos, 1 Cor. xvi. 12, Timothy, 2 Cor. i. 1, Titus, ii. 12, Tychicus, Eph. vi. 23, Epaphroditus, Phil. ii. 25, Onesimus, Col. iv. 9, Sylvanus, 1 Pet. v. 12, Paul, 2 Pet. iii. 15. And in this sense the word "brethren" seems to be distinguished from that of "saints," Phil. iv. 21; and mention is made of the "brother whose praise is in the gospel," 2 Cor. viii. 18, of Titus, Paul's "fellow-worker;" of the brethren who are the "apostles of the church," and of the brethren who, for his name's sake, went forth to preach the gospel, "taking nothing of the gentiles," 3 John 3. 7, or else it may be said, that the apostle writes according to the form of epistles, used in the beginning of Christianity, when bishops sent to other churches, not in their own names only, but in the names of the whole church where they resided: so Clemens* begins his epistle to the church of Corinth thus, "The church of God in Rome, to the church of God at Corinth;" and so this epistle being writ from Rome, shows the consent of that church with him in his doctrine.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἵνα ἐξέληται ἡμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ ἐνεστῶτος αἰῶνος πονηροῦ, That he might deliver us from this present evil world.] That "this present evil age" should signify "the present Jewish constitution and nation together," is very improbable: for did Christ die for our sins, to deliver the Galatians and other gentiles from the Jewish nation, or from that constitution they were never under? How much more natural is it to say, with the fathers, he died for our sins, that he might deliver us ἐκ τῶν πονηρῶν πράξεων καὶ διεφθαρμένης ζωῆς, "from the evil actions and corrupt manners of this present world," or age; from those lusts of the flesh, and that corruption of mind, in which the heathens formerly lived, κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, "according to that course of life" the men of the world then led (Eph. ii. 2, 3), when they were guided by the wisdom, τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, "of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4), and under the power of the rulers, τοῦ σκότους τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, "of the darkness of this world" (Eph. vi. 12).

[4] Κατὰ τὸ Θέλημα τοῦ Θεοῦ, According to the will of God.] These words may refer to our deliverance, ἐκ τῶν πονηρῶν πράξεων καὶ τῆς διεφθαρμένης ζωῆς, Œcum., from the evil manners of this world; this being "the will of God, even our sanctification" (1 Thess. iv. 3), and the great end of our Lord's salutary passion, "who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works; and bare our sins in his body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, might live to righteousness" (1 Pet. ii. 24, 2 Cor. v. 15, Eph. v. 25, 26): whence it is evident that Christ's inherent righteousness is not imputed to us; for sure he died not to this end, that we might do ourselves what he already had done for us, and so what he had made it needless for us to do. Or else these words may be connected thus; Christ gave himself for us according to the will of God, viz. that he should die for our sins; and then the apostle here asserts, in opposition to the Judaizing Christians, that our justification by faith in Christ's death is according to the will of God, and that he died in pursuance of his decree to establish that new covenant in his blood by faith, by which we are translated from that wrath and state of alienation from God in which the world lies, and have obtained peace with God, and are become his church and people.

[5] Ver. 6. Ἀπὸ τοῦ καλέσαντος ὑμᾶς, From him that called you.] i. e. From God: for the apostle scarce ever ascribes this work to himself, but constantly to God the Father: see Rom. ix. 24, 1 Cor. vii. 15, Gal. i. 15, 1 Thess. ii. 12, iv. 7, v. 24, 2 Thess. ii. 14, 2 Tim. i. 9.

[6] Ἐν χάριτι Χριστοῦ, To the grace of Christ.] Or rather, "by," or "through, the grace of Christ" offered you in the gospel; for though ἐν be often put for εἰς, yet ἐν χάριτι, where it is elsewhere used, doth either signify, "in the grace," or "through the grace," as Rom. v. 15, 2 Cor. i. 12, 2 Thess. ii. 16, 2 Tim. ii. 1; nor do I find where it is ever used in the epistles for εἰς χάριν.

[7] Ver. 7. Ὃ οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλο.] These words cannot signify, "Which is not any thing else;" or, "Which is not owing to any thing else," as one here thinks: for the pronoun ὅ hath no other antecedent but ἕτερον εὐαγγέλιον, ver. 6. Nor is it any objection against our translation that the apostle doth not say, ὃ οὐκ ἔστιν ἕτερον, as before, but ἄλλο; it being noted by Budæus and others, that the Greeks use, ἄλλο καὶ ἕτερον ἐκ παραλλήλου, these two words as equivalent: and when two ἄλλος come together, the second is always rendered, ἕτερος, "another;" ἄλλος τρὸς ἄλλον λέγοντες, "Saying one to another," Acts ii. 12, xxi. 34; so ἄλλη σὰρξ ἀνθρώπων, ἄλλη δὲ

* Ἡ ἐκκλησία Θεοῦ ἡ παροικοῦσα Ῥώμην τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ Θεοῦ παροικούσῃ Κόρινθον.

8 But (whatsoever they suggest to you of another gospel, taught by Peter, James, and John,) though we (apostles), or (even) an angel from heaven, (should) preach any other gospel unto you than that which we (Paul and Barnabas) have preached unto you, let him be accursed.

9 (And that ye may not think this proceeds rashly from me, but may the more regard it,) As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received (from us), [8] let him be accursed.

10 (But this you cannot reasonably suspect concerning me,) For do I now (in the execution of my apostleship) [9] persuade (obey, or seek to please) men, or God? [10] or κήνων, "There is one flesh of men, and another flesh of beasts," &c. 1 Cor. xv. 31; and again, ver. 41. The apostle's meaning then is, that the preaching of the gospel to you, παρ' ὃ εὐαγγελισάμεθα, "besides that which we have preached," would be the preaching of another gospel: but that which these perverters of the Galatians taught as such, was not indeed another gospel, but rather a setting up of the law in opposition to the gospel. Note also, that εἰ μὴ here is used as ii. 16, 1 Cor. vii. 17, Rev. ix. 4. 21. 27.

[8] Ver. 9. Ἀνάθεμα ἔστω, Let him be anathema.] Hence it follows, (1.) that the doctrine of justification by faith, as it stands opposed to the contrary doctrine of the necessity of the observance of the Mosaical law to justification, is a fundamental doctrine, to which he that opposeth himself, maintaining the necessity of observing the law of Moses to that end, deserveth an anathema, as introducing another gospel: whence commentators here observe, that the apostle calls not the Galatians "saints," because they had begun to decline from the gospel, by seeking thus to be justified by the law; but speaks of them as those who had Christ yet to be formed in them, and who were to be "born again," iv. 19.

(2.) Hence it appears, that a man may err fundamentally, not only by rejecting a fundamental article of faith, but also by maintaining and teaching in the name of Christ things unnecessary to be necessary, so as to say, salvation cannot be obtained without them: and herein consists the great guilt of the church of Rome, and particularly of the Trent council, that they have added many unnecessary articles to the Christian creed, and have defined them to be so necessary to be believed by all Christians, that no salvation can be obtained without the belief of them: and so they seem plainly to have fallen under the anathema of St. Paul, more dreadful than all the vain anathemas they have thundered out against the protestants.

Mr. Obadiah Walker and Grotius note, that the apostle speaks here only of doctrines contrary to his gospel; but this exposition is (1.) contrary to the very words of the apostle, who saith not "against," but παρ' ἃ, "besides what I have delivered:" and it is contrary to the exposition of the fathers,* Chrysostom, Œcumenius, among the Greeks, and Austin among the Latins, whose note is this: "He saith not, If they preach things contrary, but, If they preach things never so little different from the gospel which I have preached to you." It is very true, as Esthius suggests, that the apostle doth not pretend to propound an anathema against any man who shall suggest any thing farther in confirmation of Christ's gospel, as John after did, or give any farther rules pursuant to the precepts of it, by the suggestion of that Spirit by which the gospel was indited, for then he would have pronounced an anathema upon all that writ after him, and even upon himself, who writ many epistles after this; but yet he pronounceth an anathema upon all those who preached a gospel which differed from the gospel which they preached, to whom alone it was by Christ committed to propound the terms of salvation; and this is that of which we do accuse the church of Rome, that they propound terms of salvation nowhere delivered by Christ or his apostles.

Secondly, This exposition of Mr. Walker will not free them from the anathema of the apostle; for by this very thing, that they add any thing to the gospel of Christ as necessary to be believed, or done to salvation, they do no less oppose the doctrine of the apostle, than they did who joined the observation of the law of Moses, as necessary to the faith of Christ: for therefore did they oppose his doctrine, because they teaching this was needful to salvation, did thereby teach, that what the apostle had taught as sufficient to salvation, was not so without their additions, which is the very thing the papists do by their new articles and traditionary doctrines, for if they be indeed necessary to salvation, what is delivered in the gospel, in which confessedly some of their doctrines are not, cannot be sufficient to salvation. Moreover, it is extremely evident, that prayer in unknown tongue is plainly contrary to the apostle's doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv., and that communion in one kind is opposite both to Christ's institution, and to Paul's discourse upon that sacrament, 1 Cor. xi.

[9] Ver. 10. Πείθειν, To persuade.] The critics here observe, that the word πείθειν signifies to pacify and appease any one incensed against us. So when David's soldiers, hunted and harassed by Saul, were earnest, when they found Saul in the cave, that they might have liberty to slay him, ἔπεισε Δαβὶδ τοὺς ἄνδρας αὐτοῦ ἐν λόγοις, "David pacified his men with words," 1 Sam. xxiv. 7. So, to induce the soldiers to own that Christ's body was stolen away by his disciples from the sepulchre whilst they slept, the chief priests and elders promise, that if this come to the governor's ear, πείσομεν αὐτὸν, "we will appease him," Matt. xxviii. 14. And Menelaus promised Ptolemy to give him much money, πρὸς τὸ πείσαι τὸν βασιλέα, "if he would pacify the king towards him," 2 Macc. iv. 5. Or (2.) the word may signify to obey; for so the word is used by Paul in this epistle, when he says, "Who hath bewitched you, τῇ ἀληθείᾳ μὴ πείθεσθαι, that you should not obey the truth?" iii. 1, and, "Ye did run well, who hindered you, τῇ ἀληθείᾳ μὴ πείθεσθαι, that you should not obey the truth?" v. 7, and elsewhere: so τοῖς ἀπειθοῦσι μὲν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, πειθομένοις δὲ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ, "To those who obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness," Rom. ii. 8, πείθεσθε τοῖς ἡγουμένοις, "Obey your governors," Heb. xiii. 17 (see also Acts v. 36, 37, James iii. 3). And so is the word often used by heathen authors when they treat of moral subjects: so Plato* saith, philosophy "compels the irrational affections to obey reason," and introduceth Socrates† saying, πείσομαι τῷ Θεῷ μᾶλλον ἢ ὑμῖν, "I will obey God rather than you." Plutarch‡ saith, "It is the same thing, ἕπεσθαι Θεῷ, καὶ τὸ πείσεσθαι λόγῳ, to follow God, and obey reason." So Arrian,§ "This is to be placed among the highest pleasures, ὅτι πείσῃ τῷ Θεῷ, that thou obeyest God; I am free, and the friend of God, ἵν' ἑκὼν πείθωμαι αὐτῷ, that I might willingly obey him. I know to whom I ought to be subject, τινὶ πείθεσθαι, τῷ Θεῷ καὶ τοῖς μετ' ἐκεῖνον, and to obey God, and those that are next to him." And Zeno, "That it is fit, τὸ πείθεσθαι παῖδας τοῖς παιδαγωγοῖς, that children should obey their masters" (Diog. Laert. lib. vii. p. 432). So then the import of these words is this: Do I in preaching the gospel act in obedience to men, who every where persecute me and oppose me for it, or in obedience to that God who called me to be an apostle of the gentiles? (ver. 15, 16.) And this sense is confirmed by the verse following.

[10] Mr. Clerc here is positive that πείθω signifies only to persuade; whereas the lexicographers say expressly,‖ Tria significat pareo, morem gero, suadeo, persuadeo. So Hesy-do I seek to please men? (no sure,) for if I yet pleased men (if I made that my business), [11] I should not be the servant of Christ (in that work of the gospel which creates me so much hazard from them).

11 But (however others may lessen my gospel) I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me (i. e. by me to you and others) is not after man.

12 [12] For I neither received it of man (as the Jews do their traditions from their fathers), neither was I taught it, but by the (immediate) [13] revelation of Jesus Christ.

13 And of this you may be farther satisfied from my former conversation, and my deportment since I began to preach the faith of Christ:) For (doubtless) ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, (which was such) how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it (Acts viii. 3, ix. 1. 13, 14, xxii. 4, xxvi. 10, 11):

14 And profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation (or above many Jews of the same age with me), being more exceedingly zealous (than they were) [14] of the traditions of my fathers.

15 (Thus, I say; was my conversation in times past;) But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb (as he had formerly done Jeremiah, to be a prophet of the nations, i. 5), and (after) called me by his grace (to preach the gospel, Acts xxii. 14),

16 To reveal his Son [15] in (to) me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not [16] with flesh and blood (i. e. with any man so as to receive any mission from them to that work, or any instructions how to perform it):

17 Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me (as, if I had wanted either authority or instruction, I should have done); but I went (from Damascus, the place of my conversion) into [17] Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus (preaching the gospel there).

18 Then after three years (of my conversion) I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days.

19 But [18] other of the apostles saw I none, save chius, πείθω σε τόδε τὸ πράγμα, "I obey thee in this thing;" and πείθομαί σοὶ τοῦτο, saith Stephanus, ought to be rendered, pareo tibi in hâc re, or, pareo consilio tuo in hâc re. And whereas he fancies an ellipsis of μὴ ἀγανακτεῖν μοι, "not to be displeased with me;" making the sense to run thus, For do I now persuade men, or God, not to be displeased with me? he is still out; for who can see either any connexion of these with the former words, or any force in the apostle's reason, according to this strained sense? "If any man," saith he, "preach any other gospel than that which ye have received from us, let him be anathema" (ver. 9): for do I in preaching this gospel obey men or God? saith our interpretation, making both the connexion clear, and the reason strong; seeing God could not command him to preach one gospel and others another. "Let him be anathema," saith Mr. Clerc, "for do I now persuade God not to be displeased with me?" where, let him that can, show either reason or connexion. Secondly, how could Paul say, he did not persuade men not to be displeased with him, when in this epistle he so often doth it, saying, "Brethren, I beseech you be as I am," iv. 12; "Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?" ver. 16; "From henceforth let no man trouble me," vi. 17 (see v. 11). And, thirdly, why should he tell the Galatians he persuaded God not to be displeased with him, when he was so honestly discharging his office, that he knew nothing of insincerity by himself in the execution of it (1 Cor. iv. 4), and surely had no mind to give them any reason to suspect he had displeased him.

Ἢ ζητῶ ἀνθρώποις ἀρέσκειν;] These words, which Dr. Mills saith crept in from the margin, are owned by all the Greek scholiasts, by the Vulgar, the Cod. Alexandrinus, Hilarius Diac. and Jerome (see Examen Millii in locum).

[11] Χριστοῦ δοῦλος οὐκ ἂν ἤμην, I should not be the servant of Christ.] That is, say the Greek commentators, I should not have left Judaism to embrace Christianity; i. e. I should not have quitted honour, friends, and kindred, for dangers, persecutions, and dishonours, which I continually suffer for the cause of Christ. And this exposition is confirmed from those words, "If I preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution, since then is the offence of the cross ceased?" v. 11, and from this account, that others preached up circumcision only "lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ," vi. 12.

[12] Ver. 12. Οὐ παρ' ἀνθρώπου, I received it not by man.] In the first verse he saith, he was not an apostle by man, "but by Jesus Christ:" here, that he was not taught his gospel by man, but "by Jesus Christ;" whence Chrysostom, Theodoret, Jerome, Œcumenius, and Theophylact conclude, that our Lord was not only man, but God; and so Novatian (ch. xiii.) argued before the Nicene council, "If Paul was not constituted an apostle of, or by man, and yet was constituted such by Jesus Christ, meritò Christus est Deus, Christ must be God: for though the scripture sometimes calleth magistrates and judges gods, as Crellius here notes, it never saith, that what was done by them was not done by man. Crellius adds farther, that our Lord, being the only-begotten Son of God, and having now obtained his celestial kingdom, was exempted from the common rank of men; "and from the state of mortal men," saith Grotius: and so the apostle might speak of him not as a man, as Samson saith of himself, "If they bind me with wreaths I shall be as a man" (Judg. xvi. 7. 11. 17), but כאחד אדם, "as one man;" i. e. as weak as one man only, or having no more strength than another man. Crellius therefore hath not said any thing apposite in answer to this argument: nor doth the apostle here oppose man to man, or mortal man to those blessed spirits who are immortal, but only to Jesus Christ and God the Father.

[13] Δι' ἀποκαλύψεως, By revelation.] At what time this revelation was made to him is uncertain, but it is probable it must be before he went to preach the gospel to the gentiles; for the words following, "I consulted not with flesh and blood, but preached at Damascus," seem plainly to imply this revelation was made to him before he preached there, or went to Jerusalem.

[14] Ver. 14. Τῶν πατρικῶν παραδόσεων, Of the traditions of my fathers.] He being a pharisee, and speaking of the traditions not of the law, but of the fathers, seems to mean the oral traditions that sect so highly magnified, even above the law and the prophets (see note on Mark vii. 3, Acts xxvii. 17). Now there is reason to believe, that a man so exceeding zealous for the religion of the Jews, and so full of hatred to that of Christians would not have renounced a religion he had so great a reverence for, to embrace that he was so incensed against, without some more than human motive.

[15] Ver. 16. Ἐν ἐμοί, To me.] So ὁ λαλῶν ὁ ἐν ἐμοί, "He that speaketh to me shall be a barbarian," 1 Cor. i. 11 (see Mark i. 15, Acts iv. 12, 1 Cor. ix. 15, 2 Cor. iv. 3, viii 1).

[16] Σαρκὶ καὶ αἵματι, With flesh and blood]. This phrase in scripture and among Jewish writers is only a periphrasis for man, as Matt. xvi. 17, 1 Cor. xv. 20, Eph. vi. 12, Heb. ii. 14, Ecclus. xiv. 18, and so all other interpretations of it must be alien from the scope of the apostle.

[17] Ver. 17. Εἰς Ἀραβίαν, Into Arabia.] Of this journey into Arabia, St. Luke, not being with him, saith nothing.

[18] Ver. 19. Ἕτερον τῶν ἀποστόλων, Other of the apostles.] Hence it appears,

First, That only Peter and James were then at Jerusalem, for Barnabas brought him to the apostles that were there (Acts ix. 27).

Secondly, That James, the Lord's brother, was an apostle in the strict and proper sense of the word, since Peter, who is mentioned with him, was doubtless so, and Barnabas, who brought him to Peter and James, is said to bring him to the apostles: and Peter, James, and John, who are here called the "men of reputation," and "pillars of the church," ii. 6. 9, seem plainly to be the same persons who, in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians are called λίαν ἀπό

James the Lord's brother (and therefore could not learn my gospel from them).

20 Now (of the truth of) the things which I write unto you (you may rest assured, for), [19] behold, before God, I lie not.

21 Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria (i. e. to Cæsarea, Acts xxii. 17, 18) and Cilicia (to Troas, Acts ix. 30, xxii. 3, in Asia Minor);

22 And was (all the while) unknown by face unto the churches of Judæa which were in Christ:

23 But they had heard only, That he which persecuted us (Christians) in times past now preacheth the faith [20] which once he destroyed.

24 [21] And they glorified God (for the conversion he had wrought) in me.

στολοι, "the chief of the apostles:" and Origen* saith expressly of James the Just, "This is that James whom Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians saith he saw," citing these very words for the proof of it. See this confirmed in the preface to the Epistle of James. Note, Thirdly, That the apostle's argument is to this effect, Having therefore preached the gospel so long before I saw them, and staying so little while with them, and going then only to see, not to learn of them, it cannot be conceived I should receive my instructions how to preach the gospel from them.

Note also, that Nicephorus† saith, this James was τοῦ μνήστορος τοῦ Ἰωσὴφ παῖς, "the son of Joseph, the husband of the mother of our Lord."

[19] Ver. 20. Ἰδοὺ ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, Behold, before God.] Hence it is evident that the apostle, when it was necessary to confirm the truth of the gospel, or of his commission to, or his sincerity in preaching it, i. e. when the benefit of souls required him thus to attest to men, what otherwise they could not be assured of, refused not to swear, and so esteemed not our Saviour's prohibition of an oath to be absolute (see Rom. i. 2, ix. 1, 2 Cor. i. 23, xi. 31, 1 Thess. ii. 5, see the note on 2 Cor. i. 23).

[20] Ver. 23. Ἦν ποτε ἐπόρθει.] See this reading vindicated, Examen Millii in locum.

[21] Ver. 24.] This testimony of the Jewish Christians was a confirmation of his doctrine; for if they could have found any just exceptions against it, they would not have glorified God for his preaching of it.

CHAPTER II.

Then [1] fourteen years after (my first journey thither) I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also (though uncircumcised, to show the liberty I took of conversing with persons not circumcised).

2 And I [2] went up by revelation, and communicated unto them (at Jerusalem) that gospel which I preach (every where) among the Gentiles, but (this I did) [3] privately to them which were of reputation, (or the chief men there; not that I distrusted my doctrine, or needed their instructions, but) lest by any means (or false suggestions of the Judaizers, that my doctrine was con-

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Διὰ δεκατεσσάρων ἐτῶν, Fourteen years after.] I cannot assent to those critics who, for ἐκατεσσάρων, "fourteen," would read τεσσάρων, "four years after;" for not only all the manuscript copies and versions read "fourteen," but Irenæus, lib. iii. cap. 13, doth confirm this reading in these words: "Then after fourteen years I went up to Jerusalem, &c. If any man carefully examine, by the Acts of the Apostles, the time mentioned of his ascent to Jerusalem for the question aforesaid, he will find the years agreeing with those mentioned by Paul." Now these years must be reckoned from the time of his conversion, mentioned here, i. 18, which happened in the year of our Lord 35, his journey to Peter was A. D. 38, and then between that and the council of Jerusalem, assembled anno Christi 49, will be fourteen intervening years; for whereas some reckon these fourteen years from the third year of his conversion to the council met at Jerusalem, and so make that council meet anno Domini 52, because it is said here, ἔπειτα "afterward," and πάλιν ἀνέβην, "I went up again;" it may be answered, that the word ἔπειτα, "afterward," doth not connect these words with the three years mentioned i. 18, as is evident, because there follows another ἔπειτα, "afterward," ver. 21, nor doth πάλιν ἀνέβην, "I went up again," relate to his first journey to Jerusalem, mentioned i. 18, for he had been twice at Jerusalem; three years after his conversion to see Peter, and nine years after that to carry alms to the brethren at Jerusalem (Acts xi. 30), though, seeing then none of the apostles, he makes no mention of that journey here, as being nothing to his purpose (see Dr. Pearson's Annal. Paulin. p. 8, 9): so that whereas he had said, i. 18, that "three years after" my conversion "I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter," he saith here, "and fourteen years after it I went up again." Now, that the apostle here speaks of the journey to Jerusalem mentioned Acts xv. will appear,

First, From the agreement of what he here relates with what then happened, as that he "communicated to them the gospel, which he preached among the gentiles," ver. 2, as he then did. Acts xv. 4, that circumcision was not then judged necessary to the gentiles, ver. 3, as we find, Acts xv. 24, that "when they saw the gospel of uncircumcision was committed to him, they gave to him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship," ver. 9, as then they did, sending their very decree, with one consent, to the gentiles, "by the hands of Paul and Barnabas," Acts xv. 22. 25, who were received by the "whole church," ver. 4, and styled "beloved," ver. 25.

Secondly, It seems not likely that the apostle, writing this epistle about nine years after the decree of that council, should make no mention of a thing so advantageous to the cause he is pleading here, and so proper to confute the pretences of the adversaries he disputes against. And Thirdly, James, Peter, and John, being all the apostles that were present at the council then held at Jerusalem, the mention of their consent to his doctrine and practice was all that was necessary to his purpose to be mentioned concerning that council. It is no objection against this opinion, that we find no mention, Acts xv., of Titus's being with him; for he is not mentioned in the whole book of the Acts, during which interval this journey must have happened.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἀνέβην κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, I went up by revelation.] Made to the apostle, saith Dr. Hammond, to comply with this determination of the church of Antioch; made to the prophets of the church of Antioch, to send them, saith Dr. Lightfoot, which I do not gainsay. But the apostle doth not say he went up, δι' ἀποκαλύψεως, "by revelation," but κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, "according to revelation:" now he had said before he received not his doctrine or gospel by men, or of men, "but by the revelation of Jesus Christ;" and here he may be supposed to add, that in his journey he acted suitably to the revelation which constituted him the apostle of the gentiles; telling the church of Jerusalem what things he had done among the gentiles in pursuance of it, not inquiring what they did, but declaring what God did by him, not permitting Titus, a Greek, to be circumcised, "not giving place for an hour" to the "false brethren," &c.

[3] Κατ' ἰδίαν δὲ τοῖς δοκοῦσι, Privately to them of reputation.] Not that his doctrine might be confirmed by the concurrence of Peter, or others with him in it, as Esthius from Jerome and Austin here suggests; for sure that doctrine, which he received by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ and God trary to what they who were called before me preached, and such as they would not own) I should run (hereafter), or had run (hitherto), in vain.

3 But (even then was nothing done by me, which showed any change in my doctrine or practice, or any opposition made by them to it; for) neither Titus, who was (then) with me, being a Greek, was (upon that account) compelled to be circumcised (as they would have contended he should, had they thought circumcision necessary to the gentiles):

4 And that (which concerns the bringing and retaining Titus with me uncircumcised was done) [4] because of false brethren (who came down to Antioch, Acts xv. 1) unawares brought in (Gr. introduced into the assembly, Acts xv. 5, or insinuating themselves into the church of Antioch, ver. 1), who came in privily to spy out (Gr. to ensnare us in) our liberty (from the observance of the Jewish law) which we have in (and through) Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage (to it, they pleading for the necessity of circumcising the gentiles, and commanding them to keep the law, Acts xv. 1):

5 [5] To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour (by submission to their demands, but continued firm to our resolution, not to subject the gentiles to this yoke of bondage); that the truth of the gospel (of Christ, which frees the gentiles from the obligation of the law) might continue with (or among) you.

6 But of these who seemed to be somewhat, (whatsoever they were (or, but whatsoever they were who seemed to be somewhat), it maketh no matter to me (their seeming, or their real greatness, affects not my doctrine): God accepteth no man's person:) for they who seemed to be some what in conference added nothing to me (or to my doctrine, nor corrected any thing in it; and so neither am I concerned for their greatness, nor doth God respect them the more upon that account:

7 They added, I say, nothing to my doctrine,) But contrariwise (they approved of it; for) when they saw that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me (and I was authorized to preach to the gentiles), as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter (he being appointed to preach to the Jews:

8 As evidently it was;) (For he that wrought effectually in (with) Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me (Gr. wrought also in me) toward the Gentiles:) (Rom. xv. 19:)

9 [6] And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars (of the church), perceived the grace (of God) that was given unto me (for the apostolic office), they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; (concluding) that we should (still) go (on to preach) unto the heathen, and they (should still continue preaching) unto the circumcision.

10 [7] Only they would that we should remember the poor (Christians in Judea); the same which (Gr. which same thing) I also was forward to do.

the Father, needed no farther confirmation from the authority of man; but only to obviate the cavils of those who laboured to hinder the effect of his gospel, by suggesting that it was contrary to, or disowned by, those apostles who were called before him.

[4] Ver. 4. Διὰ τοὺς ψευδαδέλφους. Because of false brethren.] These false brethren, saith Epiphanius,* were Cerinthus, and those of his party.

Διὰ δὲ, &c.] Here also it seems necessary to supply the sense from the first verse thus; συμπαρέλαβον δὲ Τίτον διὰ τοὺς ψευδαδέλφους; "And I took with me Titus, because of the false brethren." Examples of the like ellipsis, or deficiency, to be supplied from the precedent words, in the Old Testament, are very numerous; see Glassius de Figuris Grammaticis, lib. iv. tract. 2, observ. 11. So Matt. ii. 10, ἰδόντες δὲ τὸν ἀστέρα, "seeing the star," ἑστῶτα ἐπάνω οὗ ἦν τὸ παιδίον, add, "standing over the place where the child was, (ver. 9), they rejoiced." This addition was necessary, because they before saw the star going before them (ver. 9). So John ix. 3, "Neither hath he sinned, nor his parents;" add, from ver. 2, ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ, "that he should be born blind," ἀλλὰ ἵνα, but add again, "he was so born, that the works of God might be made manifest in him;" 1 John ii. 19, "They went out from us, but they (who thus went out) were not of us; for if they had been of us, they might have remained with us," ἀλλ', supply, ἐξῆλθον ἐξ ἡμῶν, "but (they went out from us) that it might appear they all were not of us."

[5] Ver. 5. Οἷς οὐδὲ πρὸς ὥραν εἴξαμεν τῇ ὑποταγῇ.] Here Dr. Mills contends from the authority of the Vulgate, Tertullian, and Hilary the deacon, that οὐδὲ is an addition to the text; though Jerome positively saith, that this was only the reading quorundam Latinorum codicum, reclamantibus Græcis, "of some Latin copies against the authority of the Greek fathers:" see this reading confuted, Examen Millii in locum. And there also, οἱ δοκοῦντες, ver. 6, is proved against the doctor, not to be irreptitious.

Ver. 6. Οἱ ἀπὸ δέ,] As some would read, if not suitable to the Greek idiom; begin the words as you must the construction, ὁποῖοι δέ ποτε ἦσαν ἀπὸ τῶν δοκούντων εἶναί τι, and the sense is plain. But of what quality they were, who seemed to be somewhat, or were of reputation, οὐδέν μοι διαφέρει, I was not the better for it; where note, that the scholiast on Thucydides saith thus, διαφέρει, i. e. ὠφελεῖ, the word signifies "to profit, or be advantageous." Phavorinus and Hesychius say, that it signifies βέλτιον εἶναι, "to be the better;" so that the words may be thus rendered: "It was no advantage to me, I was not the better for it;" and this sense is confirmed by the following reason, "For they who were of reputation added nothing to me."

[6] Ver. 9.] Note, that the beginning of this verse from the Greek runs thus, "And James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars of the church, knowing the grace," &c.

[7] Ver. 10.] Note, that from these four verses, the supremacy of Peter over the rest of the apostles, and the whole church, may be by many arguments refuted. For,

1. James is here mentioned first among the apostles of the circumcision, according to the common doctrine of the ancients, who style him,* "the first bishop, archbishop, prince, and bishop of bishops, τὸν τῆς νέας Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἀρχιστράτηγον, τὸν τῶν ἱερέων ἡγεμόνα, τῶν ἀποστόλων τὸν ἔξαρχον τὴν ἐν κεφαλαῖς κορυφὴν, the chieftain of the new Jerusalem, the leader of the priests, the prince of the apostles, the top of the heads." And this agrees with the ecclesiastical tradition mentioned by Eusebius,† that the brethren and kinsmen of our Lord, whilst they lived, were preferred before other apostles and bishops, and that therefore Peter and John contended not with James, the Lord's brother, but "chose him bishop of Jerusalem, and after his death judged Simeon, his cousin-german, worthy of that see, ὡς ἀπὸ γένους ὄντος τοῦ Κυρίου, as being of the kindred of our Lord."

Secondly, He puts no difference betwixt these "pillars" or "chief of the apostles;" which no more agrees with the supposed supremacy of Peter, than it would with the pope's supremacy to be reckoned among or after some of the cardinals; which as it is never done by them who own the pope's supremacy, so neither would this have been done by Paul, had he owned the supremacy of Peter.

Thirdly, He says the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to him, as was that of the circumcision to Peter, by which words "he shows himself equal to Peter," say the scholiasts.‡ By these words, saith Hilary the deacon, Plena

11 But when Peter was come to Antioch, [8] I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.

12 For before that certain (brethren of the Jews) came from James, he did (freely) eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself (from them), fearing (to exasperate or scandalize) them which were of the circumcision.

13 And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that (even) Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that (in this matter) [9] they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew (one of that nation to which alone the law of Moses was given), livest after the manner of Gentiles (conversing freely with them, and eating of their meats, as, since the vision which thou sawest, thou hast done), and not as do the Jews (abstaining from their meats and persons as unclean), why (now) compellest thou the Gentiles (by thy example) to live as do the Jews?

15 We who are Jews by (birth or) nature, and not [10] sinners of the Gentiles (not idolatrous heathens), 16 Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but (only) by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and (thereby have testified to our conviction, that we could) not (be justified) by the works of the law (as indeed we cannot be): for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

17 [11] But if, while we (thus) seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners (as we must be, if we be still obliged to observe that law we have renounced as unable to justify us), is therefore Christ (who taught us thus to renounce the law, and to seek justification by faith in him) the minister of sin? God forbid (that we should charge this on him.

18 And yet we, by asserting the necessity that the gentiles should observe the law, and so much more the Jews, do in effect say that Christ hath taught us to be sinners;) For if I (thus) build again the things which I destroyed (urging the necessity of observing that law to justification which I declared unable to justify, and therefore renounced for faith in Christ), I make myself a transgressor (by not observing it to that end.

19 But whatsoever others may think fit to do, far be it from me to imitate them,) For I through the law (teaching me that it condemns all men to death, and bearing witness to the justification which is of God by faith, Rom. iii. 21) am (become) dead to (the observance of) the law, that I might (for the future) live unto God (Rom. vii. 4).

20 I am crucified with Christ (and so dead to the law, Rom. vi. 4): nevertheless I live; yet not I (as formerly, a Jew and an observer of the law), but Christ liveth in me (and I am acted by his Spirit: Rom. vii. 6): and the life which I now live (lead) in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

21 I do not frustrate the grace of God (as I should do, did I seek for righteousness by the law): for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain (there being then no necessity that he should die to purchase justification for us, and no sufficient virtue in his death to procure it).

autoritas Petri in prædicatione Judaismi data dignoscitur, et Pauli perfecta autoritas in prædicatione gentilium invenitur. So that then Peter's supremacy was not owned at Rome.

Lastly, "It makes no matter to me," saith he, "what they were;" which sure could not fitly be said of him whom Christ had constituted to be his head and judge.

[8] Ver. 11. Αὐτῷ ἀντέστην, I withstood him, &c.] Quis ergò auderet Petro, primo apostolo—resistere, nisi alius talis qui fiduciâ suæ electionis, sciens se non esse imparem, constanter improbaret quid ille sine consilio fecerat!*

[9] Ver. 14. Οὐκ ὀρθοποδοῦσι πρὸς τὴν ἀλήθειαν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, They walked not uprightly, &c.] By this action Peter is charged with a sinful fear, ver. 13, "not walking uprightly according to the truth of the gospel," ver. 14, with hypocrisy and dissimulation against his own knowledge and practice elsewhere, ver. 13, with "building again what he had pulled down," ver. 18, and with "compelling the gentiles to live as do the Jews." ver. 14; where observe, that he is said to "compel," in scripture, not only who doth violently force, but who, being of authority, provokes by his example, as here; as also they who lay a necessity on others to do any thing, either by their deportment, as the Corinthians who "compelled" Paul to glory, 2 Cor. xii. 11, or by their doctrine, as did the Judaizers, "compelling the gentiles to be circumcised," Gal. vi. 12, and in this sense our Saviour says to his disciples, "Compel them to come in," Luke xiv. 23.

[10] Ver. 15. Ἁμαρτωλοί, Sinners of the gentiles.] This word in the scripture phrase signifies a great and habitual sinner; and because the gentiles were by the Jewish nation still esteemed such, and generally were so, therefore the word is used to denote the gentiles that knew not God. So what is ἐθνικοί, "the heathens," in many copies, Matt. v. 46, 47, is ἁμαρτωλοί, "sinners," Luke vi. 32—34, and to be delivered εἰς χεῖρας τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν, "into the hands of sinners," Matt. xxvi. 45, Mark xiv. 41, is, to be delivered τοῖς ἔθνεσι, "to the gentiles," Matt. xx. 19, Mark x. 33, Luke xviii. 32.

[11] Ver. 17, 18.] This exposition of these two verses, which I have taken from Hilary, and all the Greek scholiasts, seems much better than that of late commentators, who make the seventeenth verse to be an objection against Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, and the eighteenth an answer to it; for which I see no ground in the apostle's words.

Or these words may be paraphrased thus: εἰ γὰρ ἃ κατέλυσα, If the things which (by Christ's authority committed to his apostles, Matt. xvii. 18) I have loosed (by declaring men absolved from the ritual precepts of the law of Moses), I again build up (by teaching they are to be observed), I make myself a transgressor.

CHAPTER III.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Ὦ ἀνόητοι, O foolish, &c.] The apostle, by calling the Galatians "foolish," doth not contradict our Saviour's precept, because he doth it not εἰκῇ, "rashly and without cause," saith Theophylact, nor out of anger and ill-will to them, but from an ardent desire to make them sensible of their folly.

[2] Τίς ὑμᾶς ἐβάσκανε; Who hath bewitched you?] Τίς ἐβάσκανε; "Who hath looked upon you with an evil or envious eye," as envying you the blessings of the gospel? So the Greek scholiasts. The word also signifies, oculis prestigia imponere, "to put delusions," or, as we say, "mists before the eyes," which import suits best with the following words. The reverend Dr. Hammond observes here, that this seduction may refer to the Ebionites, if the time would permit, as doubtless it will; for they were only a branch of the Nazarenes or Cerinthians, who were contemporary with ye should not obey the truth, [3] before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?

2 This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit (in his gifts and powerful operations) by (obedience to) the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? (i. e. the belief of the gospel: if by the latter, this is a manifest token that your justification and acceptance with God was the fruit of your faith, and not of your obedience to the law; since God, by giving you his Spirit whilst uncircumcised, as well as to the believing Jews, bare witness to this very thing, that he puts no difference betwixt you and them on that account, Acts xv. 8, 9.)

3 Are ye (then) so foolish? having (thus) begun in the Spirit (as to receive his miraculous gifts by faith, without the works of the law), are ye now (seeking to be) made perfect by the flesh (by circumcision, and observing the carnal ordinances of the law)?

4 Have ye suffered so many things (from the persecuting Jews, Acts xvii. 5) in vain? [4] if it be yet (or even) in vain.

5 (To reassume my argument:) He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit (in his extraordinary gifts), and [5] worketh miracles among you, doth he it by (virtue of your obedience to) the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? (i. e. that faith which taught you to believe in a crucified Saviour.

6 For we must be justified) Even as Abraham (the father of the faithful was, who) [6] believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.

7 Know ye therefore that they which are of faith (and seek justification by it), the same are the (true) children of (faithful) Abraham.

8 And the (Holy Ghost in) scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, [7] preached before (the giving of the law, and before his circumci-

Paul; and all his epistles show that then there were many who maintained and eagerly promoted, among the gentile converts, the chief doctrine of those sects, viz. "that they were obliged to observe the legal constitution,* as being not capable of salvation only by faith in Christ, and a life agreeable to it." And if this once be granted, there will be no need of his Gnostics in this, and perhaps not in any other of Paul's epistles.

Τῇ ἀληθείᾳ μὴ πείθεσθαι;] These words, saith Jerome, are not extant, in exemplaribus Adamantii, "in the copies of Origen;" but they are extant in the Arabic version, the Vulgar, Hilary the deacon, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact.

I cannot sufficiently wonder at Mr. Le Clerc's wild conjecture, that the Ebionites were Samaritans, especially after he had given us the words of Origen, in which he twice saith, they were οἱ ἀπὸ Ἰουδαίων εἰς τὸν Ἰησοῦν πιστεύοντες, "those of the Jews that believed in Jesus," lib. ii. contr. Cels. p. 56. Had he not read in Irenæus that they did prophetica curiosiùs exponere, et Judaico charactere vitæ uti, et Hierosolymam adorare, quasi domus sit Dei? lib. i. cap. 26. And could the Samaritans do this? doth not St. Jerome say of them, Dum volunt Judæi esse, et Christiani, nec Judæi sunt, nec Christiani? Ep. ad August. Yea, even his own Epiphanius informs us (Hær. x. Anaceph. p. 240), that Ἰουδαῖοι ὄντες, "being Jews," they used the gospel.

[3] Οἷς κατ' ὀφθαλμοὺς Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς προεγράφη, ἐν ὑμῖν ἐσταυρωμένος.] These words may bear this construction, "Before whose eyes Jesus Christ crucified, hath been evidently set forth to, or among you;" viz. in and from the scriptures of the Old Testament; for the words ἐν ὑμῖν are not in the Alexandrian manuscript, and so may be here omitted, or construed with the word προεγράφη; and so they accord both with the context and with the way of preaching used by the apostles, whose custom it was to prove, out of the Old Testament, that "Jesus was the Christ," and that "Christ ought to have suffered for us according to the scriptures" (Acts xvii. 3): and then the argument runs thus, If he died to procure the pardon of our sins, and so our justification, why do we render his death upon the cross vain, by seeking to be justified by the law? He having by his sufferings "blotted out the hand-writing which was against us, and nailed (these ordinances) to the cross, why is it that you, who are dead with Christ from these elements of the world, are still subject to ordinances?" (Eph. ii. 15, 16, Col. ii. 14. 20).

[4] Ver. 4. Εἴ γε καὶ εἰκῇ, If it be in vain.] As it must be upon your hypothesis of the necessity of the observance of the law, for "then is the scandal of the cross ceased" (v. 11), and all necessity of suffering persecution is removed; these deceivers themselves doing and urging others to these things, only "lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ" (vi. 12): for the first persecutions which the church suffered, were either from the Jews in person, or by the incitation of the Jews (Acts viii. 1, 1 Thess. ii. 14—16, Acts xiii. 15, xiv. 19, xvii. 5. 13), who being every where dispersed, "sent chosen men from Jerusalem to all places, where they and the Christians were, to stir up the heathen governors against them," as Justin Martyr* testifies. Note also, that they were chiefly scandalized at the doctrine of the cross (1 Cor. i. 23), not only as it contradicted their pleasant dream of a temporal Messiah, under whom they should live gloriously and triumphantly, but as being that which put an end to the Jewish ceremonies, and taught men to expect justification, not by observance of the law, but by faith in the blood of Christ shed for us; upon which account they were incensed against all who thus taught or thus believed it.

Note also hence, that all the good actions we have done will be done in vain, if we persevere not in well-doing to the end.

[5] Ver. 5. Ἐνεργῶν δυνάμεις, He that worketh miracles among you.] This is the observation of all the ancients,† that comment upon this and the second verse, that "to commend the beginning of the Christian faith, the gift of tongues, prophecy, and working of miracles, were vouchsafed to believers, as to the apostles at the beginning, according to our Lord's prediction," Mark xvi. 17, 18.

And let those that question the truth of Christianity observe, that this was the chief argument which carried the cause in the council at Jerusalem, that the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost were equally vouchsafed to the uncircumcised gentile and to Jews, Acts xv. 8, 9; and that this is here urged by Paul as a thing undeniable, to confirm the Galatians, and to confute those who endeavoured to prevail on them to admit of circumcision, and the observance of other legal rites. This confirmation, therefore, of the truth of Christian faith, was such as none, concerned to do it then, were able to gainsay, much less can any now find reason to doubt of it.

[6] Ver. 6. Ἐπίστευσε τῷ Θεῷ, Believed God.] Hence it is evident, that it is the act of faith, and not the object of it, which doth justify; for Abraham believed God והאמין, et imputavit eam fidem, "and he imputed that faith in him for righteousness," Gen. xv. 6. "The blessed God," saith R. Salom, "imputed this to Abraham for righteousness, for the faith by which he believed in him."

[7] Ver. 8. Preached the gospel to Abraham, saying, &c.] Well might the apostle argue thus from the example of Abraham, he being styled by the Jerusalem Talmud, "Abraham the just," Gen. xv. 1, xviii. 2; and these words being paraphrased thus, "In thy righteousness shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Here Jerome saith, Hoc autem in omnibus penè testimoniis, quæ de veteribus libris in Novo assumpta sunt Testamento, observare debemus, quòd memoriæ crediderunt evangelistæ, vel apostoli, et tantùm sensû explicato, sæpè ordinem transmutaverunt, nonnunquam vel detraxerint verba, vel addiderint: for which wild note this verse ministers no occasion: for though the words "in thy seed," occur not, ch. xxii., yet xii. 2, they are found expressly as they are cited here, only with the addition of ἀπὸ γῆς, of the earth, which adds nothing to the sense. So again, on ver. 10, he makes this note, Incertum habemus utrùm Septuaginta interpretes addiderint 'omnis homo,' et 'in omnibus,' an in veteri Hebraico ita fuerit, et postea à Judæis deletum sit; in hanc me suspicionem illa res stimulat, quòd verbum 'omnis,' et 'in omnibus' apostolus vir Hebrææ peritiæ, et in lege doctissimus, nunquam protulissit, nisi in Hebræis voluminibus haberentur; whereas, as I have shown, that nothing is here added, but what was necessarily included in the full sense of the words, and therefore is in the version of the Septuagint; so to imagine, that all the apostles who understood Hebrew must have cited all that they produced out of the Old Testament, exactly according to the Hebrew, and not at all according to the Septuagint, is an imagination contrary to ocular demonstration.

[8] Ἐν σοι, In thee.] That is, "in thy seed," ver. 6; so Acts iii. 25, "Ye are the sons of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with your fathers, saying, And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed;" that is, in Christ: for so it follows, ver. 26, "To you first, God having raised up his child Jesus, sent him to bless you." And this confutes them who, with the Jews, interpret these words as a form of benediction thus, "God make thee like to Abraham."

[9] Ver. 11. Ὁ δίκαιος, &c. The just shall live by faith.] Thus do the Jews themselves expound these words of Habakkuk, "Faith is the cause of blessedness, as it is the cause of eternal life, according to these words, The just shall live by his faith" (Sepher Ikkarim, lib. i. cap. 21).

[10] Ver. 13. For it is written, ἐπικατάρατος πᾶς ὁ κρεμάμενος ἐπὶ ξύλου.] Here again St. Jerome's note is, Scire non possum, quare apostolus in eo, quod scriptum est, 'maledictus à Deo omnis, qui pendet in ligno,' vel subtraxerit aliquid, vel addiderit; si enim semel autoritatem Septuaginta interpretum sequebatur, debuit, sicut ab illis editum est, et Dei nomen adjungere, sin verò, ut Hebræus ex Hebræis, id quod in linguâ suâ legerit, putabat esse verissimum, nec 'omnis,' nec 'in ligno,' quæ in Hebræo non habentur, assumere; ex quo mihi videtur, aut veteres Hebræorum libri (libros) alitèr habuisse quàm nunc habent, aut apostolum sensum scripturarum posuisse, non verba; aut quod magis æstimandum est, post passionem Christi, et in Hebræis, et in nostris codicibus ab aliquo Dei nomen appositum, ut infamiam nobis inureret, qui in ligno Christum maledictum à Deo credimus. But to omit the incredible supposition, that the Jews should have falsified both the Hebrew and Greek text, and the Samaritan copy should agree with them in that falsation;

First, The words ἐπὶ ξύλου are no addition to the text, על עץ being in the former verse, which saith, "You shall hang him on a tree;" and ἐπικατάρατος is in effect κατάρατος ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

Secondly, The business of the apostle here is, to show that Christ had redeemed us, ἐκ τῆς κατάρας, "from the curse, by being made a curse for us;" i. e. by suffering that death which by the law was counted execrable: now to prove this, it was sufficient to show, that by being hanged on the tree Christ suffered that punishment which by the law was styled execrable.

Thirdly, The Hebrew saith, תלוּיה האלהים "accursed by the judges," is he that is hanged on a tree. Now these judges being the ordinance of God, he that receives an execrable sentence from them may be said to lie under the curse of God, as receiving that execrable punishment, which his vicegerents do inflict upon him, by the determinate counsel of God; in which sense Christ is said to be "smitten of (that) God," who made our sins to meet upon him (Isa. liii. 4. 6), and to be "delivered up for our offences;" and he who suffers a death which the law styles accursed by the אלהים or magistrates, who are appointed to execute the judgment of the Lord, may be said to undergo his curse.

Ἐπικατάρατος πᾶς, Cursed is every one.] When all were obnoxious to the curse of the law, saith Theodoret, he undertook that death which by the law was accursed, to free us from the curse. To restrain the words, "He redeemed us from the curse of the law," to the Jews only, is in effect to say, Christ only suffered for the Jews, seeing he only suffered by hanging on the cross, the tree on which he did expire. The gentiles were not indeed subject to the particular maledictions contained in the law of Moses, because that law was not given to them, but only to the Jews: but they were subject to that death, which was the general punishment threatened to the violators of the law, and was the curse denounced against Adam and his seed. And since it was by virtue of Christ's hanging on the cross that "the blessing of Abraham came upon the gentiles," he must have been thus made a curse for them also, and not for the Jews only.

Now here seems to be a plain evidence that our Lord suffered in our stead, by way of surrogation, the punishment the law denounced against us for sin: for we were obnoxious by the law to a curse; he, that he might redeem us from it, did for our sakes, and in our stead, willingly submit himself to that death which, by the sentence of the law, did render any man accursed; for "he bare our sins in his own body on the tree." Now the law expressly saith, "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree;" and Crellius here is forced to own a double commutation, both of the person suffering and of the evils suffered; for whereas we ought to have suffered, Christ, saith he, suffered for us; and whereas we ought to have suffered a curse, Christ suffered a curse for us. But then he adds, that we ought to have suffered a real curse, Christ only suffered a curse improperly so called for us. The curse threatened by the law to us was death eternal, the curse Christ suffered for us was only temporal death. But,

First, If the curse threatened to us was only the curse of the law, and Christ suffered the curse of the law, both which things the apostle here affirms, what ground hath Crellius to put these differences betwixt the curse Christ suffered, and the curse threatened by the law? or does he not hereby seem to make the apostle's argument sophistical and unconcluding?

Secondly, The sins to which the curse is threatened, Deut. xxvii., were either such to which God elsewhere threatened death, or cutting off, or such as he required them to abstain from, that they might live, and not die. Now, seeing the Socinians so stiffly do contend that the life promised to the observers of the law was only temporal, why

Jesus Christ; that we (gentiles, believing in him) might receive the promise of the Spirit [11] through faith; (for we are all the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus; and because we are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, iv. 5, 6.)

15 Brethren, I speak after the [12] manner of men; (using an example taken from the common practice of all men, and speaking what is owned in all civilized nations: see note on 1 Cor. ix. 8;) Though it be but a man's covenant (that is made), yet if it be (legally) confirmed, no man disannulleth (it), or addeth thereto.

16 Now to Abraham and his [13] seed were the promises made. He (God) saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as (speaking) of one, And [14] to thy seed, which is Christ.

17 And this I (farther) say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ (i. e. the covenant made in Christ the promised seed, and confirmed by God to Abraham before the law was given), the law, which was (given) [15] four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, (so) that it should make the promise (be) of none effect (as it must have done, were justification to be obtained by the law; for then none could be blessed in and by the promised seed only, or without the law).

18 For if the inheritance (of the blessing promised to Abraham) be (to be obtained by observance) of the law, it is no more (the effect) of (the) promise: but (that cannot be said, for) God gave it to Abraham by promise.

19 (But you will inquire,) Wherefore then serveth the law? (I answer,) It was added (after the promise made) [16] because of transgressions, till the seed should they say, that the death threatened to the violation of it is eternal death? It is true, all death must be eternal to them that cannot raise themselves, and have no promise of a resurrection; upon which two accounts our Saviour's death was not eternal, because he had power to revive himself, and had a promise that "he should not see corruption;" but the death threatened by the law, in its own nature, being only the separation of the soul and body, this our Lord did as truly suffer, as they could do who should never live again.

The distinction, therefore, which the case requires, is only that which results necessarily from the difference of the person; i. e. we should have suffered the curse of the law for our own sins, and consequently should also have been accursed in the sight of God. Christ actually suffered the legal curse to obtain pardon for the sins of others, and therefore only was accursed in the eye of the law, and in the sight of men; but being in his own person wholly innocent, he could not be accursed in the sight of God: and thus it is, and must be, in all vicarial sufferings, the person sinning, and he that undertakes to suffer for him, are both guilty in the eye of the law, and suffer the punishment the law requires, but one of them alone is guilty in the sight of God. Christ therefore was so made a curse, as he was "made sin for us" (2 Cor. v. 20), not by contracting the guilt, but by suffering the punishment of our sins, by being "numbered with transgressors," and condemned with them to the death which the law styles "accursed."

[11] Ver. 14. Διὰ τῆς πίστεως, Through faith.] It seems to follow from these words, and from 2 Cor. ii. 7, 8, that the ministration of the Spirit belonged not to the law, but to the gospel, the law being rather the ministration of death: hence the apostle here opposes to the curse of the law, "the blessing of Abraham, which," saith he, "is the promise of the Spirit through faith."

[12] Ver. 15. Ὅμως ἀνθρώπου κεκυρωμένην διαθήκην οὐδεὶς ἐπιδιατάσσεται.] Here I would read ὁμῶς, which signifies ὁμοίως, similiter, in like manner; in which sense ὅμως is plainly used in these words, ὅμως τὰ ἄψυχα, and is translated, "in like manner," 1 Cor. xiv. 7.

[13] Ver. 16. Αἱ ἐπαγγελίαι, The promises.] Made to Abraham, Gen. xii. 3; and repeated, Gen. xxii. 18; and to Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 4.

[14] Καὶ τῷ σπέρματί σου, And to thy seed, which is Christ.] This interpretation is owned by the Jews,* who observe, that "it is not written here, thy son, but thy seed; that is, the King Messiah." And, as Theodoret observes, the words are capable of no other sense; for by Christ only was the promise fulfilled, and in him alone did the gentiles receive this blessing. He, therefore, in whom alone this promise was verified, must be the person of whom it was chiefly, if not only, intended. And so Peter, assisted by the Holy Ghost, interprets these words, saying, "You are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God hath made to your fathers, saying, And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed: to you first, God having raised up his child Jesus, sent him to bless you:" this child therefore is the seed. We need not the gloss of Mr. Clerc, that Paul here argues "according to the allegorical interpretation of that age; but if it be considered in itself, it cannot be thought of any force by those who have other sentiments, because the Hebrew זרע is a collective name:" for this is the very objection of R. Isaac, that great enemy of the Christian faith, and is answered by the right reverend Bishop of Bath and Wells, by showing that the Hebrew word is used of one, Gen. iii. 15, iv. 25, xv. 3, xxxviii. 8, 9, and that the Jews themselves so expound it (Demonstrat. of the Messiah, par. ii. p. 256): nor his other corrupt gloss, that "by Christ is meant Christ's disciples;" for is this sense, In thy seed, i. e. in Christ's disciples, shall all the families of the earth be blessed? Is not this to ascribe that to Christ's disciples which belongs to him alone; and to make them the saviours of the world? And why does he say that "nothing was promised to Christ," when the apostle tells us, that "in thee" and "in thy seed" signifies Christ, who was to be the blessing both of Jew and gentile? for though indeed the promise was to Abraham, the first subject of it was Christ, which is all the apostle here intends.

[15] Ver. 17. Μετὰ ἔτη τετρακόσια καὶ τριάκοντα, Four hundred and thirty years after.] Hence it is evident, that the apostle here refers primarily to the promise made, Gen. xii. 3; since from that only are the four hundred and thirty years to be computed; for then Abraham was seventy-five years old (Gen. xii. 4); from thence to the birth of Isaac, which happened when Abraham was a hundred years old (Gen. xxi. 5), is five-and-twenty years; from his birth to the birth of Jacob was sixty years; for Isaac was sixty years old when Rebecca bare him (Gen. xxv. 26); from Jacob's birth to his descent into Egypt was one hundred and thirty years, as he saith to Pharaoh, Gen. xlvii. 9; the abode of him and his posterity in Egypt was two hundred and fifteen years; so that, with their sojourning in Canaan, was four hundred and thirty years (Exod. xii. 40), according to the Septuagint.

[16] Ver. 19. Τῶν παραβάσεων χάριν, Because of transgressions.] Maimonides,* in his More Nevochim, acknowledges, that the ceremonial law was given for the extirpation of idolatry: "For (saith he) when God sent Moses to redeem his people out of Egypt, it was the usual custom of the world, and the worship in which all nations were bred up, to build temples in honour of the sun, moon, and stars, and to offer divers kinds of animals to them, and to have priests appointed for that end: therefore God, knowing it is beyond the strength of human nature instantly to quit that which it hath been long accustomed to, and so is powerfully inclined to, would not command that all that worship should be abolished, and he should be worshipped only in spirit; but that he only should be the object of this outward worship; that these temples and altars should be built to him alone; these sacrifices offered to him only, and these priests should be consecrated to his service" (Exod. xx. 24, xxv. 24, xxxiv. 14, Lev. i. 2, xxii. 19. And the like is said by Cedrenus† of their festivals, separations, purgations, oblations, decimations, that God enjoined them, that should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained (or delivered, not as the promise, immediately by God himself to Abraham, but) by angels (it being the word spoken by angels, Heb. ii. 2, not as the promise, without a mediator betwixt God giving and Abraham receiving, but) in the hand of a mediator (even Moses, who stood between them and the Lord at that time, to show them the word of the Lord, Deut. v. 5, and ratify the covenant on the people's part).

20 Now (but the promise required no mediator, for) [17] a mediator is not a mediator of one (party only), but God (who made the promise to Abraham) is one (only).

21 Is the law then against the promises of God, (as it must be, if it condemns them to whom the promise doth assign a blessing? or is it against those promises which say, The just shall live by faith, and the blessing of Abraham shall come upon us by faith; as it must be, provided we are to be justified not by faith, but by the works of the law? but) God forbid (it should be thought he had given a law which disannulled his promises; as it must have done, had justification to life depended on the observance of it): for if there had been (such) a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness (i. e. justification to life, Rom. v. 18) should have been by the law; (whereas it subjecting us to death, we may be sure God never did intend it for that end.)

22 But the scripture hath concluded all (men of all nations) under sin, (and so under condemnation by the law moral and ceremonial, and sentenced not to life, but death by it, and thereby shown the necessity) that the promise (of justification) by faith of Jesus Christ (the promised seed) might be given to them that believe (in him; and thus the law is not contrary, but subservient to the promises of living by faith).

23 But before faith came (to be revealed), we were kept under (the discipline of) the law, [18] shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed.

τῆς πολυθέου πλάνης εκστήσωνται, "being employed in doing these things to the true God, they might abstain from idolatry." And thus, saith Dr. Spencer, were they kept or guarded under the discipline of the law, and shut up from the idolatrous rites and customs of the heathen world, by the strictness of these legal observations, and the penalties denounced against the violators of them. And it is well known that all the ancient fathers were of this opinion, that God gave the Jews only the decalogue, till they had made the golden calf, and that afterward he laid this yoke of ceremonies upon them to restrain them from idolatry. Thus when God first brought them out of Egypt, and commanded them not to "defile themselves with the idols of Egypt" (Ezek. xx. 7), he is said to have "given them his statutes, and showed them his judgments, which if a man do he shall live in them" (ver. 11). But, saith he, still their hearts were after their fathers' idols, the Egyptian Apis, &c. "Wherefore I gave them statutes which were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live" (ver. 24, 25), that is, that law of carnal commandments, which, saith the apostle, was abolished for "the weakness and unprofitableness of it," Heb. viii. 16. 18. And those words of Maimonides give us a clear reason why these rituals were called by Paul στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, "the rudiments of the world," Gal. vi. 3, Col. ii. 28, namely, because, for matter, they were the same which heathens used before to their false gods. This is a very ancient exposition, and is partly true, but it containeth not the whole truth; for the apostle, in the Epistle to the Romans, which is the best expositor of this, informs us, that "the law entered, that sin might abound," Rom. v. 20, i. e. that it might appear to abound unto death, that "sin might appear sin, working death in us," vii. 13, and that "the law worketh wrath," iv. 15, iii. 20, by giving us the knowledge of that sin which deserveth it: and this answers to that which the apostle here saith, that "the law was added because of transgressions," viz. to discover them and their punishment; that "the scripture hath concluded all men under sin," viz. by virtue of the law; that "as many as are under the law are under the curse," ver. 10, and that upon these accounts, "the law is our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ, that we may be justified through faith in him," who are condemned by the law, ver. 24, "Christ being the end of the law for justification to every one that believeth," Rom. x. 3.

[17] Ver. 20. Ὁ δὲ μεσίτης.] Perhaps these words may better be expounded thus:* "But this mediator (viz. Moses) was only the mediator of the Jews; and so was only mediator of one party, to whom belonged the blessing of Abraham, ver. 8. 14, but God who made the promise, that in one should all the families of the earth be blessed, is one," the God of the other party, the gentiles, as well as of the Jews, and so as ready to justify the one as the other; ἐπείπερ εἷς ἡ Θεός, "seeing he is one God who will justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith" (Rom. iii. 30). To strengthen this exposition, let it be noted, that the ancient Jews thought, that in those words, "The Lord thy God is one God" (Deut. vi. 4), was contained this mystery, that God should be owned and celebrated not by the Jews only, but by the gentiles; that he should be the king over all the earth, and in that day the Lord should be one, and his name one. So Jarchius on these words, "The Lord our God is one God," says, "It is intimated that Jehovah, who is now our God, and not the God of the gentiles, shall hereafter be one God, as it is written, Zeph. iii. 9, Then will I turn to the nations the pure lip, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord; and Zech. xiv. 9, The Lord shall be king over all the earth, and in that day shall the Lord be one, and his name one" (see Campegius Vitringa de Synag. Vet. lib. iii. par. ii. cap. 17, p. 1084. 1086).

Secondly, This exposition is confirmed from the place parallel to this, Rom. iv. 14. 16; for as there it is argued, that if οἱ ἐκ νόμου κληρονόμοι, "they that are of the law be heirs," faith is made void, "and the promise is of no effect:" so here he argues, ver. 18, that if ἐκ νόμου κληρονομία, "the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise." And as there the apostle adds, ver. 16, that "therefore the inheritance is of faith, that the promise might be made firm to all the seed; not to that of the law only," but to that part also which becomes so by the faith of Abraham, "who is the father of us all:" so here he must be supposed to argue, that the inheritance could not be by the law delivered by Moses to the Jews, as the mediator betwixt God and them, because he was not the mediator, παντὶ τῷ σπέρματι, "to all the seed of Abraham," but to that part of it only which was of the law, that is, to the Jews only: or the words may be paraphrased thus; "The promise, I say, was made to the seed of Abraham, ὡς ἀφ' ἑνός, "as of one," ver. 16, ὁ δὲ μεσίτης, but this mediator, Moses, is not the mediator of one (i. e. of that one seed, Christ, which was to bring the blessing), but God (who made the promise, that in one seed all the nations of the earth, whether Jew or gentile, should be blessed) is one (and the same, always true to his word)." So Dr. Allix.

[18] Ver. 23. Συγκεκλεισμένοι.] The apostle having said in the foregoing verse, συνέκλεισεν, "The scripture hath shut up all, both Jew and gentile, under sin," it seems most reasonable to interpret the word here, of men shut up as prisoners, condemned by the law to death, the punishment of sin, till that faith came to be revealed, by which we obtain a happy freedom from condemnation to death.

Or this may be spoken of the Jews, who only were under the law, and were, by virtue of the peculiar observations it required, an enclosed people, separated from communion with all other nations, till the Messiah, the great object of their faith, should be revealed.

And having thus explained the apostle's argument, it seemeth necessary a little to consider what Mr. Clerc here offers in his notes upon this chapter, from ver. 10 to the end.

* Λέγει τοίνυν ὅτι Μωσῆς μὲν ἐμεσίτευσε πρὸς τὴν δόσιν τοῦ νόμου, ἀλλ' ἑνὶ μόνον ἐμεσίτευσεν ἔθνει, δεῖ δὲ τὸν ὡς ἀληθῶς μέλλοντα μεσιτεύειν πρὸς τὴν τῶν ἁπάντων ἔθνων ἕνα Θεόν, οὐκ ὑπὲρ ἑνὸς ἔθνους ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ πάντων κοινὴν τὴν μεσιτείαν ποιήσασθαι, ἐπειδὴ καὶ πάντων ἐθνῶν εἷς ἐστι Θεός. Gennadius in locum.

24 [19] Wherefore the law was (then) our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ (and cause us, thus condemned by the law, to fly to him who is the end of the law for righteousness, Rom. x. 3), that we might be justified by faith (in him).

25 But (now) after that faith is come, we are no

1. Therefore when he says, "It was very difficult indeed to observe all the rites of Moses, yet he supposes his law might be observed, and that it did not require a degree of holiness above human strength:" I answer, with the distinction mentioned note on ver. 24, This is all true as to such a sincere performance of it as God would accept of; but it is not true as to the most exact, perfect, and unsinning observation of it in the highest import of the words.

Obj. But doth then God command what is impossible? Is it not absurd to make laws that cannot be kept, and to punish men for what they cannot do?

Ans. God never commands what is naturally impossible, and which when we offend against, we can justly plead, that had we used our utmost strength and diligence, we could not have avoided the doing what was forbid, or leaving undone what was commanded; for of what is so impossible no man can rationally repent, nor can his conscience condemn him for it; but he may require what, through the weakness of the flesh, is morally impossible to be always done or avoided; v. g. an infinitely holy God cannot but command that we should not sin against him, "sin being a transgression of the law:" but though there be no particular sin of which we can truly say, it is impossible we should have avoided it; yet, through the infirmity of human nature, we have too much cause to say that it is morally impossible we should live without or always be free from sin.

Secondly, When he says, "The laws of Moses are not so severe as not to pardon the least sin, God having instituted sacrifices for some sins:" this also I grant, according to the distinction mentioned, viz. that God for the sake of those sacrifices cleansed them from ceremonial defilements, and freed them from the civil and ecclesiastical punishments which by the law of Moses they would have been subject to, had no such sacrifice been offered for them. God also fully pardoned the sins of the upright Jews, and freed them from the punishments of the other life, but not by virtue of "the blood of bulls and goats," for the reasons there alleged, but by virtue of their faith in the Messiah, owned by them to be "the Messiah their righteousness."

Thirdly, When he says that "the Jews in Paul's time had got quite another notion of it than the law of Moses, as it is set down in the Pentateuch, had, and boasted it to be the most complete and perfect pattern of sanctity imaginable; as appears by several places in Josephus, and particularly in his books against Apio:"

Ans. I answer, that neither is Josephus in this matter of much credit; neither saith he more than Moses had said before him in these words, "What nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all the law which I set before you this day?" Deut. iv. 8, and much less than David, when he saith, "The law of the Lord is perfect," Ps. xix. 8. Besides, our Saviour seems to give us a contrary account of this matter, in his sermon on the mount, where though it be disputed whether he added to the law itself, yet no man questions but that he added to the gross senses the Jews had then of it, and had upon it.

Fourthly, When he adds, that "the rabbins used (as appears by the version of the Septuagint and the citations of St. Paul in this place) to interpret Deut. xxvii. 26 as if the meaning of Moses was there, that God required of them the most perfect holiness, which if they did not perform, they must expect to be cursed by him; but in reality all that Moses says, is only, that the people were to curse him that did not confirm the words of the law to do them."

Ans. In all this there is scarce one word of truth: for, (1.) the rabbins were so far from expounding this, or any other text of Moses, in so high a sense, that they thought it sufficient to exempt them from God's curse, that they were "of the seed of Abraham," and had him "for their father" (Matt. iii. 8, 9), that they should be accepted for "the merit of circumcision," and that it was enough to be "hearers of the law, though they were not doers of it" (James i. 22), and that the observation of some precepts of the law would excuse their neglect of the rest (see note on Rom. ii. 13, and James ii. 10, 11, and the note there).

(2.) Whereas he saith, "This appears by the version of the Septuagint:" if that way of arguing be of any force, then the contrary appears from the Targum of Onkelos, and B. Uziel, who have added nothing to the words. Moreover, what hath the Septuagint here added, which is not necessarily contained in the sense of the words, as they lie in the Hebrew? For (1.) whereas they add, πᾶς ἄνθρωπος, "every man;" do not all interpreters add "he," and is not that the same in sense? Ought not every man, who committed the sins against which any of these curses were denounced, to think himself subject to these curses? (2.) Whereas they add ἐν πᾶσι to the Hebrew, doth not the context plainly lead them to that addition? when it saith, ver. 3. 8, "Thou shalt write, כל דברי, all the words of this law," were not the Jews obliged to do all the words of the law, i. e. all things commanded by the law of Moses? Deut. xix. 9. Yea, are not the blessings in the next chapter promised to them only who "observe to do all the commandments," ver. 1, and the curses denounced against them who "do not observe to do all his commandments and statutes?" ver. 15. Doth not the Holy Ghost, assisting the sacred penman, warrant this addition in other places? "See that thou make according to the pattern," say the Hebrew and the Septuagint, Exod. xxv. 43, "See that thou make πάντα, all things according to the pattern," saith Paul, Heb. viii. 5. "At the mouth of two or three witnesses shall a word be established," saith the Hebrew: σταθήσεται πᾶν ῥῆμα, "shall every word be established," say the Septuagint and Paul. Nor (3.) hath Paul added any thing to the sense of the words; for all the words of the law being written by Moses in the book of the law, it is plainly the same thing to say, "all the words of the law," and "all the words written in the book of the law."

(4.) When he saith, "Doubtless St. Paul would never have altered any thing in the words of Moses, nor followed the Septuagint at all, but rendered the Hebrew himself exactly, if he had reasoned from the bare authority of the prophet, and not from the opinion of the Jews:" I answer,

First, That he casts the vilest imputation on St. Paul, by saying here, that he argues only upon the false supposition of the Jews: for St. Paul lays down this general proposition, "As many as are under the law are under the curse:" "This is false," saith Mr. Clerc: "for in reality all that Moses says is only, that the people were to curse him that did not confirm the words of the law to do them." It is so, saith St. Paul, γέγραπται γάρ, "for it is written:" By your good leave, St. Paul, you are out again, there is no such thing; but you are guilty of adding to the word of God; if you understand yourself, you do not, and if you understand the words of Moses, you cannot in this argument depend upon what is written, but only on the false and rotten notion of the Jews touching these words: so Le Clerc.

Secondly, Through the sides of Paul here he wounds our blessed Saviour, and all the sacred penmen: for if it be true of Paul, it must be also true of them, that if they had reasoned from the bare authority of the prophets, and not from the opinion of the Jews (not grounded on the true sense of the prophets), they would have rendered the Hebrew exactly, and never have altered any thing in the words of Moses, nor followed the Septuagint at all; which, seeing ocular demonstration shows, that both our Lord and his apostles have often done, "you must not think," saith Mr. Clerc, "that they have given us the true sense of the prophets," but only some corrupt opinions which the Jews had of them. And let Mr. Clerc say as dogmatically as he pleases, that "it is common with St. Paul to cite the Old Testament," so as it was usually alleged by the doctors of the Jews, whom they call דרשנים, that is to say, "with little regard to the circumstances of the place, or the proper signification of the words, and to argue from them so alleged," I cannot but look upon it as a very bad suggestion.

[19] Ver. 24.] Note, for the right explication of these words from ver. 21 to this verse,

First, That it cannot be denied that good and holy men under the law were justified, and obtained the pardon of longer under a schoolmaster (being no longer children in minority, Rom. vii. 3).

26 For ye are all the (adult) [20] children of God (and so heirs of God) by faith in Christ Jesus.

27 For as many of you as have (believed in Christ, and upon that faith have) been baptized into Christ have put on Christ, (and so are become sons of God; for to as many as believed in him he gave power to be the sons of God, John i. 12.)

28 There is (under the gospel dispensation) neither (distinction made of) Jew nor Greek, there is neither (of) bond nor free, there is neither (of) male nor female (as under the Jewish economy, the male only bearing the sign of the covenant): for ye are all one (as to the privileges of the gospel) in Christ Jesus.

29 And if ye be Christ's, then are ye (indeed) Abraham's seed (not from Ishmael, but Isaac), and (therefore) heirs [21] according to the promise.

their sins; since otherwise they could not be accepted by God here, or saved hereafter.

Secondly, It also seemeth evident from the discourse of the apostle in this and the Epistle to the Romans, that they could not be justified by the observance of the law; for he lays down this as the foundation of his discourse, that "by the works of the law no man is justified," Rom. iii. 20, and "no flesh shall be justified," Gal. ii. 16. The proofs he offers to confirm this position do equally concern all times and persons, from the giving of the law to the revealing of the gospel: as, v. g. (1.) Because "by the law is the knowledge of sin," condemning us to death, Rom. iii. 20, vii. 9—11. 13, Gal. iii. 22. (2.) "Because the just," saith the prophet Habakkuk, "shall live by his faith," Rom. i. 17; whereas "the law is not of faith;" whence he infers, that "no man is justified in the sight of God by the works of the law," Gal. iii. 11. (3.) Because "as many as are under the law are under the curse," ver. 10. (4.) Because it was impossible, through the weakness of the flesh, that the law should justify (Rom. viii. 3), or that it should give life (Gal. iii. 21), and so it never was designed for that end. It had indeed its expiatory sacrifices, but they procured only pardon of that guilt which rendered them obnoxious to the violent death threatened by the law to such and such offenders, but gave no remedy against natural death, by the promise of a resurrection to eternal life, and so exempted no man from the punishment of Adam's sin; or they only released offenders from the obligation to civil and ecclesiastical punishments, but could not free them from the punishment of the other life: for the apostle assures us, that "the blood of bulls and goats could not take away sin," Heb. x. 4, and that they did only "sanctify to the purifying of the flesh," Heb. vii. 13 (see the note there).

Now, Thirdly, Hence it follows, that they also must be justified by faith from all those sins from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses (Acts xiii. 39).

Obj. But are not the Jews styled "righteous before God," by virtue of their obedience to the law of Moses? As in these words of David, "The Lord rewarded me according to my righteousness; for I have kept the ways of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God; for all his judgments were before me, and I did not put away his statutes from me: I was also upright before him, and kept myself from mine iniquity, therefore hath the Lord recompensed me according to my righteousness," Ps. xviii. 20—24. Is it not said of Zacharias and Elizabeth, that "they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless?" Luke i. 6. Yea, doth not our apostle say, "Not the hearers of the law are δίκαιοι, just before God, but the doers of the law δικαιωθήσονται, shall be justified!" Rom. ii. 13.

Ans. Now to this I answer, That there is a double justification of which the scripture speaks: (1.) that which consists in the absolution of a sinner from the guilt of sin, by God's free pardon or remission of it, or his not imputing it to the sinner. And thus no man is or can be justified by the law, either ceremonial or moral, since neither of them does contain any promise of the pardon of it. Now all men being sinners, this justification must be necessary to all men, to put and keep them in a state of favour with God. And this is that justification which Paul ascribes to faith, and which, saith he, could never be obtained from the works of the law. But,

(2.) There is justification to be undergone by all men at the great day of their accounts; and this is only the pronouncing them sincere in the performance of their covenants, legal or evangelical, or in compliance with the laws of nature, Moses, or of grace, the providence of God had placed them under; and in this sense we find mention of men "working righteousness" under the law of nature, Job i. 1, Acts x. 35, under the law of Moses, Ps. xviii. 20. 24, Luke i. 6, and under the law of grace, 1 John iii. 7, Rev. xxii. 11. And thus all pious persons, who made it their sincere endeavour to obey the law of Moses, were righteous before God; though still the imperfections which cleaved to their obedience were pardoned through faith. To explain this, note,

First, That the whole nation of the Jews believed in the promised Messiah, or the Messiah that was to come, and that in the seed of Abraham should all the families of the earth be blessed; this being one of their fundamental articles.

Secondly, They believed that this Messiah should confer upon them not only temporal, but spiritual, yea, eternal blessings; they expected spiritual blessings from him, even remission of sins. So Zacharias speaks of the Baptist, that "he should go before the Lord to prepare his way, to give knowledge to his people of salvation through the remission of sins," Luke i. 76, 77. "To him," saith Peter, "give all the prophets witness, that through his name all that believe in him should receive remission of sins," Acts x. 43. So the Jews say, that the Messias* was to remove חרון כולל, "the general sin of mankind," or "the sin of the first man." 2. They expected by him justification, he being styled by the prophet, "the Lord our righteousness," and by the Jews, משיח צדקנו, "Messiah our justification." Now this, say the ancient fathers, might be a justifying faith in them, without explicitly believing that Christ should die for their sins; though we have no reason to think, that they who were so plainly taught this by the prophet Isaiah, by the type of Isaac, the lifting up of the serpent, and by their sacrifices, should he wholly ignorant of it.

[20] Ver. 26. Υἱοὶ Θεοῦ διὰ τῆς πίστεως, The sons of God, through faith.] Hence, saith the antipædobaptist, it appears, that infants cannot be made the sons of God by baptism, because we are all made the sons of God "by faith in Christ Jesus:" now infants have no faith. Ans. They might as well argue thus: "By grace you are saved, through faith," Eph. ii. 7, but infants have no faith, therefore they cannot be saved. Or thus: "He that believeth not shall be damned," Mark xvi. 16, no infants do believe, ergo, all infants shall be damned. The apostle plainly speaks here of persons converted from heathenism to Christianity, who were therefore baptized, being adult persons, as he doth in the Gospel of Mark and the Epistle to the Ephesians. This place can therefore with no more reason be applied to the case of infants, than the places cited from Mark and that Epistle (see the preface to this epistle).

[21] Ver. 29. Κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν κληρονόμοι, Heirs according to the promise.] It is to be observed, for the explication of many places in these epistles, that there is frequent mention in the New Testament of the promises in the plural number; to the Israelites "belong the promises," Rom. viii. 4, "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision to confirm the promises," Rom. xv. 8; "To Abraham and his seed were the promises made," Gal. iii. 16; and, ver. 21, "Is the law then against the promises? These all died in faith, not having received the promises," Heb. xi. 13. 17, and, ver. 39, "They all having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promises."

Now there is mention made in the New Testament of three sorts of promises:

First, The promise of a seed, "in which all the families of the earth shall be blessed," viz. in Christ, Acts iii. 25,

---

* Voisin de Leg. Div. lib. i. cap. 8, p. 6. 66—68.

xii. 23. 33, xxvi. 6, Rom. iv. 13, 14. 20, ix. 9, Gal. iii. 21, 22 (see the note there).

Secondly, The promise of the Holy Spirit, in his extraordinary gifts and operations, Acts ii. 33. 39, by which believers were then "sealed up to the day of redemption," Eph. i. 13, and this is called "the promise of the Father," Luke xxiv. 49, Acts i. 4. And this promise was not immediately made to Abraham, but was the consequent of the blessing which God had promised to his seed; "the blessing of Abraham" being first to come upon the gentiles, that they might receive the promise of the Spirit, i. e. that being made "the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus," the seed promised, "God might send the Spirit of his Son into their hearts, crying, Abba, Father," iv. 6.

Thirdly, The promise of a future rest, and an eternal inheritance; there being "a promise made of entering into rest," Heb. iv. 3. 9 (see the note there), peculiar to believers, and to the people of God, after the rest which God had given them in Canaan, and a promise of "an eternal inheritance," Heb. ix. 15, x. 36. For that the patriarchs did by faith expect "a city having foundations, whose builder and maker was God," and "a heavenly country," we learn from Heb. xi. 9. 14, 15; yea, they expected to obtain "a better resurrection," ver. 35, viz. by virtue of their Messiah, this being their common saying, "The Messiah shall raise up those that sleep in the dust;"* and one of their fundamental articles is this, That the Messiah will come, מחיה המתים, "and will raise the dead," and bring them into paradise. This faith generally obtained among them before our Saviour's advent, as we learn, not only from the book of the Maccabees, but from Paul's plain words, Acts xxiv. 15, xxvi. 7, 8. If you inquire, where any such promise was made to Abraham or others, I answer, That such a promise was made to him and to the patriarchs, we are assured from this, that they by faith expected such things, all faith being built upon a promise; this promise therefore might be made to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 7, where God saith, "I will establish my covenant betwixt thee and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be thy God, and the God of thy seed after thee;" for that to be "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," is to be the God that will raise them up from the dead, we learn from our Saviour's argument, Matt. xxii. 32 (see the note there), and that he therefore was "called their God, because he had prepared for them a city," from Heb. xi. 15. And in reference to this future recompense it is that the apostle saith, "These all died in faith, not having received the promise, God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect," Heb. xi. 39, 40 (see the note there); now this seems to be the promise mentioned here, of which Christians are said to be the heirs, they "being heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ," Rom. viii. 15, Gal. iv. 7.

CHAPTER IV.

1 Now I say (to show how you, who are heirs of the promises, should be kept in bondage under a schoolmaster, iii. 23. 25), That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing (as to the possession and free use of his estate) from a servant, though he be (by right of inheritance) lord of all (his father left);

2 But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father (in his last will and testament).

3 Even so we (the seed of Abraham), when we were children (as till faith came we were), were in bondage under the [1] elements of the world (as servants were of old to their masters):

4 But when the fulness of the time (appointed for the appearance of the Messiah for the benefit of the Jew and gentile, that they might be made sons by him,) was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under (subjection to) the law,

5 To redeem them that were under the law (from the bondage of it), that we (together with them) might receive the adoption of sons.

6 And because ye are (now made) sons (of God by faith, iii. 25), God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father (i. e. witnessing to your spirits that ye are the sons of God, and that he is your Father, Rom. viii. 15, 16, and enabling you to use the language, not of servants, but of sons).

7 Wherefore thou art (after this redemption wrought) no more a servant, [2] but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

8 (I say, thou art no more a servant,) Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, [3] ye did service [4] unto them which by nature are no gods.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 3. Στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, The elements of the world.] i. e. The Jewish rites so called; because, as was observed, iii. 19, they were for matter mostly the same which had before obtained in the world, only they were directed to a better object and a better end.

[2] Ver. 7. Ἀλλ' υἱός, But a son.] That the notion of adoption includes a state of immortality; and that the sons of God were to be "sons of the resurrection," I have shown upon the parallel place, Rom. viii. 16—23, and that the Jews were not ignorant of this import of the phrase, we learn from the author of the Book of Wisdom (ii. 12), who introduces the wicked atheists speaking thus, "Let us lay in wait for the righteous, for he calleth himself a child of God. He maketh his boast that God is his Father. Let us see if his works be true——for if the just man be the Son of God, he will help him.——Let us condemn him to a shameful death, for by his own saying he shall be respected. Thus," saith he, "were they deceived, neither hoped they for the wages of righteousness, nor discerned a reward for blameless souls. For God created man to be immortal, and made him an image of his own eternity.——The souls of the righteous are in the hands of God, and their hope is full of immortality. Having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded; for God tried them, and found them worthy of himself." And ch. v. he introduced the same wicked persons, saying, "We fools counted his life madness, and his end to be without honour; how is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints!" where,

1. The righteous are represented as "the sons" and "children of God:" and it is farther said,

2. That as such they are to be rewarded in their souls, which are to be received "into the hands of God," and to be at rest: and in their bodies, which are to be immortal.

3. That, at the day of recompense, they shall "stand in great boldness," and shall, as being "the sons of God," have their "lot and portion with the saints," ἐν ἁγίοις ὁ κλῆρος αὐτοῦ, that is, he shall be ὁ κληρονόμος, "an heir" with the saints.

[3] Ver. 8. Ἐδουλεύσατε, Ye did service.] Hence we learn how frivolous is the distinction of the papists, that latria is indeed service proper to God, but dulia is such worship as may be paid to saints and angels; for seeing saints and angels are by nature no gods, the giving dulia to them must be the thing condemned here in the heathens, that being only this, that they did δουλεύειν, "give dulia to them which by nature were no gods."

[4] Τοῖς μὴ φύσει οὖσι θεοῖς, To them which are not gods by nature.] Hence we learn the consequence of the Socinian hypothesis, that Jesus Christ is not by nature God, and yet is to be honoured with the same worship, which all Christians give to him who is by nature God, seeing it teacheth us to do what Paul here condemneth in the very heathens: and surely it must be absurd to make that an article of Christian faith, and a part of Christian worship, which the apostle here makes a great crime of the heathen world, and a certain evidence of their ignorance of the true God. That the Socinians cannot answer this objection, appears from what they here return to it; viz. that "'gods by nature' is not here opposed to 'gods by grace,' or to those who have received their divinity from the one true God; for to serve and worship such a God, by reason of the empire which he hath received from God, is not profane and wicked, but pious and necessary."* Now in answer to this, I say,

First, That it is very evident from the text, that those who "are not gods by nature," are opposed to him who is God by nature; viz. to him whom the heathens knew not, and to him whom the Galatians, being Christians, knew, and by whom they were known. Since then the Socinians' "God by grace" is not a "God by nature;" since he is not the God intended in these words, "Ye knew not God:" he must be ranked among those who are here opposed to him.

Secondly, I have elsewhere shown, that the heathens had the very same sentiments with the Socinians, as to the worship of their inferior deities; and it is wonderful to see how they concur in sense, and almost in words.

Indeed, there is scarce any plea they use for the worship of Jesus Christ, as a "made God," which was not before used by the philosophers† for the worship of their inferior deities.

Secondly, Hence also it appears to be a mistake, to say that the Galatians, to whom the apostle here writes, before they received the gospel, were, as to the greatest part of them, proselytes of the gate, or also of righteousness; seeing it is plain that they were heathens, not knowing the true God, but serving them which "by nature were no gods," iv. 8, 9, and by the gospel were to be delivered ἐκ τοῦ ἐνεστῶτος αἰῶνος πονηροῦ, "from the present evil age," i. 4, from which they who were made proselytes of the gate, and worshipped the true God, were in a good measure delivered. Thirdly, The great endeavour of the Judaizers that crept in among them, was to persuade them to be circumcised (Gal. v. 2, vi. 12), whereas all the proselytes of righteousness, all the gentiles which had before been subject to the Jewish rites, must be circumcised when they were admitted to be proselytes of righteousness, they being made such by circumcision, and a promise of obedience to the law of Moses.

Obj. It is the Jewish law which is styled "the elements of the world, to which they were in bondage," iv. 3.

Ans. The Jewish law is indeed so called, but it was for this reason, that it was made up of ceremonies, which for the matter were the same with those which had been used by other nations of the world, the object of them only being changed (see the note on iii. 19): and they are nowhere called the "elements of piety," as Mr. Clerc supposes.

[5] Ver. 9. Πάλιν ἐπὶ τὰ ἀσθενῆ καὶ πτωχὰ στοιχεῖα, Again to the weak and beggarly elements.] Here interpreters find great difficulty to show how the Galatians, who were never under the law, can be said to be "again," and "anew, in bondage to these elements." But the observation made on iii. 19, that the rites of the Jews and heathens were for the matter mostly the same, removes that difficulty; and shows that they are said to return to these elements, not because they before observed the Jewish ceremonies, but because the ceremonies of the law, being for the matter mostly the same with those the gentiles used to their heathen deities, by returning to them, they returned to those elements. These rites are also weak and beggarly elements in comparison of the riches of the Holy Ghost, and the power of the Holy Ghost; they are weak, as having no power to cleanse the soul; and beggarly, as not being able to confer upon us the spiritual riches of the gospel, pardon of sins, adoption, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, eternal redemption.

[6] Ver. 10. Ἡμέρας καὶ μῆνας, Days and months.] That this verse is to be interpreted of the Jewish solemn times, and the festivals observed by them, as far as they could be observed out of Judea, the whole drift of this epistle shows, which is to bring off the Galatians from thinking they were obliged to observe the rites and ceremonies of the law: for that the Jews did ἑορτάζειν, "keep their feasts" in Egypt and Alexandria, and wherever they were settled among the heathens, we learn from Philo,* in his oration against Flaccus; that they were very numerous in Asia Minor, of which Galatia was a part, see the note on James i. 1, that in those places where they dwelt, they had converted a great many to the Jewish worship, and made them as it were a part of themselves, Josephus testifies (see note on 1 Pet. i. 1): and if it were so at Galatia, this might make them so ready to relapse to their old Jewish rites.

[7] Ver. 11. Φοβοῦμαι ὑμᾶς, I am afraid of you.] As well he might; for by this practice they must revolt again from Christ to the Jewish synagogues: for it belonged only to their great Sanhedrin,† or to the doctors of the law, to state the certain times of their new moons and other festivals; so that for the due observation of them they must entirely depend upon the Jewish Sanhedrin.

[8] Ver. 12. Ὅτι κἀγὼ ὡς ὑμεῖς, I am as you are.] That is, say the fathers, I was once zealous for the law as you are; but now I live as do the gentiles, and not as do the Jews; do you who are not Jews, but gentiles, live in like manner, as men exempted from the law: but this exposition seems not to cohere with these words, "Ye have not injured me at all." They may therefore be thus interpreted: Brethren, be still as affectionate to me as I am to you, and count me not your enemy, because I tell you the truth; for I am still as affectionate to you as ever you were to me (ver. 14). I do not look upon you as persons who have done any thing with an intent to injure me;" and though your false teachers have done you this injury, by their pernicious doctrines, yet have they not prevailed on you to speak evil of me, or act injuriously towards me.

22 For it is (there) written, that Abraham had two tion which was in the flesh.] It is the opinion of the Greek commentators, and of the reverend Dr. Hammond, that the ἀσθένεια τῆς σαρκὸς, "the infirmity of the flesh," ver. 13, and "the temptation in the flesh," here, only signify the persecutions the apostle suffered for preaching the gospel; but that this cannot be the full import of the words, is evident from these considerations: (1.) That the persecutions which he suffered for the cause of Christ could administer no reason to the Galatians, ἐξουθενῆσαι καὶ ἐκπτύειν, "to condemn, vilify, despise" him as nothing, and even to "spit upon him," who preached the gospel with such great demonstration of the Spirit, and such power of miracles under all his persecutions. Moreover, the apostle, in the Epistles to the Corinthians, represents these sufferings as a vindication of the truth of his apostleship; yea, as an argument of the "life and power of that Jesus" who did such mighty things by his apostles under all their sufferings, and as that which should create the greater respect to him; and gives them a large catalogue of them, confirming it with an oath, 2 Cor. xi. 31; which shows, that though he sometimes feared the greatness of his tribulations might make them faint, or shake them who were taught that they must also be partakers of the like sufferings; yet did he not conceive himself more contemptible or vile in his own person for his persecutions; and therefore, as he mentions this to the Thessalonians as a proof of his sincerity, that "having before suffered, and been shamefully entreated at Philippi, he was still bold to preach the gospel to them," 1 Thess. ii. 2; as he mentions his sufferings to the Ephesians, as "their glory," iii. 13, so here he declares to his Galatians, that he still suffered persecution; and he concludes his epistle thus, "From henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus," Gal. v. 11, insinuating that these sufferings were so far from giving any person a just reason to despise him, that they were rather an inducement to a more honourable treatment of him.

Secondly, Though ἀσθένεια and πειρασμὸς, "infirmity" and "temptation," absolutely put, do sometimes signify afflictions or persecutions; yet do we never elsewhere read that ἀσθένεια σαρκὸς, πειρασμὸς ἐν σαρκὶ, σκόλοψ ἐν σαρκὶ, an "infirmity, temptation, or thorn in the flesh," is used in that sense. Nor was it only the sufferings he endured in his body, but the very presence of his body, which was weak: see note on 2 Cor. xii. 7—9. Having therefore in that place proved, that besides his persecutions, he had a weakness and imperfection in his body; which rendered both his person and his speech contemptible, I think it reasonable to refer these words to it.

Ver. 18. Ἐν καλῷ.] It is thought, that by this expression Paul means himself; but it seems not reasonable to think that he would call himself "a good man," when he was speaking to them who had so bad an opinion of him; but he might say this of his doctrine, nor will the Greek bear the other sense.

[10] Ver. 20. Ἀλλάξαι τὴν φωνήν.] To temper my voice to you, as your affairs require; lamenting the fall of some, and striving to recover them, and commending the steadfastness of others in the faith.

[11] Ver 21. Τὸν νόμον οὐκ ἀκούετε; Do not you hear the law?] i. e. Do not you, Christians, to whom the law and the prophets are read every Lord's-day, and which you have the liberty to read at all times, hear what the law speaks? Here, saith Mr. Clerc, "it is to be noted, that St. Paul argues from some received midrash vulgarly known; for if that allegory whereof he here speaks had not been before heard of, he would have had no reason to wonder that the Galatians had never collected any such thing from the story which he refers to."

Ans. 1. To this I answer, That no such interpretation of this passage was vulgarly known among the Jews, is apparent from the silence of all the Jewish paraphrasters upon the place, and of all those interpreters who have conversed most in the writings of the Jewish rabbins; and yet produce not the least hint of any such thing, nor can Mr. Clerc do it. It is true indeed that the Jews had this canon, that proles sequitur matrem, and so allowed that the offspring of a bondwoman must be born in bondage, the offspring of a freewoman must be free; but it is not true that they ever deemed Agar the representative of those under the first or legal covenant, and Sarah only of those who were under the new and gospel covenant.

Secondly, This supposed midrash is contrary to their known and avowed principle, that their law was to be eternal, and so that there was no new covenant to succeed for the abolishing of it, as is plain from the apostle's dispute against them, both here and in the Epistle to the Romans, and in that to the Hebrews. Moreover, doth not Mr. Clerc tell us, in his annotations on the former chapter, that "the law, and a perfect pattern of holiness, was the same in the opinion of the Jews?" and must this "perfect pattern of holiness" here, in the opinion of the same Jews, be only a "covenant gendering to bondage," and represented by Agar, a bondwoman?

Thirdly, The apostle doth not wonder that the Galatians had collected no such allegory from the story referred to; but only asks, if they had not heard the words he doth thus allegorically expound to them. He proceeds thus:

Obj. "Farther, seeing this interpretation could not be urged against those who might deny that the scripture ought to be so understood, and the apostle doth not make use of his authority to confirm it; it is evident that he argues here from what was generally allowed, which kind of things it is not material should be true, or well-grounded, as long as they contain nothing prejudicial to true piety, and are believed by those against whom we dispute. So that from St. Paul's using such an allegory against the Judaizing Galatians, it does not follow that we in this age are bound to admit it as a secret revealed from heaven to the apostle."

Ans. To this I answer, (1.) That it is too confidently said, that "the apostle doth not make use of his authority to confirm this interpretation;" for is it not "Paul an apostle, not of man, but of Jesus Christ, and of God the Father" (i. 1), who writes thus to the Galatians? And had not the apostles from the Holy Ghost "the word of wisdom, and of knowledge," to direct them in the understanding the mysteries of the Old Testament? Does he not declare, they spake "the wisdom of God in a mystery?" 1 Cor. ii. 7. That wisdom "which God had revealed to them by his Spirit?" ver. 10, that they had "received the Spirit which is of God that they might know the things which are freely given us of God; which things they also spake not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; com sons, the one (to wit, Ishmael) by (Agar) a bondmaid, the other (to wit, Isaac) by (Sarah) a freewoman (a lady or princess, as her name imports).

23 But he who was of the bondwoman [12] was born after the flesh (and so was not to be accounted for the seed); but (whereas) he of the freewoman was by promise, (and so was only to be accounted for the promised seed, Rom. ix. 8.)

24 Which things are an allegory (expressing one thing, and by that hinting another to us): for these (two, Agar and Sarah,) are (intended typically to represent to us) the two covenants; the one (viz. that of the law, given) from the mount Sinai, (is that covenant) which gendereth to bondage, (i. e. subjects its children to bondage, and is the covenant) which is (typified by) Agar (the bondwoman).

25 [13] For this Agar (whose name signifies a rock) is (in the allegory) mount Sinai in Arabia (whence the law was given), and (so she) answereth to (that) Jerusalem which now is (they living long in the wilderness, and receiving the law from mount Sinai, in Arabia), and is in bondage with her children (to the law given there).

paring spiritual things with spiritual?" see the note, ver. 12, 13, there. And is not this a sufficient confirmation of all which they declared they writ, as the apostles of Jesus Christ?

Secondly, I add, that it cannot reasonably be said, "He argues here from what was generally allowed," not only because I have proved that nothing of this nature ever was, or could be, allowed by the Jews; but also because no one instance can be produced where the apostle useth any such argument ad hominem, or from their own mistaken principles; but where it is evident from his own words and declarations that he doth so. Had the apostle said, as he is forced in his paraphrase to make him speak, "These things used to be allegorically explained by the Jews, and may be interpreted so as to signify what I a little before said;" or, as he begins his Christian allegorist, "We take you at your word, O Jews!" there might have been some probability in this fancy: but the apostle having not given us the least hint of any thing of this nature, it must pass for mere romance; and the other things he adds can be no better than a reflection on the authority and writings of the apostles; for "Do you not hear the law?" saith the apostle: No, saith Mr. Clerc, that they do not, yea, they cannot in this case; "it being not at all necessary that the words of scripture should have any such allegorical interpretation as that which is supposed (here) to belong to them."—"Do you not hear the law, for it is written?" saith the apostle: What then, saith Mr. Clerc, you grossly impose upon us in these words, connecting them to the former by a γὰρ, "for," and saying gravely, "It is written;" when indeed you argue not from what is written, but from some whimsies of the Jews, perhaps neither true nor well-grounded. These things "are an allegory," saith the apostle: So you say, St. Paul, quoth this critic: but "if we thoroughly consider it, we shall find that most that hath been said by learned men against this way of interpreting scripture in the general, may be objected against this particular allegory."—"These are the two testaments," saith St. Paul; "But," saith Mr. Clerc, "we of this age are not bound to admit this as a secret revealed from heaven to you:" and by your good leave, "this interpretation cannot be urged against those who deny that the scripture ought to be so understood."

To conclude, what shall we say to the unbelieving Jews, objecting thus from this interpretation? "Finding that your apostle hath produced against us a weak argument, false and ill-grounded, you pretend to help him out by saying, it is a Jewish midrash vulgarly known: this we must take for an officious lie, till you can show that either we, or our fathers, or Philo the allegorist, who speaks of Agar and Sarah in a quite different way of allegory, had any such sentiments. And if your apostle hath imposed upon you here with such ill-grounded arguments and interpretations, without giving you the least hint that he was arguing only from our concessions, how know you that he hath not often done the like in all his other writings?"

[12] Ver. 23. Κατὰ σάρκα γεγέννηται, Was born after the flesh.] i. e. By natural generation, and the strength of the flesh, before Abraham's body became dead (Rom. iv. 19); the other by virtue of the promise made to him by God, when his body and Sarah's womb were both dead (ver. 20), and only quickened by that Spirit which is the power of God.

[13] Ver. 25. Τὸ γὰρ Ἄγαρ Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν, For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia.] i. e. She represents it (1.) in her name, for הגר, in the Arabian language, signifies a rock, as mount Sinai is called. (2.) By her flight, she flying twice into Arabia from her mistress, Gen. xvi. 7, into the wilderness of Shur, called by the Chaldee "Chagra," there and Gen. xxv. 18, and after flying again into the same wilderness. And (3.) by her station, for there dwelt the posterity of Ishmael, called from her name Hagarens, as the oriental writers witness: see Bochart. Geogr. Sacr. lib. iv. cap. 11, p. 255, cap. 27, p. 312, and Grotius here.

Τὸ γὰρ Ἄγαρ, Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν ἐν Ἀραβίᾳ.] Note, that it seems very unreasonable to me to expunge these words, Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν ἐν Ἀραβίᾳ, against the plain evidence of all the ancient versions, and the current suffrage of all the ancient interpreters, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, among the Greeks; Ambrose and St. Jerome among the Latins, who take not the least notice of any various reading here; and to add δὲ for γὰρ, only to solve a difficulty: for if this liberty may be allowed, we may take the same liberty in all other places, and strike out such words as spurious or suspected, which create the difficulty. And this is less to be allowed when the words rejected, according to the descants of the ancients, give a plain reason why Agar is made the symbol of the covenant given from mount Sinai, viz. τὸ γὰρ ὄνομα τοῦ Ἄγαρ, "because the name Agar," saith Bochart, "is by interpretation a rock;" and, say the Greek interpreters, "is the name given to mount Sinai, ἐν Ἀραβῶν γλώσσῃ, in the Arabian tongue." But we need here no various lection, the interpretation which Dr. Mills hath excellently given us of this place being very clear, only by adding κατ' ὑποτύπωσιν, "by representation," after the word ἐστὶν, which is the sense it usually bears in allegorical propositions, and by referring συστοιχεῖ δὲ τῇ νῦν Ἱερουσαλὴμ, not to the mountain, but to Agar, for then the sense of the whole runs thus: These two sons of Abraham, Ishmael born of Agar his handmaid, and Isaac born of Sarah the freewoman, contain an allegory, in which the name is put for the thing signified or represented by it; for these two women and their children are, by representation, the two covenants; the one covenant being that from mount Sinai, gendering to bondage, ἥτις ἐστιν, which is, by representation, Agar the bondwoman, and so bearing a child which also was in bondage, τὸ γὰρ Ἄγαρ, for that which is signified by Agar, from whom Ishmael descended, is mount Sinai in Arabia, whence the law was given; and this Agar answers to Jerusalem that now is, and is in bondage with her children to the law, as the bondwoman and her child were to Abraham; but the Jerusalem which is above, ἐλευθέρα ἐστὶν, is by representation Sarah the freewoman, whose son was born, not according to the flesh, but "according to the promise;" and this woman is the mother of us all; for "we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise," and so the spiritual seed of Abraham, and "heirs according to the promise." And this interpretation is confirmed by the conclusion of the whole allegory thus: "So then, brethren, we are not the children of the bondwoman, but of the free." O si sic omnia!

[14] Ver. 26. Ἡ ἄνω Ἱερουσαλὴμ, The Jerusalem which is above.] As the state of the church under the gospel is styled, by the evangelists, "the kingdom of heaven;" so here the Jerusalem which is from above, the gospel-state, or new kingdom, being erected by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, and leading us to it, is styled "the heavenly Jerusalem." Note also, that the Jews tell us,* that "the inferior Jerusalem is a type of that which is above."

* Voisin de Lege, p. 369.

nant) is free, (is the freewoman, and so her children cannot be in bondage to the law, as the Jews were, and it is this Jerusalem) which is the mother of us all.

27 For (of this Jerusalem, Isa. liv. 1) it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not (and so in this art like to Sarah): for (now) the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband (the gentile, than the Jewish church).

28 Now (to apply these things to us) we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise (as being born, not of the flesh, but of the Spirit, by virtue of the promise, In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed).

29 But as then he that was born after the flesh (i. e. Ishmael) [15] persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, (i. e. Isaac, the seed produced by the Spirit of God, and the representative of us who are born of the Spirit, John iii. 3. 5) even so it is now; (the Jews, the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, every where persecuting us Christians, 1 Thess. ii. 14—16.)

30 Nevertheless what saith the scripture? (i. e. What is contained in the scripture? even these words, approved by God, Gen. xxi. 12,) Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman [16] shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman.

31 So then, brethren, we (being children of the promise, ver. 28) are not children of the bondwoman (and so in subjection to the law), but of the free (woman, and therefore at liberty from the obligation or bondage of it).

Ver. 27.] Note, that the Jews themselves interpret these words, cited from Isa. liv. 1, of the times of the Messiah (Midrash Shir Hashirim, ad Cant. i. 5).

[15] Ver. 29. Ἐδίωκε, Persecuted.] Jerome here saith, "Ishmael struck Isaac;" but the text, Gen. xxi. 9, saith only, that he mocked him: this derision therefore must be reputed as a persecuting him with the tongue.

[16] Ver. 30. Οὐ κληρονομήσῃ, Shall not be heir.] Hence we may learn what that persecution, mentioned ver. 29, was, even a derision of Isaac's pretensions to be the heir of Abraham; (so among the Jews Rabbi Salom,* cited by Cartwright on Gen. xxi. 9, and Jerome in his Questions and Traditions upon Genesis;) even as the carnal Jews contended with the believing gentiles, that they must be the true heirs of the promise made to Abraham, who were his seed according to the flesh.

CHAPTER V.

1 Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us (Christians) free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage (to the law, Acts xv. 10).

2 Behold, I Paul say unto you (Galatians), that if ye be circumcised (in order to your justification), Christ shall profit you nothing (ii. 1. 3, 4).

3 For [1] I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor (by virtue of that circumcision) to do the whole law.

4 Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are (seeking to be) justified by the law (and not by faith in him only); ye are fallen from (justification by) grace.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 3. Μαρτύρομαι πάλιν, I testify again.] These words must not be thought to import, that he had testified this before in this epistle, and now did it again, there being nothing said before of this matter; but thus, "I Paul say to you, that if ye be circumcised Christ shall profit you nothing:" and again, "I testify that you are debtors, by admitting this circumcision, to yield obedience to the whole law of Moses:" for as by baptism we Christians do oblige ourselves to observe all the institutions of the Christian faith; so did the Jews by circumcision oblige themselves to yield obedience to the whole law of Moses. This the apostle elsewhere intimates, by saying to the Jews, "Circumcision verily profiteth, if you keep the law," Rom. ii. 25, to which thou art obliged by it; and by objecting to them who were so zealous for the circumcision of others, that they acted insincerely in that zeal, because they themselves did not keep the law, Gal. vi. 13. When any one became a proselyte of justice, or turned from heathenism to Judaism, they first instructed him in the law of Moses, and when he declared himself resolved to obey it, then they circumcised him, and so admitted him into the congregation, and he became as one of them. For circumcision being the sign by which they entered into covenant with God, when the Mosaical law became the covenant betwixt God and the seed of Abraham; that circumcision, by which they entered into covenant with him, must lay an obligation on them to observe the law of Moses. And hence the Judaizing Christians, who held that the law of Moses was an everlasting covenant, thought that the believing gentiles were to be dealt with as their proselytes; that is, unless they were circumcised, and observed the law, they could not be saved (Acts xv. 1).

But still it remains a great inquiry, whether the words contained in the second, third, and fourth verses, are to be taken generally, so as to exclude all believing Jews from any benefit by Christ, or by the covenant of grace, who sought for justification by the works of the law? or whether they are to be restrained only to the believing gentiles? Now in answer to this question, let it be noted,

First, That it is not the being circumcised, which is here said to exclude from grace and salvation, but the being circumcised to obtain justification and salvation by it; as is apparent from the words, "Christ is become of none effect to you, whosoever of you are justified by the law." Had the bare use of circumcision rendered Christ unprofitable to the Jew and gentile, or put them under the curse of the law, Paul would not have circumcised Timothy, nor have owned the believing Jews as Christian brethren, who were still zealous for the law.

Secondly, Observe, that the law of Moses, being given to the Jews, and some of its precepts being styled "everlasting covenants and commandments," and they having all engaged to observe it, might think themselves obliged still to be circumcised, and observe the law, by virtue of God's precept, till it was more solemnly by God declared to be abrogated, though they expected not to be justified by it: for so we find it was with the believing Jews: they all continued "zealous of the law," Acts xxi. 20, and thought all Jews obliged to observe it, ver. 24, but then they thought to be saved, not by the law, "but by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," Acts xv. 11, as the believing gentiles were, and they "believed in Christ, that they might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law," Gal. ii. 16. But now the gentiles being not under the obligation of the law of Moses, they having first believed in Christ, and received,

5 For we (Christians) through the Spirit (which we have received) wait [2] for the hope of righteousness by faith.

6 (We expect it, I say, by that faith which ministers this Spirit, and not by circumcision;) For in (the economy of) Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision (as to our acceptance with God, and our reward from him); but [3] faith which worketh by love.

7 Ye did run well (in the beginning of your Christian race); who did hinder you that ye should not (continue to) obey the truth?

8 [4] This persuasion (of the necessity of your being circumcised, and obeying the law of Moses) cometh not of him (i. e. that God) that calleth (Gr. called) you (to the faith of Christ.

9 Nor ought this circumcision to seem a little thing to you, nor are these Judaizers to be disregarded because they are few, for they are like to leaven; now ye know) [5] A little leaven leaveneth (and so corrupteth) the whole lump (see the note on 1 Cor. v. 6).

10 (But) I have confidence in you through the Lord, that (after consideration of what I have written) ye will be none otherwise minded (than I exhort you to be): but he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment (τὸ κρῖμα, the sentence of condemnation due to him on that account), whosoever he be.

11 And I (whereas some of the Judaizers have suggested, that I elsewhere preach up that circumcision I oppose in you), brethren, (you may learn the falsehood of that suggestion from my sufferings, for) [6] if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution (from the Jews? since) then is the offence (they take at preaching) of the cross ceased.

12 [7] I would they were even cut off (from the communion of the church) which (do thus) trouble (and unsettle) you.
